American Veterans' Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES G. FULTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD three of the columns which Mr. Thomas Stokes has written concerning the recent convention of the American Veterans' Committee in Des Moines, Iowa, June 14–16.

I have been informed that the membership of AVC is deeply grateful to Mr. Stokes for the splendid columns which he wrote concerning the proceedings at their convention. One AVC member summed up their feeling when he said:

> Mr. Stokes was able to get at the heart of the AVC because he wrote not only of what we said but of the thoughts and emotions which motivated us and of which we could not speak.

So overwhelming has been the praise for Mr. Stokes' columns throughout AVC's membership that I am told that he will be proposed as AVC's first honorary member from the ranks of the press. AVC's members feel that Mr. Stokes understands them and in the difficult years ahead may do much to assist them in meeting the problems they will have to face.

I have followed the record of AVC carefully and the columns of Mr. Stokes have confirmed my opinion that this progressive organization of World War II veterans has a great future in this country. AVC believes that the welfare of the veteran is linked with the welfare of the community, the Nation, and the world. It has demonstrated time and again that it possessed the guts and the leadership to go out and fight for this principle. AVC spearheaded the campaign which was instrumental in saving the Wyatt housing program and has been way out in front in the drive for a strong price-control program. AVC organized demonstrations for OPA all over the country, following the passage of the inflationary House bill, and is now vigorously reentering the fight. AVC believes that OPA is the veterans' fight and it is not deterred from campaigning to protect the veteran's pension, living allotment, or other benefit from inflation by pressure from special interest lobbies. That is because AVC is an independent organization beholden only to its members. It now has a democratic mandate to act and, knowing that AVC means what it says, I will be watching for a dynamic national program.

I wish AVC all success with its great principle: citizens first, veterans second. There are some 16,000,000 veterans of this war. They compose a major segment of our population. The future of our country may well depend on the manner in which the World War II veterans approach their responsibilities as citizens. If they shirk them, if they withdraw into self-contained groups thinking only of themselves, the Nation as well as the veterans will suffer. On the other hand, if the veterans are inspired by this fine idea of citizens first, veterans second, they may well assume the progressive leadership in the affairs of this country, which is to be expected of the young, vigorous veterans who fought so valiantly.

Mr. Stokes' articles follow:

AVC MEANS BUSINESS

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

DES MOINES, June 17.—An inspiring miracle is perhaps a good description of the performance of the 850 World War II veteran delegates who, working day and night, created the permanent organization of the American Veterans' Committee at their first annual convention here and charted a progressive course on domestic and foreign policy.

These earnest youngsters will be heard from, and so will the others they enlist as they go home to expand from their present 80,000 membership and exert their influence on affairs of their own communities, the Nation, and the world.

The youngsters here had to go through the same mechanics of all political conventions. They worked all night long in delegation caucuses, in platform, constitution, and nominating sessions. They had to learn as they went along.

They had no time or inclination for anything else. They got their job done by sticking to it for 4 days, though sometimes it looked as if they wouldn't. Altogether, they were a group of ruggedly individualistic, independent, thinking young men and women, and deadly in earnest that this worst of all wars shall not have been fought in vain.

It would have been a fine thing if mature politicians in Congress and in State government could have seen it all. For these youngsters mean business—and not maybe.

There were some few professionals here, a tiny minority with Communist leanings, come here to confuse, to work their way in. They worked at it ceaselessly. They had the advantage of experience. Their strategy was obvious. But they were licked because the youngsters knew where they wanted to go.

It is to the credit of the leadership, including Charles G. Bolté, national chairman; Gilbert Harrison, of Los Angeles, one of the founders; Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr.; Oren Root, Jr.; and some others, that they decided to meet this issue head-on, without compromise, and quash it. They did. All liberal organizations these days have this problem. This one, unlike some of the others, decided to face it squarely.

The issue was raised over the candidacy of Frederick Borden, of New York, an official of the National Citizens Political Action Committee, as vice chairman. It was not this connection but his association with Lawrence Noble, executive secretary of the New York AVC, that caused it. When Mr. Noble was elected to that office he was accused openly in the meeting by his opponent as being a Communist.

Mr. Borden developed an issue within the organization for himself when he took exception to an editorial written by Mr. Harrison setting forth AVC principles. The editorial was a progressive statement. Mr. Borden thought it was too conservative and wrote an answer to the AVC publication which the editor unwisely did not print. Mr. Borden then began a personal and letter-writing campaign all over the country to AVC chapters in a campaign against Mr. Harrison.

For a time here the Borden candidacy for vice chairman threatened to split the convention. The leaders decided to stand firm behind Mr. Harrison's candidacy. Mr. Borden withdrew and his support immediately shifted to a so-called unity candidate, Norris Helford, also of Los Angeles—a familiar technique. A third candidate in the race, Robert White, of Washington, also withdrew. In the showdown Mr. Harrison won.

The leadership recognized the difficulty of their position, realized they would be accused of "Red baiting." But they decided to accept it forthrightly. They were aware of forces which don't like AVC because of its progressive principles, and they wanted no stigma of communistic influence to confuse their position on issues of the day. The convention likewise defeated various moves of the party liners to get platform declarations that would be harmful.

THE ENERGETIC AVC

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

DES MOINES, June 15.—A refreshing experience, sitting in at the sessions of the First National Convention of the American Veterans' Committee, after attending a cut-and-dried, lackadaisical Republican State Convention in Indiana where everything was fixed long in advance.

Democracy is rampant in this collection of wide-awake World War II veterans—in fact, so rampant at times, with speeches and motions from the floor, that the observer wondered how they got their organization work done.

No steam roller here. And everything is done in the open—nominations, platform, constitution.

They came here from all parts of the country—the pipe-smoking boys from Harvard, Yale, and Amherst; the wiry boys from the South, with shirt collars open; the garrulous young men from Manhattan, full of words; the quieter young men of the Middle West; the forthright, breezy boys from the Pacific coast. Gilbert Harrison, founder of AVC, said some came 10,000 miles for this first organizing convention. Some had to take up collections among friends to pay their expenses.

This new organization, which started with the idea that this time the veterans should do something about making a better world for themselves and their children, is a dynamo. That strikes you forcibly. Energy oozes out.

It now has 60,000 members in some 500 chapters. It had only 12,000 in January this year. It has prospects of growing fast if it sticks to its principles and to its motto: "Citizens first, veterans afterward." It is starting a campaign for a million members.

These veterans form a lever that might do much to turn back the tide of reaction that recently seems to be setting in. For they are in earnest. They believe something. Politicians might remember that. They are not satisfied with things as they are. They are not satisfied with what Congress is doing now.

They made this clear in the thunderous applause for Bishop Bernard J. Shiel, of Chicago, when he attacked Congress as "peculiarly inept." This Congress, he said, had a great responsibility, but it did not meet it, failing to enact a minimum wage law, to pass FEPC, ripping up the Price Control Act, emasculating full-employment legislation, and yet being in so great haste to pass antistrike legislation and the ill-conceived Case labor bill.

Bishop Shiel's theme was that if this country provided a decent living for its people it has nothing for fear from communism, since people who are well fed, well housed, and well clothed are not interested in communism.

He touched a subject there that had significance in this meeting. For there are those who are trying to involve this organization with radicalism or communism because of what it stands for. It does have left-wing elements, as well as liberal elements and some conservative elements.

It had to face in some of its election issues the fight so usual these days over alleged Communist infiltration. No secret was made of that.

But it is basically a liberal organization in the best of sense, and it would be sad indeed if a tiny minority should so confuse the membership, or get in a position to smear it, as to hamper the public service it can perform.

Its leaders are well aware of this threat, and well aware, too, that they must keep out any Communist influence. At the same time they are conscious that they must continue courageously to fight for the principles for which they stand in domestic and international affairs, or, as Mr. Harrison put it, "You've always got to take the risk of unpopularity."

Its national chairman, Charles G. Bolté, also put it aptly when he said that the AVC must "adopt no narrow factionalism" and must seek to "provide economic security within the bounds of freedom."

IMPATIENT YOUNG MEN

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

DES MOINES, June 18.—What a lot of young men who came out of the war think of their elders in Congress, who are fumbling us into inflation and greedy "normalcy," and of their elders among world diplomats, who are fumbling us toward another catastrophe in the old power-politics way, was revealed by delegates from all parts of the country to the first American Veterans' Committee convention here last week end.

They spoke out bluntly in their platform.

They don't like what Congress has done to OPA. They condemned it bitterly. They don't like what is being done about homes for their families. They want Wilson Wyatt, Housing Expediter, to do more expediting with the powers he has and they want Congress to give him some more, as well as to enact the long-range Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill.

They want the minimum wage increase bill, already passed by the Senate, jimmied out of the House Labor Committee. They want unemployment benefits increased to a flat $25 for 26 weeks, as President Truman asked over a year ago. They want Congress to enact a comprehensive national health program, about which neither House nor Senate yet has done anything.

They fought side by side with Negroes and soldiers of other races in the war, and they want an end of Jim Crow-ism. They don't want any persecution of Japanese-Americans, some of whom fought so gallantly at their sides in Italy and France.

They don't want discrimination in jobs on account of race, creed, or color, and they demand enactment of the permanent FEPC bill, which has the lip service of enough members of parties in Congress to pass, but which still languishes. They don't want the vote denied on account of race by poll taxes or white primaries or any other devices.

They want the Un-American Activities Committee of the House abolished and no more of its persecutions. They want Congress to make itself a more efficient body and more responsible to the public will. They want the House to pass the La Follette-Monroney bill, recently approved by the Senate, but they want it even broader, to do away with the seniority system.

All these things are within the purview of the Congress now sitting.

On the world scale, they are concerned about the way the diplomats are behaving. They want the United Nations developed into a real world government. They shouted their approval when Harold Stassen urged before one of their forums the abandonment of the old fetish of national sovereignty, which he declared is "as dead as the divine right of kings."

They want international control of the atomic bomb and atomic energy along lines of the Acheson-Lilienthal report and the Baruch proposal to the United Nations. They want the manufacture of atomic bombs stopped and those we now have destroyed. They want control of atomic energy in this country for peacetime purposes, for promotion of scientific and medical research, by a civilian commission as provided in the McMahon bill passed by the Senate but still not acted on in the House. They want us to meet our obligations to feed starving people abroad and to help them rehabilitate themselves. They want colonial peoples set free.

They don't want our country to join in any alliances or blocs either against Great Britain or Russia. They want the United Nations to call a conference and amend the Charter so that the United Nations can prohibit the manufacture of weapons of mass destruction by member nations.

They want, in short, action.

They are impatient, because they are young. But the world is moving fast today, as fast as young men can run, as fast as they scurried up beachheads all over the world, as fast as they fell before the guns of the enemy.

The young men are impatient, but they are far wiser than their years.

Editorials on Atomic-Control Proposal of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the excellent editorials from the Washington Daily News and the Philadelphia Inquirer on the subject of the Baruch proposal for the control of atomic energy:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 15, 1946]

THE BARUCH ATOM-CONTROL PLAN

Bernard Baruch, speaking for our Government, has offered a frightened world a bold plan for international control of atomic energy. If accepted by the United Nations in the spirit offered, it can turn this fantastic weapon of destruction into an immeasurable force for good. It can outlaw atomic warfare, perhaps all major war.

"We are here to make a choice between the quick and the dead," Mr. Baruch told the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission yesterday. "Behind the black portent of the new atomic age lies a hope, which seized upon with faith can work our salvation. If we fail, then we have damned every man to be the slave of fear. Let us not deceive ourselves; we must elect world peace or world destruction."

He and the President and Secretary Byrnes have accepted the essentials of the Lilienthal-Acheson report and added important safeguards.

Our Government proposes to place all dangerous atomic activities under control of the United Nations Atomic Development Authority. Nondangerous atomic activities would be generally permissible—these promise great benefits to mankind, especially through advances in biology, medicine, and industry.

Under iron-clad safeguards the United States would impart its atomic secrets to the ADA step by step as the international control machinery was perfected. To this Mr. Baruch would add another important safeguard for effective policing, immediate enforcement and punishment of violations, by eliminating the veto authority of any nation in this field:

"There must be no veto to protect those who violate their solemn agreements not to develop or use atomic energy for destructive purposes. The bomb does not wait upon debate. To delay may be to die."

The heart of the Baruch plan, as of the Lilienthal-Acheson report, is international control through ADA of the sources of atomic minerals such as uranium and thorium. As the plan moves through the United Nations Commission, the Security Council, and then back to the individual nations in treaty form, there will be much debate about details of the plan Mr. Baruch has stated in general terms.

But, in our judgment, no interpretations should be permitted to water down ADA's full authority over the sources of materials from which atomic energy can be produced. There must be the international "managerial control or ownership of all atomic energy activities potentially dangerous to world security," as specified by Mr. Baruch.

The United States here points the way to peace. We are prepared to sacrifice much for that peace. But in return we demand the strictest pledges of good faith on the part of others, and effective international power to enforce these pledges. We shall share our atomic secrets progressively, only as the good faith and actual performance of our international associates can be readily and safely judged.

Peace can be attained if the United Nations is prepared to keep faith with itself, with those who suffered and died to make it possible, and with those who come after us.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer]

FIRST: AGREE ON OUTLAWING A-BOMB

While world politicians putter over the preliminaries to peace treaties, American scientists have started a letter-writing campaign to convince foreign scientists of their strong desire to work for peace and their determination to prevent an atomic armament race.

The scientists, it seems to us, are showing a lot more intelligence than the politicians.

It's a little startling that America's historic proposal last Friday to outlaw its atomic bomb if all other nations agree to be bound by the same rules has caused scarcely a ripple on the surface of world events.

Comment on Bernard M. Baruch's masterful presentation of the American plan was a mixture of polite approval, cautious wait-and-see, and "let's think it over." The British liked it but tempered their enthusiasm when they learned that the Soviet Union was not happy about it. Russian writers, and their Communist counterparts in this country, vigorously criticized, as an injustice to the Soviets, its provision against the use of a veto.

But meanwhile the Big Four Ministers in Paris continue to fuss over hair-splitting definitions of peace terms that will be acceptable to the Russians. In New York the United Nations Security Council, pondering weighty abstractions, sits in fear and trembling of further demonstrations of Soviet displeasure.

They're all afraid of the Russians. What they ought to be worrying about, what they ought to be afraid of, is the atomic bomb and its potentialities.

In the unearthly light of the atomic age what will peace treaties and security pacts amount to if atomic power is not outlawed for war purposes?

What price the fretting over reparations, boundaries, balances of power, regional agreements, veto privileges, and all the mumbo-jumbo of diplomacy if the atomic bomb is to hang over civilization like the proverbial sword of Damocles?

Trying to get the Russians to agree to something—anything—as a start on peace treaties is important, as things go in the political world. But it isn't so important as putting every effort into getting the Russians to agree to a system of atomic energy control which would go far to rule out the possibility of future wars.

Dickering over Franco Spain is important in the political scheme of things. But Franco Spain would be a relatively small potato in the cataclysmic explosion of an atomic war.

Last Friday Mr. Baruch said, "We are here to make a choice between the quick and the dead." We wonder whether the world politicians, including the Big Four Foreign Ministers, have given much thought to that statement. There are topics more momentous than Italian reparations and an Austrian treaty that should be on the conference agenda.

Mr. Baruch also noted that "the bomb does not wait upon debate." Have the world politicians thought of that? Will debate on nonessentials have to go on until peace treaties and security councils are only memories in the minds of the survivors—if any—of an atomic war?

It seems to us that in the hectic struggle to arrive at peace treaties the diplomats and policy makers are putting the cart before the horse. In other days, even in 1919, peace treaties were the conventional conclusion to wars. But this isn't 1919.

The truth is that unless the atomic bomb is outlawed and atomic power brought under some kind of control, peace treaties won't be worth the paper they're written on.

Before wasting further precious time in trying to find the base for treaties, world politicians should bestir themselves out of the mental stone age in which they are living and set about controlling the A-bomb. That's what they'll have to do if peace treaties are to have any meaning.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter that I want the Members of this House to hear and read.

It is from an exserviceman from my district, Capt. William J. Cochran, a veteran of World War II. He served in England and on the continent of Europe through all the major battles, and is well acquainted with the circumstances and conditions which we must face with regard to world trade, and especially the loan to Britain. His observations with regard to the British loan are worthy of serious consideration. I submit them to you. The letter reads as follows:

IRON MOUNTAIN, MICH., May 27, 1946.

The Honorable FRANK J. HOOK,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HOOK: Since my return from the service my father and I have often discussed the proposed loan to Great Britain now before the House of Representatives for consideration. He has asked me to write to you expressing my views on the subject.

It is my studied opinion that the British loan is of the utmost importance to the Nation and I urge you to support it. The significance of export trade to the economic welfare of the Nation cannot, I feel, be overemphasized. Our Nation always has had, in normal times, greater productive capacity than the domestic demand could absorb. At the present time domestic demand is, due to the pent-up purchasing power created by the war years, greatly inflated, but in a few years, that purchasing power shall recede to normal proportions and foreign markets will once again become highly important. If the British Commonwealth, our largest prewar customer and chief potential market for the types of goods that we must export, is not back on its economic feet by the time our productive capacity overtakes domestic demands, the excess of unsold products will make the difference between a balanced economy and an unbalanced one. Short-sighted people may object now to the extension of credit to the British Commonwealth for the purchase of goods that are scarce today on the domestic market, but the long-range viewpoint is infinitely more important. A little sacrifice today on the part of the American public may mean the difference between prosperity and depression 5 years hence. Then, too, due to 6 years of wartime economic inertia in most parts of the British Commonwealth, markets are today in practically an embryonic stage. And the first agency that takes the initiative to sell to them has the toehold for future sales. For example, if we sell trucks today to the Union of South Africa, the users of trucks there will become accustomed to the servicing and maintaining of U. S. A. made trucks, they will stock our parts, train their mechanics to our methods, and become satisfied with our products.

In future years we would have a much better chance of reselling them on American trucks. If another nation's trucks are sold there first, they will have that ground-floor advantage and we would then have to struggle to overcome it.

Some may proclaim that we can secure these markets without a loan to Britain, but the fact is that we cannot. If this loan is not granted, Britain will be forced to continue Empire preference and refuse to allow the conversion of other nations' sterling holdings into other currencies, which include our American dollars. But the terms of the loan specify that, in return for the credit to be granted to Britain, they must agree to allow sterling conversion, thus freeing not only significant sums of British funds for trade with the United States of America but also opening the way for more trade with all the nations with whom Britain trades. This is our chance to crack the sterling bloc. If we do not take advantage of this opportunity, it may never present itself again.

A few other facts, I think, are also worthy of your consideration. First of all, we must admit that the British people voluntarily disrupted their economy and made an all-out war effort to an extent not equaled by any other of the Allied Powers. Readjustment to normal economic ways is a much more difficult task for Britain than for us. During my tour of service in England, I had the opportunity to observe just how completely Britain geared for war. I saw how the manufacturing of every item that could be interpreted in any way as a luxury was curtailed. The British people had available to them during the war years only the barest of necessities. Every other resource and capacity was devoted to the war effort. I saw how completely mobilized for military and nonmilitary service alike were the whole of the British population. Anyone who saw that could not begrudge to the British people his wholehearted admiration for a job well done. While it cannot be said that this country actually owes Britain a helping hand in their readjustment, it would be definitely ungrateful on our part if we did not recognize it.

It is said by some that the proposed loan will encourage Britain along the road to socialism by financing the socialistic measures that are currently being advocated in that country. I feel that exactly the opposite is true. Socialistic measures would not be necessary in Britain today if her economy had not been dealt such a damaging blow since 1939. Free enterprise thwarted during the war years of necessity has not been able to throw off the shackles of controls and furnish the antidote to socialism. This loan, by reviving freedom of enterprise and competition of trade between the American and British economies, will most certainly act to retard authoritarian influences in British Government.

And finally, the problem of world peace is, I am convinced, undeniably involved in the issue of the British loan. History has recorded that wars have an inherent economic background which is, perhaps, the largest single cause for conflict. Wherever economic frictions between nations lie, there also lies political and eventually, military frictions. If the United States should decline this opportunity to promote trade with its most economic partner, a new and dangerous friction would be created. An alarming pattern would be set for future actions of this Nation in international trade. But if, by granting this loan, the United States announces, not just to the British Commonwealth, but to the entire world, that a new policy of international economic cooperation is in effect, the cause of world peace will be appreciably encouraged and an example set for the other nations of the world to follow.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM J. COCHRAN.

Extension of Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLSWORTH B. BUCK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in favor of the conference report, but I am not happy in doing so. I much prefer the Senate bill which, in my opinion, better met the responsibility the Congress owes to the Nation, to men now in the service, and to men now liable for induction.

Library Demonstration Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me to the American Library Association, Buffalo, N. Y., June 18, 1946:

As one bearing coals to Newcastle, I have come to address you trained librarians on library demonstration work. However, I shall assume that you are familiar with the general purposes and features of the Hill-Douglas bill.

You know that the reason Congress can concern itself with library service is the Federal-aid provision. Under this bill the National Treasury could for the first time offer cooperating States a minimum of $25,000 a year, and up to $50,000 additional if the States chose to match the amount. To illustrate, my own State—Illinois—which is already carrying on a library demonstration program, could receive the basic $25,000 plus another $50,000 which they could match, making $75,000 Federal funds for the State, or, in all, $125,000 for the work.

This project would run for 4 years. In other words, it is a short-term demonstration program and does not open the issue of the merits of a permanent Federal-aid policy for library support. State library agencies would work out and submit their own plans for the work, thereby tailoring the project to their needs and not being forced into any uniform Federal strait-jacket.

This is explicit in the bill as is stated in section 2:

"(b) The provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with State and local initiative and responsibility in the conduct of public-library service. The administration of public libraries, the selection of personnel and library books and materials and, insofar as consistent with the purposes of this act, the determination of the best uses of the funds provided under this act, shall be reserved explicitly to the States and their local subdivisions."

You know that the plan is gaining support and the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the Farm Bureau, the Grange, and the Farmers Union have all endorsed it. Newspapers from Maine to Florida, from California to Minnesota and Texas are plugging for it in their editorials and the Washington Post is just one of the outstanding papers which is taking the lead in this matter.

This last month, moreover, the Senate Subcommittee on Education and Labor held a most successful hearing. The eloquence of the witnesses assembled by Mr. Paul Howard, Director of your National Relations Office, was persuasive and the committee not only gave the project its unanimous approval but it voted to extend the service to 5 instead of 4 years and to raise the maximum allowance to $75,000. Senator HILL's committee has given the measure an auspicious start. On the House side we are eagerly hoping for hearings before the Education Committee.

You also know, far better than I, from on-the-spot experience the need of this demonstration work. One cannot be complacent about our American opportunities, when we recall that a fourth of our people, 35,000,000, have no access whatsoever to libraries. We cannot cease stressing the fact that a relatively small expenditure, implemented by well-developed plans setting up proper-sized administrative areas, branch libraries, service stations, and bookmobiles, can bring world thought, world culture if you please, to isolated farms. Nor can our urban communities, with their modern equipment and enormous resources, feel that this is not their problems, too. If modern science has shrunken this earth into one world, how much more certain is it that these United States are also one land? Today's citizens of Buffalo, New York, Detroit, Chicago, and San Francisco, were perhaps living on some farm or playing in a smaller town which had no city advantages.

In my study connected with the introduction of H. R. 5742—the public-library service-demonstration bill—I have become aware of the discrepancies in library service not only between the various States but within individual States. It seems that in the very areas where we need the best libraries the poorest facilities exist. Regions which have fewest bookstores, poorest schools, the smallest amount of reading material available through commercial channels, also have fewer libraries.

In a sense libraries are yeast for all the worth-while life of a community. Their services are supplementary and illumine every civic and cultural project. They are not competitive with other agencies, but enrich the work of each. The scope of a country school is meager if the students cannot supplement their reading beyond the one or more basic texts. A child lacks an essential of growth in our modern world if he is cut off from the intellectual leaven of a library.

Adult education, similarly, becomes impossible without recourse to books. The wide-awake citizen is crippled in the pursuit of his interest if he cannot check his own experience against that of others, whether that interest lies in farming, health, child care, canning, vocational guidance, science, or politics. In a country where we, the people, are the Government, it is necessary that there should be authoritative information available throughout every section of the land. In an era of vast and swift changes it is imperative that the citizens have material to keep abreast of the times.

A great man's words are apt to be timeless. Jefferson once said, "Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppressions of body and mind will vanish like spirits at the dawn of day." That advice stands good today.

Jefferson could not have anticipated the development of the modern library, but, as these quotations clearly indicate, he realized the importance of some such instrument to the maintenance of our liberties and our democratic government. Since in our democracy we insist upon the participation of citizens in the decisions of Government, free and universal library service is essential.

Most of our rural population, however, is without library service, both because they do not know what libraries can do for their welfare and, more important, because they do not know how easily libraries can be made available for them. This lack of knowledge about libraries is also typical of many Congressmen. I am sure that the same situation exists in State legislatures, among county commissioners, and other local officials.

The services of a library should be presented in their most appealing aspects. The bookmobile is an example of a service which you have developed with too little fanfare. To the average person, the idea of bringing books on wheels into every village and into the countryside has an irresistibly romantic appeal. Wherever you have really capitalized upon this appeal, your library extension movement has prospered. I have a picture in my mind of young Abe Lincoln, who walked miles to borrow a book which he chanced to hear that a neighbor had happened to acquire. Think what a resource Lincoln would have found in a bookmobile. There are other Abe Lincolns scattered about the country to whom we must try to obtain this basic means of education.

There are numerous other library services which can be glamorized successfully. Books for the bedridden, story hours for children, great literature for farm boys, the poor man's university, intellectual stimulus for the ambitious, and a host of others, which are real services, can arouse enthusiasm everywhere.

In spite of present conditions, however, it seems to me that there is much reason for optimism in the library picture of the Nation. Your profession has developed techniques for the distribution of books and library services that promise well for the future. The establishment of larger units of service, such as county and regional libraries, in rural areas seems to be an excellent administrative device for solving some problems. The principle of State aid which, I understand, has been established in approximately 20 States is of great importance to rural library service. The bookmobile is a tremendously important technical development. Demonstrations such as those in Illinois and Louisiana will undoubtedly be very effective in facilitating rural library development. Planning for universal library coverage on a State-wide basis such as has occurred in Michigan, Illinois, Maryland, North Carolina, Vermont, and many other States should result in great improvement. The interest in pamphlets, films, discussion groups, work with clubs, etc., should bring new effectiveness to library work.

The library demonstration bill is an effort to help in some of these problems. It is based upon the belief that rural library service has reached such a stage of perfection that it can be demonstrated to the Nation with confidence. It is believed that such a demonstration will be so convincing that people will insist upon a permanent program of rural library service.

Committee on Un-American Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to call attention to a letter, dated June 19, 1946, written by the Civil Rights Congress. This letter is an analysis of the report of activities of the Committee on Un-American Activities, which that committee released last week. It is an analysis of content, under which the report bears up no better than if it were to be subjected to an analysis of its intent. In either case, it is manifestly clear that the aim is to smear progressives, not to investigate subversive activity. The substance of the Civil Rights Congress' letter follows:

CIVIL RIGHTS CONGRESS,
New York, N. Y., June 19, 1946.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The recently issued report of the House Un-American Activities Committee, covering its operations since its establishment as a permanent committee 18 months ago, is a shocking example of the misuse of the prestige of the United States Congress for aims and purposes contrary to the best interests of Congress and the Nation.

Fifty-five pages of a total of seventy-two are devoted to an attack on one relief committee, the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee. The so-called investigation of this committee is used as a reckless platform to assail all foreign-relief agencies, malign the labor movement, and insinuate that all those who support the Government policy of opposition to the Franco regime in Spain are un-American.

A cold examination of the Wood-Rankin report reveals the following:

1. The 72-page report contains exactly one sentence describing the committee's interest in uncovering Fascist activity in America: "The committee is currently engaged in certain research work which may disclose some attempt to revive an organized system of Fascist clubs." (Note in preface.)

2. The sole other references to domestic Fascists are made to assail our Government's movement against subversive activities of Fascists:

(a) The seditionist trial is mocked as a waste of time and money (p. 32).

(b) The orientation course (Army Talk No. 64) which taught the Army to spot the Fascist enemy the whole democratic world was fighting is called "one of the dirtiest blots on the history of the War Department" and "Red poison" (p. 14).

3. The report is absolutely silent on the Ku Klux Klan, which the committee refused to investigate. The report fails to even mention the committee's friendly hearing granted Gerald L. K. Smith, or its praise of Smith, much less mention his name.

4. In contrast to its treatment of Fascists, the committee uses nine pages on its loudly proclaimed investigation of the American Communist Party to create a Red-baiting atmosphere for the balance of the report. The "findings" on the Communist Party turn out to be quotations from published Communist literature between the years of 1918 to 1930 (pp. 4–12) and eight lines on its much-publicized hearing of Communist leaders, which concludes with the astonishing statement that the "Communist Party is the same old party" (p. 13).

5. The section on the Wood-Rankin drive against radio commentators defies analysis. It reflects the method of intimidating radio stations into blocking the air-waves to liberal commentators by the simple expedient of charging Red propaganda and typifies the committee's attempt at thought control.

6. The mass strikes during the past year in steel, auto, electrical, mining, and other industries to win essential economic adjustment of living standards for workers were caused by the communistic element, the report gravely states (p. 9).

7. The Wood-Rankin report in 55 pages purports to show that the relief agency aiding Republican refugees from the fascist Franco government is an un-American organization. In the course of this expose it does the following:

(a) Attacks all private relief agencies operating during the war (p. 23) not only as unnecessary but operated primarily for political purposes. Among the agencies so designated are:

(1) Hadassah, Inc.
(2) American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.
(3) American Field Service.
(4) Ambijan Committee for Emergency Relief to the Soviet Union.
(5) United Palestine Appeal.
(6) American Friends Service Committee, and others.

A majority of the organizations listed are Jewish or sending relief to Russia.

(b) It also attacks the following:

(1) Southern Conference for Human Welfare.
(2) National Council for American-Soviet Friendship.
(3) Russian War Relief.
(4) National Negro Congress.
(5) American Committee for Protection of Foreign-Born, and others.

(c) Scores of individuals who have shown themselves interested in the relief of the democratic people of Spain are recklessly smeared in Gestapo manner through a process of cross-indexing of names appearing on letterheads. By a totality of incredible nonsense, the Spanish relief committee is branded subversive.

(d) By quoting approvingly from those in this country who support the Franco regime, it labels all Americans who oppose Franco (as does the American Government) as Communist and then as un-American or subversive.

GEORGE MARSHALL,
Chairman of the Board.
MILTON KAUFMAN,
Executive Director.

Memo No. 2 for People With Short Memories

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I called the attention of the House to the fact that although it has now been well over 3 weeks since the other body passed President Truman's emergency labor legislation, we have thus far entirely failed to take any action on that important legislation at this end of the Capitol. I know that many of you join with me and a great many other citizens of this Republic in asking the pertinent question, Why this unexpected and unwelcome delay?

Was President Truman wrong in asking for additional authority with which to deal with important labor disturbances? Was the House wrong in following the plea of the majority leader in granting him that authority? Were the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol wrong in passing the legislation? Or is somebody wrong now in delaying final action on the President's bill?

If Congress adjourns for the summer without granting the President the authority he has requested and a new wave of strikes again paralyzes the Nation's economy, who will then be to blame? Where are the brave voices which called for action 3 weeks ago but which now remain silent? Who is it that has invoked this silence? For what reason has it been invoked? Has the $6,000,000 slush fund of the CIO-PAC or Mr. Whitney's multi-million-dollar threat of political reprisals driven our leaders away from the challenge and into political foxholes?

Mr. Speaker, these are significant questions to which the country is entitled to know the answers. On the Republican side of the aisle we can only sit and ponder—who among the Democrats will rise up to provide responsible replies? Who on the Republican side will join in pressing for answers to these questions?

Erosion of Constitutional Landmarks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, June 24 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. CAPPER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Col. O. R. McGuire, of Washington, D. C., as published in the magazine Vital Speeches of the Day, of June 1, 1946. This address, "Erosion of Constitutional Landmarks," was delivered at the annual dinner of the Kansas State Bar Association in Wichita, Kans., May 24, 1946, and contains pertinent remarks on the process of constitutional government.

The Public Printer advises me that the address will make three and one-half pages in the RECORD, and will cost $210.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EROSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL LANDMARKS

(By O. R. McGuire, LL. D.)

One hundred and fifty-nine years ago this day in 1787, 29 men met in Philadelphia for the stated purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, derisively referred to as "that rope of sand." Their first and prophetic act was to unanimously elect the venerated Washington as their presiding officer and provide him with a chair—on the back of which Franklin finally concluded at the close of their labors that there had been painted a rising instead of a setting sun.

The commencement date previously selected for the Convention was May 14, but the delegates were so slow in arriving that it was not until May 25 there was present a quorum from seven States and one, Rhode Island, never did send a delegate to the Convention. A total of 72 men had been offered credentials from the several former Colonies, but so little confidence was there in the prospects of being able to agree upon some better plan of government than the Articles of Confederation that many of the 72 men declined to accept credentials. The greatest number attending the Convention at any one time was 55 members. A saving remnant of 39 remained to complete their labors and to affix their signatures to the great document which immortalized the names of all who signed it, save Washington and Franklin. Each of these two men had theretofore won his title clear to be numbered among the world's immortals.

No more dismal prospects could be conceived than those which confronted the members of the Constitutional Convention. So dismal was the situation that it has become known in history as the critical period. Lawlessness was rampant. Civil insurrection was not merely threatened, it actually existed. Class was arrayed against class and State against State. Money was so worthless that the phrase "not worth a continental" is with us yet. Industry and commerce were all but stilled; unemployment was forcing men to move into the western wilderness. Some of those who had served with Washington in the smoke of numerous battles had sought to make him King of America only to meet with his stern rebuke.

These members of the Convention had been selected by their respective State legislatures and by their acts they proved what representative government—not democracy if you please—could be at its best. Serving without compensation and paying their own expenses, these men labored through the hot summer of Philadelphia and emerged in September with a charter of government which has been characterized as the greatest instrument of government ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

It is well, as we commence the one hundred and sixtieth year under that Constitution, that we here this evening, on the broad plains of Kansas, give some thought to our heritage. Kansas came into existence many years later in a period, too, of turmoil and bloody strife. Here on this soil men of Kansas fought and many of them died with muskets in their hands. They had the courage of their convictions, even unto death. It is from the strength and courage of such men and women that great governments come into existence; that they are preserved for future generations; and that peace, liberty, and prosperity are born and nurtured to fruition—such as you have in Kansas today and which we could have throughout the length and breadth of this great Nation of ours. There were no cowardly and time serving politicans in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and there were none among those pioneer fathers of yours who reclaimed this State from the Indians and decreed that it should be free.

More especially is it fitting that here the people of Kansas should be represented on this anniversary by their priesthood of law, by men whose lives are dedicated to righteousness and justice under law as contrasted with the deviousness of the rule of men in their discretion. Once again this Nation is torn asunder by domestic strife; fellow-Americans are not only permitted, they are encouraged by the law of our Government, to conspire and stop the wheels of industry and commerce unless and until their demands are met, however, unrighteous such demands may be. The robber barons of the middle ages exacted levies from the countryside and on the highways of Europe. Leaders of private organizations in America today exact tribute, with the sanction of the law, interpreted by the Supreme Court may it be said, on the industry and commerce of more than 130,000,000 people.

Taxation has reached such proportions during the past few years, and I am not including the recent war years, as to constitute substantial confiscation of the incomes of many people and their business enterprises—taxation badly referred to as "redistribution of wealth," the implication, which is false, being that the poor receive a share of such redistributed wealth. We even tolerate and encourage pressure group organizations which brazenly threaten with political extinction any public officials who will not do their bidding in taking from those who have and giving to those who have not. By our own acts we have proven the prophecy of Macaulay that in the twentieth century America would be as grievously plundered as was the Roman Empire in the fifth century, with the difference that our Huns and Vandals would be engendered within our own country and by its institutions. So far has this plundering progressed that private enterprise is well on the way to extinction because of the lack of sufficient venture capital.

"Why have we lost our way?" you may well inquire. The short and simple answer is that we have done so because in recent years we have removed the landmarks which the men of 1787 erected to guide us through the years. This in itself is no new phenomenon in the history of government, as was noted by the historian Polybius writing before the dawn of the Christian Era concerning cycles of government.

Lack of time and regard for your patience will not permit me to do more on this occasion than to refer to a few of the landmarks which we in our day have destroyed, unwittingly though such destruction may have been to the vast majority of the American people.

The first and greatest of these destroyed landmarks was the loss of control of the people over the public purse. Such control by the people constitutes their greatest power, without which they are robbed and destroyed by the avarice of their rulers.

The control of the people over the public purse was carefully devised and set up in the Constitution. First, there is the requirement that all money bills must originate in the House of Representatives, elected by the people at regular intervals of 2 years. Second, there is the prohibition against the appropriation of any money for the Army for a period of more than 2 years. Third, there was the prohibition of any direct, or capitation tax on the people unless it be apportioned among the several States on the basis of population. All these were subordinate to, and dependent upon, the law of diminishing returns which insured that there could be no lasting excessive indirect taxes, such as excise and customs taxes, so long as the Federal Government was dependent upon such taxes for the principal part of its revenue. If such taxes became too high, the consumption of imported goods and goods subject to internal excise taxes decreased to the point where less, rather than more, revenue was obtainable from such taxes. Similarly to the law of gravity, this law of diminishing returns is beyond the control of earthly rulers of men.

It is true that under the so-called American system, fathered by Henry Clay of my native State, a political deal was consummated between the New England manufacturing interests and the westerners of that day whereby both supported high taxes on imports in 1832 and both supported internal improvements in the western territories. But South Carolina and John C. Calhoun, who were even then fighting the battles of the farmers—forced to buy in a protected market and forced to sell in world markets—threatened nullification so vigorously that the import taxes were reduced the following year.

We had a direct income tax during the dark days of the War Between the States. The people paid that tax without more than a dissent by Chief Justice Taney to the effect that salaries of the judiciary could not be reduced by taxation while the judges were in office. When an attempt to renew that tax took place, long after the expiration of the emergency in which it was first used, the people resisted. The Supreme Court of the United States upheld that resistance and concluded that such a tax must be apportioned among the States on the basis of population.

Then commenced the struggle of certain groups to not only remove this constitutional landmark but to leave no control of the public purse in the people. The result was the sixteenth amendment. It was adopted in Congress as a result of a political deal between Senator Aldrich and Congressman Payne, on the one hand, and the Democratic leaders of Congress, on the other hand, that if enough Democratic votes were cast to insure the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, enough Republican votes would be cast to insure the submission for ratification of the income tax amendment.

The debates in the Senate and House of Representatives on this amendment were primarily concerned with whether it would not be better for the Congress to require ratification of the amendment in State conventions rather than by the State legislatures. It was feared by some that if the latter method was adopted, the amendment would receive less than the required number of approvals by State legislatures. There was absolutely no discussion, and apparently no thought, on the part of the participants in these debates that increased revenues derived from unlimited income and inheritance taxes would lead to present-day results of loss of rights by the people to local self-government; of the growth of a bureaucracy so large and arrogant that its counterpart has never been known, not even in bureaucracy-ridden France immediately prior to the French revolution; of the so-called redistribution of wealth, but which I prefer to term destruction of the accumulated savings of 150 years with its coincidental destruction of our system of private enterprise; and of the many other ills due to excessive revenue in the hands of politicians in control of the Federal Government, constituting a source of avarciousness on the part of pressure groups seeking something for nothing. Incidentally, we have engaged in two European wars since the ratification of the sixteenth amendment in 1913; we have loaned billions to European nations; and it now seems that we have been committed to loan many more billions to foreign nations.

Strange to relate, I have been unable to find any record in the proceedings of the State legislatures ratifying the amendment of any intelligent discussion of these potential dangers to America which would result from the loss of control by the people over the public money power. Even retired Chief Justice Hughes, then Governor of New York, in a message to the New York Legislature recommending against ratification, limited his objections to the possibility that income on securities issued by State and local subdivisions of government might be subject to taxation. Not one voice was lifted in warning to the people that this sixteenth amendment, with no ceiling whatever on the rates of taxes which the politicians could take from incomes or from estates of decedents, was not only completely destroying the greatest of landmarks in the Constitution of the United States but was, in effect, reducing the people to a state of serfdom, with their Government as lord and master for which they must work without pay for several days each week.

When men must pay from one-third to three-fourths of all they earn for Federal taxes alone, much of the incentive to progress is destroyed in the people most needed. To this extent, only, does there operate the law of diminishing returns on income and inheritance taxes but people avowedly intent upon destroying the more prosperous classes of our citizens, with the mob shouting at their heels, have no regard whatever to a falling off of revenue due to excessive direct taxes.

It is difficult to believe that the inheritors of the carefully devised Constitution of the United States could have been so blind as to surrender themselves, their properties, and their earning capacities into the hands of their politicians and into the hands of an uncontrolled and largely uncontrollable bureaucracy, apparently without a word of recorded protest. But they did. The legal profession signally failed to warn the people. Whether the people will ever be able to extricate themselves from their present predicament in this respect remains to be seen.

The second great landmark for the protection of human rights and liberties, erected in the Constitution, has to do with the enforcement of justice between the citizen or resident, on the one hand, and our Government on the other. The Constitution wisely prohibited all bills of attainder and all ex post facto laws. It also provided that the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. There is also the prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures and the prohibition against any person being held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; the prohibition against any person being deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and the guarantee that the accused shall enjoy a right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury, of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed.

True it is that these are guarantees, or landmarks, for the people of this country. They were intended as a measure of protection against officials of our Government. In no other form of government are such guarantees found—beyond the reach of the executive and legislative powers—for the protection of the life, liberty, and property of the individual. Do these guarantees contemplate that high officials of the United States, including an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and a judge of one of its circuit courts of appeals shall descend from their benches and attempt to take the life and liberty of the citizens of a foreign country in a specially constituted tribunal of the victors sitting in that country?

I would have it clearly understood that I am concerned with the present plight of the Germans or Japs charged with war crimes only to the extent that principles, practices, and procedures in that so-called trial may be used here to break down our constitutional guaranties and to rob the courts of their independence.

There is abroad in this land a doctrine which I utterly reject that the law is whatever the judges say it is. Not so long ago we had a determined assault made upon the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, none of whom are now on the bench, because it was claimed by the representatives of the political party in power that these Judges were misinterpreting the constitutional authority of the Executive and of the Congress. An attempt was made to dilute the Supreme Court by packing it with sufficient Justices holding to the ideologies of those in executive power as to overcome adverse decisions rendered by that Court. Thanks to the men in Congress, who placed principle above party, that attempt was beaten down, but through the lapse of time and the infirmities of human life the Supreme Court has been restaffed since that battle was won. Since the restaffing, to the extent of a majority, all lawyers know what has happened to lines of authority in the Supreme Court, represented by decisions written by experienced and able men, existing over long periods of time. No lawyer of today, however capable and experienced, is able to advise the people with certainty what may be the decision of a majority of that Court in a particular case involving constitutional questions, economic questions, labor questions, or, indeed, any question where the issue is drawn between the citizen any the power of the United States Government. I make no attack upon the Associate Justice of that Court now in Europe. I count him among my personal friends, but I may not forget that he was one of the officials of the United States who appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of the Court packing plan.

That there is an attempt in some quarters to condition the legal profession of the United States for the acceptance of what is now being done in Germany and Japan is evidenced by the fact that two of the chief officials of the American Bar Association were invited to visit, with their expenses paid, the so-called trial now on in Germany, and spend some time as observers of that proceeding wherein two judges of our great courts and a vast number of lawyers of the American bar are active participants. These American Bar Association officials accepted that invitation.

I make no claim that a judicial precedent once established should be accepted as inviolable or that judges of our high courts should become monks. Yet where precedents involve statutory constructions, they should stand until the legislative body changes the statutes. The rules should not be changed for or against any party while the game is being played. If precedents involve constitutional constructions, they should be permitted to stand until the Constitution is changed in the constitutional manner, unless the precedents are clearly wrong. It cannot be said that such precedents are clearly wrong when the court divides five to four or three to five in overturning them.

If we once openly reach that point in American judicial history when men may be tried and convicted for the violation of a law which does not exist, except in the fertile imagination of an astute prosecutor, or if judges may change from judges to prosecutors and back again, as a chameleon does its colors, another landmark of our Constitution will have been as completely destroyed as the one I have heretofore mentioned with respect to the control over the public money power. Now that he is gone, I am at liberty to reveal that Chief Justice Stone expressed surprise in a letter which I have in my possession that the legal profession had given so little attention to the practice of some judges to engage in other than the duties of their offices.

Searches and seizures are being made almost daily without warrants required by the Constitution. It is invariably claimed that these searches and seizures are incidental to the arrests and in the presence of the prisoners, therefore legally made. Only too frequently the prisoner is unable to establish to the satisfaction of the court, against the testimony of the arresting officers, that the claim is wholly unfounded; that his books and papers were ransacked against his consent. This shows a callous disregard by Government men for the rights of the citizen which is dangerous to the extreme.

Men and women, too, are being arrested and transported to Washington for trial in the District of Columbia, hundreds of miles away from their homes, and before juries made up in considerable part of employees of the United States Government, for alleged violation of some statute. Government employees have been made eligible by statute to serve on both petit and grand juries in the District of Columbia. The Supreme Court of the United States has upheld that statute. Jurisdiction in such cases is claimed on the ground that some letter or newspaper article written by the accused was received in the District of Columbia and that the crime was therefore committed in said District. Such a claim of the Government, too, has been upheld by the court of last resort. Most of you are familiar with newspaper accounts of the abortive mass sedition trial in the District of Columbia, involving codefendants from many States of the Union.

It is now seriously claimed by the Government, and the claim has been upheld by at least one circuit court of appeals, that it constitutes due process of law for a Federal Statute to limit review to an executive agency of an administrative order issued by an executive official of Government against a citizen requiring him to pay money to that government. It was held in this circuit court of appeals case, and there is more than a hint to the same effect in a recent opinion of the Supreme Court that the possibility of a review in The United States Tax Court constitutes due process and that the citizen cannot raise any questions of alleged fact determined by such an executive order in a constitutional court.

I have not time to pursue this matter further but I have indicated sufficient to convince myself that the landmarks of justice established in the Constitution are under attack from many quarters and that as usual the citizen is losing the fight. He will continue to lose unless the organized legal profession demands in no uncertain tones that the law shall be applied by judges who have surrendered themselves entirely to the dispensing of justice on the benches to which they have been appointed; that the constitutional guaranties of justice shall be applied in the exact terms in which they are in the Constitution; that there shall never be permitted to arise any question as to the fairness and unbiased attitude of both grand and petit juries in criminal cases; and that no technical question as to the receipt of a letter or writing in one jurisdiction shall be permitted to justify trial in that jurisdiction rather than in the one where the letter or article was written and the accused resides. In addition, we should demand of our courts that they cease confusing themselves with either constitutional conventions or legislatures and that where there are decided cases, not clearly wrong, they shall be applied until the Constitution or statutes are changed in the manner provided by law. The courts were created to interpret and apply the law not to create it.

The third and last landmark erected in the Constitution with which I shall burden your patience, is that which declares that Congress shall have power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In our consideration of this landmark for a few moments, we may disregard the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and with the Indian tribes, directing our attention to the power of Congress to regulate commerce "among the several States"—not within the several States.

This constitutional power has been so interpreted by the Congress and the courts, within the past 15 years, as to destroy all distinction between intrastate commerce and interstate commerce save in a few minor instances of no consequence whatever on the stream of interstate commerce. Instead of regulation of commerce among the several States, which are themselves independent sovereignties except to the extent governmental power has been expressly or impliedly delegated to the central government, Congress and the courts are regulating commerce in the several States contrary to the fundamental basis of our constitutional system that the central government was created by representatives of the States to function in matters common to two or more States, which they could not themselves adjust. We have even gone so far as to establish by Federal statute the common minimum rates of wages and hours of work which must be observed by all employers of labor and all laborers in every State of the Union, diverse as their conditions may be, where the activities of the employees even indirectly affect commerce among the several States.

At this session of the Supreme Court of the United States, it has held, for instance, despite the language of the commerce clause of the Constitution and prior decisions of that Court that employees washing the windows of an office building or repairing electric motors for customers in the same State are engaged in producing goods for commerce because the building was occupied in substantial part by a manufacturer of goods for interstate commerce or the repaired motors were used by such manufacturer in the production of goods for interstate commerce. Be it noted that none of the employees in question were employees of the manufacturer or worked on the goods going into interstate commerce.

Commencing many years ago with the Shreveport case in the Supreme Court holding that lower intrastate rates were illegal because they adversely affected interstate rates on railroads, we persuaded ourselves to believe that an intrastate matter had to directly affect or burden interstate commerce but apparently we no longer have to resort to any such conclusion. It seems to be enough if the intrastate activity even remotely relates to a business which itself has some part in interstate transaction.

There may be differences of opinion whether the Supreme Court, from case to case, may finally piece out a new rule whereby all reasonably important intrastate activities, such as manufacturing, repairing, etc., may be regulated by the United States Government or whether it would not have been better to have had a carefully drafted constitutional amendment establishing the rule. There may even be differences of opinion whether local self-government should not supply all of the regulation and control over intrastate activities unless they directly burden interstate commerce as in the Shreveport case. But whatever may be the differences of these opinions as to the desirability of the Federal Government regulating commerce and trade within a State instead of among the States, I am convinced that no court has the jurisdiction to constitute itself, in effect, a constitutional convention for the purpose of rewriting the Constitution of the United States in any respect whatsoever and more particularly where to do so destroys the balance of power between the States and the central government and thereby destroys the right of local self-government.

By means of this power the Federal Government may not only regulate and control all industry having interstate aspects to any reasonable degree but that government may likewise regulate and control the hours and rates of wages of workmen and the daily lives of the people. Any such power is equally dangerous to the employees and employers. The possibilities of the loss of local self-government with corresponding gain by the Federal Government are limitless and may embrace the entire economic well-being of the people. Whether this is required under present social and economic conditions is not the question. It is rather whether the Federal Government shall exercise that power without any standards being erected for the protection of the people from a relentless, often stupid and always self-serving bureaucracy.

The instances I have mentioned, and others of almost equal importance could be mentioned, are not only encroachments upon, and disregard of, the fundamental principles of government. No, my friends of Kansas, the matter goes far deeper than that. The destruction of the landmarks of the Constitution constitutes assaults against the three great pillars of government, pillars which distinguish our form of the "social compact" from that now existing or which has existed since recorded history began. These three pillars are the glory of our American institutions and are the chart of what we love to call the "American way of life."

The first of these pillars of the Constitution is the independent sovereign States, joined together in a union to act only where the common interests of all must necessarily be represented. The second great pillar is the protection of the individual, of whatever race, color, or creed, even in a contest with the Government itself. That pillar is based upon the inalienable and indestructible rights of the individual or of a minority upon which the majority may not encroach, even with the aid of government. The third great pillar, and the crowning glory of the Constitution, is the independence of the judiciary—a scheme of government by which any intrusion upon the rights of the 48 States as against the Federal Government, and the rights of the individual as against any one of the 48 States or the Federal Government, may be determined and protected, not by either of the parties interested, but by an impartial body holding the balance true for right and justice under written law—a pillar of government which makes this a "government of laws and not of men."

This constant hacking away at the massive pillars erected to support the structure of our American Government; this changing of the rules while the game is in progress, until no rules remain upon which we may rely; this removing of the landmarks or guideposts of liberty under law; this destruction of the confidence of the people in men set apart whose sole and only business is justice under law—these constitute the great dangers which confront Government in America, the only beacon light of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in a world of darkness and despair. If once these insidious influences break the morale of our people, the end of government under law is in sight.

May I conclude by saying that the sincere and devoted patriots who framed the Constitution were not seeking merely the best architectural plan to house the principles of government they wanted to establish for themselves and posterity. No. They searched their hearts and consciences for the best way to guard those principles of government against influences, from within or without, that might weaken or destroy them. Hence the checks and balances, the landmarks, the three pillars of government which I have named. These were not clever designs. They were and are necessary fundamentals to the attainment of that goal which seemed ever in their minds—to secure the blessings of liberty for themselves and their posterity. Last, but not least, the principle of self-government must be an integral part of human brotherhood; the spirit of liberty under law must be supported by the spirit of religion because a republican system of government is based upon individual responsibility to both God and man.

Congregational Churches Back President's Legislative Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it has been almost a year since the President first sent to us his legislative program embracing 21 points; and since that time he has transmitted various messages recommending further enactments. What we have done to that carefully considered program I will not describe; but it is interesting to me to note in the Chicago Sun of June 23 an article which tells of the endorsement of many of the key points in the President's program by the General Council of the Congregational Christian Churches of America in meeting at Grinnell, Iowa.

I am inserting a portion of the news report in the RECORD, that Members may be informed, as follows:

CHURCH GROUP BACKS PRICE CONTROLS, MINIMUM WAGE, PERMANENT FEPC

(By James O. Supple)

GRINNELL, IOWA, June 22.—A program of liberal social action, including approval of price control, annual minimum wages, and public housing was adopted here by the General Council of the Congregational Christian Churches with only 4 or 5 of the 1,000 delegates dissenting.

The assembly also passed a report on world order which included limitation of American sovereignty to help functioning of the United Nations, extension of relief and credit to war-stricken countries, and the increasing of the number of Jewish refugees to be admitted to the United States.

REPORT PRESENTED

Dr. Francis McPeek, of Washington, D. C., chairman of the legislative committee of the denomination's social action division, presented the report on domestic issues.

The general council approved the entire program including the following recommendations:

"1. In periods of recognized economic emergency the Federal Government should provide adequate controls for all prices, especially of food, clothing, and rentals; and also wages as they relate to these prices.

"2. We favor further experimentation with guaranteed annual wages as developed in several industries. * * * An annual wage for workers in gainful employment and an annual income for every family in acccordance with its needs is imperative for the protection of individual and family welfare."

HASTY LAWS OPPOSED

"3. We oppose hasty legislation which places special controls on labor or management. Instead, we favor a vigorous attack on the economic conditions which are the root causes of industrial strife and conflict.

"4. We commend the President's proposal for the appointment of a joint congressional commission to study the entire field of labor-management relations to propose legislative reforms.

"5. We recommend the establishment of an adequate comprehensive national development and housing policy. We specifically endorse public housing as a method, within the frame of the capitalistic economy, of achieving the aforesaid policy."

FEPC SUPPORT VOICED

"6. We reaffirm our support of legislation constituting a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission.

"7. We urge legislation designed to provide medical services for all people through the cooperation of civic, professional, and other agencies, including the Government.

"8. Existing Social Security provisions should be extended to include the self-employed, domestics, agricultural workers, lay employees of religious, charitable, or any other institutions not already covered by Social Security or some other adequate pension plan."

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD several editorials dealing with the subject of the reorganization of Congress. One editorial is from the Detroit Free Press, one from the Kalamazoo (Mich.) Gazette, and there are several others.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit (Mich.) Free Press of June 12, 1946]

CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

Upon the adequacy of its parliament rests the life of a republic.

Increasingly, the Congress of the United States has been losing the faith and acquiring the derision of the Nation.

The easy thing is to blame the individual Senator and Representative. And it is true that under the Capitol dome are some extremely sorry political specimens.

However, the fundamental fault lies not in the individuals, but in the cumbersome, outmoded nature of the legislative machinery with which they must do their jobs. The best men who serve in the two Houses are meagerly effective against the archaic methods therein retained.

In passing a bill for the reorganization of Congress, the Senate has taken an encouraging step toward preservation of our system of government.

There will be argument that the measure could have gone further. Real reform, however, is rarely swift and sweeping. The change that is too radical breeds too much opposition for probability of acceptance.

As it is, the House's adoption of all the Senate bill's provisions is still far from certain. For one thing, the proposed pay increase may encounter selfish challenge. At present, the House Members receive a $2,500 expense allowance (not paid Senators) that is tax free.

This allowance may look more attractive than a taxable $5,000 salary increase.

Also, the lobby groups can be expected to exert all the great pressure at their command to induce the House to throw out a requirement that lobbyists be registered.

The most constructive of the Senate's streamlining stipulations is reduction of standing committees from 33 to 15, with the added restriction that no Senator may serve on more than two.

That the Senators refused to accept civil service assistants in lieu of their own appointees is no detriment. A good deal of a legislator's ability to perform satisfactorily depends on the personal loyalty of his immediate aides.

The Senate did well in its framing of the bill. The people can find real hope for a stronger government in its 49 to 16 passage.

And they will serve their own best interests if they let the House know that a favorible vote is wanted there.

[From the Kalamazoo (Mich.) Gazette of June 12, 1946]

OVER ONE HURDLE

It appears that the "expert" forecasters of congressional sentiment have been thrown for a loss. By a vote of 49 to 16 the supposedly tradition-bound Senate has approved a tradition-shattering measure to reorganize the Nation's lawmaking establishment in the interests of modernization and efficiency.

True, the bill thus approved does contain certain provisions which any Member of our Federal Legislature might well find attractive. It proposes to boost the pay of Congressmen by 50 percent, increase the amount of the technical and administrative aid allowed the lawmakers, and establish a pension system for the Senators and Representatives. But it would also do certain other things which the typical Congressman, particularly if a Member of the Upper House, might not be expected to like. By reducing the number of standing committees, for example, it would reduce the number of committee chairmanships which are supposed to mean so much in terms of prestige.

Maybe the "experts" have been overestimating that prestige item. Or maybe most of the Senators have concluded that any loss of prestige the bill might cause them would be more than offset by the favorable innovations. Anyway, the country as a whole may be glad to see that a measure for "streamlining" its National Legislature in the interests of efficient lawmaking and up-to-date organization has surmounted its first and probably most serious hurdle. The prevailing opinion seems to be that, having won such quick and emphatic Senate approval, the bill won't encounter much difficulty in the House of Representatives.

STEP TOWARD REFORM

Passage in the Senate of the La Follette-Monroney bill is an encouraging step toward improvement of congressional procedure and organization.

The bill is by no means perfect. It does nothing about the deadening seniority system. But if it did, it would be doomed. Facing realities, the bill's sponsors have included as much as they could reasonably hope to get at this time. The rest must wait.

The most important improvements are that it reduces the number of committees, defines the provinces of committees more clearly, prevents the attachment of riders to appropriation bills, and increases the salary of Congressmen from $10,000 to $15,000. Conceivably, this pay boost may attract better men to Congress, although at the rate the cost of living is now going up, it may only keep Congressmen abreast with rising expenses. At any rate, the higher pay is justified.

Both Democrats and Republicans joined in passing the bill through the Senate. Members of the House will show their wisdom by giving it similar bipartisan support.

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer of June 12, 1946]

STREAMLINING CONGRESS

In the bill passed on Monday the Senate made an admirable beginning in remodeling congressional machinery. Not every improvement wished for is contained in the Senate blueprint—at the last moment old-guard southern Democrats rescued their patronage in appointment of Capitol employees, for example—but so much of real merit is included that the House will be culpable if it fails to go along.

Many students of government have examined the workings of Congress with an eye to changes in procedure. A plan which attracted wide attention in recent months was prepared by Robert Heller of Cleveland, and his recommendations are to a degree embodied in the Senate bill, which was managed on the floor by Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Heller and others have called for reduction in the number of standing committees. There are 33 in the Senate, and the bill cuts them to 15. In the House there are 47. If the House adopts the measure, it will mark the first important change in committee structure in more than half a century.

This is particularly important. At present there is overlapping of authority growing out of the multiplicity of committees and a resultant confusion and slow-down in legislative procedure. The time and energy of Members are spread out too far.

With a fewer number of committees, duplication of effort can be eliminated. By providing adequate staffs of professional assistants, more work can be done and Members of Congress will be in a position to keep in closer touch with what is going on and have the time for digesting the reports of assistants.

We hope that the House does not shy away in an election year from raising congressional salaries. The Senate bill provides for an increase from $10,000 to $15,000, and a pension. We do not believe that reasonable voters will disapprove. The expenses which inevitably go along with public life together with the uncertainty of tenure of office actually reduce the true amount of the salary, and nothing less than $15,000 will attract the best talent.

The pension is also justified, as in general the men who go to Washington give up the most productive years of their life for Government service. There was a time when they were owners of rich farms which produced crops as usual in their absence, and which awaited their return when public service was ended. Unfortunately, most Congressmen must provide for their old age out of salary savings.

[From the Illinois State Journal, Springfield, Ill., of June 12, 1946]

CONGRESSIONAL STREAMLINING

Members of the Senate have in overwhelming majority indicated their desire to streamline the functions of Congress to cope with modern demands, and have sent the measure along to the House for a vote. This action on the part of the Senate culminates many months of committee hearings and executive sessions.

With the growing interest of constituents in Washington affairs, Congressmen have come to find themselves little more than errand boys on issues which arouse public sentiment and send deluges of telegrams into the District of Columbia.

The appointment of an executive aide by each lawmaker will remove many such important but tedious tasks from the minds of those who must think on high and uncluttered levels if they are to vote intelligently and have time to press their own particular programs.

In order to attract and hold men of high caliber in public office it is necessary to pay them enough money to live in comfort while maintaining two residences and meeting unusual living expenses.

In voting to merge many committees and eliminate others, Congressmen have taken a bold step in lessening traditional prestige. Concentration of power in the hands of fewer committeemen is a tendency demanded by the urgency of the times, but one which must be watched even more closely because of the increased likelihood of political cabal.

Congress during its current session has shown the strain of working under the harassing weight of excess red tape and reluctant committees. The provision of the streamlining bill allowing each of the consolidated committees to hire four experts is a step forward in lessening the impact of lobbyists, who often present the bulk of facts heard on some measures. Facts presented by lobbyists are too often drawn up to show special rather than general needs for legislation.

Criticized by some opponents for lessening party division, the bill as passed by the Senate actually heightens the barriers between majority and minority by creating majority and minority committees of seven members each in both the Senate and House of Representatives. Majority policy committeemen would be members of a joint legislative-executive council, charged with promoting teamwork between the White House and Congress.

Provisions of the legislation would flush into the open hearings on appropriations bills which have been considered in closed committees for years.

All in all, the legislation is sure to relieve considerable pressure from incumbent Congressmen, and should attract more men of higher caliber than those drawn to public service by the present system of meager rewards.

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal of June 12, 1946]

NOW IT IS UP TO THE HOUSE

The Senate has passed the congressional reorganization bill by a vote of 49 to 16. This most important measure is now up to the House.

Students of American Government have long recognized that one of the major reasons for confusion and delay and general lack of efficiency in the legislative branch is the antiquated machinery of the two Houses. There are too many committees, Congressmen, and Senators do not have competent advisers, they now spend too much of their time attending to nonlegislative details of their offices.

A joint committee of the House and Senate worked out a comprehensive program to remedy these defects. It also proposed an increase in pay for Congressmen from $10,000 to $15,000 annually.

Anticipation that Senators, greedy for traditional patronage and power, would scuttle the proposals were groundless. The debate revealed a growing awareness that the congressional machinery must be modernized to meet the demands of the age. The Senate did make changes but did not destroy the basic purposes of the bill.

It will be a great victory for good government if the House approves the reorganization program. It should be done before Congress adjourns this summer.

[From the Indianapolis (Ind.) News]

A STREAMLINED CONGRESS

Paying little heed, apparently, to Capitol Hill observers who had expected no such decisive action, the Senate has passed and sent on to the House a bill which would modernize the machinery of Congress and enable its Members to cope with their increasingly complex burdens. The vote was 49–16. This is the much-talked-of measure which would reorganize Congress, reduce the number of standing committees to a workable figure and supply Congressmen with expert technical and administrative assistance. Also, as passed by the upper House, the pay of Senators would be raised from $10,000 to $15,000 annually and each would be permitted to hire an $8,000-a-year assistant.

It appears now that there may be a chance of the measure becoming law during this congressional session, although consideration of the bill has not yet been scheduled in the House. Should these proposals be enacted, there is every reason to believe that both Congress and the people would benefit. At no time in the history of the Nation, perhaps, have cold, unbiased, statistical facts been so needed by the men who make our laws. And yet, under the present system, a legislator may be obliged to serve on so many committees and to so spread his efforts among several duties that a great deal of legislation must be passed without any clear understanding of it by the men who vote on it. Less committee duty and expanded technical fact-finding services would seem to go a long way toward easing the burden.

On the matter of pay, the President has urged Congress to increase its salaries and though Congressmen show a tendency to shy from such matters when they think of elections coming up, no serious protests arose from the country after Mr. Truman's recommendation. We expect and demand the highest caliber of work from our representatives in Washington and there is no reason why we shouldn't pay a fair and prevailing price for it.

The Famous Thirty-second Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the record established by the Thirty-second Division in World War II will forever stand as a epic to the valor and bravery of those citizen soldiers from the States of Michigan and Wisconsin who gave so unselfishly in defeating the Japs in the Southwest Pacific theater. These men carried on the traditions of their gallant forefathers of that famous Iron Brigade who served with such distinction in the Civil War. Likewise it was their fathers who again demonstrated the fighting qualities of the midwestern civilian who helped to dethrone the Kaiser and obliterate the German Army on the western front in World War I.

Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor to have served as a member of that famous Thirty-second Division in the Red Arrow Division and however great was the sacrifices by my comrades in that war they in no way equaled the daring and heroism of our sons who fought in the Southwest Pacific.

Mr. Speaker, my friend and colleague, Hon. JOHN BYRNES, of Wisconsin, very fittingly delivered an address at a dinner on June 15 given by the city of Appleton in honor of the men of that city who served with the Thirty-second Division. His remarks are most timely and under permission to extend I insert herewith his address:

There is no better way to pay tribute to the men of the Red Arrow Division than to retell the story of its actions in the Second World War. That story is an unparalleled record of privation, sacrifice and heroism and is one which cannot fail to stir the hearts of all who believe in honor, courage and valor.

There are men here—veterans of the One hundred and Twenty-seventh Infantry Regiment and of other units of the Thirty-second Division—who were intimately concerned with the writing of that story, and they are the ones who should really tell it. As one who watched its outlines unfold from afar, it is perhaps presumptuous of me to infringe upon their right, but I speak only in the hope of adding new meaning to those years which they so selflessly sacrificed for the greater glory of our State and Nation.

Their memories of the Thirty-second Division are compounded of different stuff than are the memories of those of us who followed their progress during the dark war years. As they moved relentlessly from Australia to the shores of Japan, we only read the headlines of victory. They were more interested in the footnotes of reality—the unglorified details of mud and rain, of endless days and nights, of courage and fear, and of bullets and death.

I address myself to those men in the hope that I can somehow translate those footnotes into a volume of greater perspective—that I can impress upon them that the record of those long years insures for the Red Arrow Division a permanent place in the ranks of history's great combat outfits.

As you slogged in the mud of Camp Beauregard during the confused days before Pearl Harbor, you men of the Thirty-second were dimly aware of the traditions of your division. You knew that, in the First World War, it was one of the first American divisions in action and one of the last out. You knew that it had broken the Hindenburg line, acquiring the name "The Terrible Ones," and you knew the meaning of its proud boast, "the Red Arrow pierces every line."

I doubt, however, that any of you, as you drilled and maneuvered, guessed how closely that history was soon to repeat itself, how gloriously you were to add to that list of "firsts," and how your nickname and confident boast were to take on a new meaning against a fanatical foe. In those days you had little time to concern yourselves with destiny.

Perhaps, similarly, 4 months after Pearl Harbor, you were too busy with the petty details of shipboard life to realize that the Red Arrow had once again been chosen to spearhead the attack against the enemy. You were too involved with unloading ship and making camp in Australia to care much about the honor of being one of the first complete divisions to be sent overseas.

In that fateful fall of 1942, as the Jap advanced on Port Moresby, the business of stripping your packs, dyeing your fatigues, and sharpening your bayonets gave you little time to realize that you were soon to be the first complete battle units to be flown into action and one of the first Army divisions to go on the offensive anywhere in the vast theater of the Second World War.

While you fought in the malaria-ridden swamps of Buna and Sanananda, you had little time to realize that you were setting a pattern in jungle fighting that was to guide another million American troops who followed you for the next 3 years. Nor could you know how the news of your final victory dispelled forever the theory of Japanese invincibility and how it raised new hope in the hearts of Americans everywhere.

As you fought in the thankless and little-publicized battles at Saidor (Sidor) and Aitape (Ita'pee), you were too busy staying alive to appreciate that General MacArthur, who called you his "first team," had chosen you to initiate his now famous hopping strategy and had picked you to contain the entire Japanese Eighteenth Army while the great advance base at Hollandia was being built in preparation for the Philippine invasion. The war became too hot on the Drinumor (drin-yah-mor) and you were too busy killing Japs to know that you were crushing the last Jap hope of breaking out of New Guinea by decimating two of his proudest divisions.

Again, on Leyte, the rain, the mud, and the Jap spider holes demanded all of your attention, but when the fighting was finished, GHQ and the War Department knew that you had broken another Yamashita line and had exterminated the famous Japanese Imperial First Division. They knew, too, that in winning this battle, it was you who, in effect, won the battle of the Philippines because it was on Leyte that the Jap had chosen to make his most vicious stand.

Luzon, to you, meant dodging Jap shells and fighting your way into the clouds along the precipitous Villa Verde trail. To the world, it meant the beginning of the end of the Japanese dream.

You deemed it a doubtful privilege, then, but it was a token of the high regard in which you were held that, even while you were cornering the last of the enemy on Luzon, preparations were going ahead for the Red Arrow to take part in the final assault upon Japan itself.

It was a just fate that paid fitting tribute to the division when the symbol of Japanese aggression—Yamashita himself—handed over his sword to the troops of the Thirty-second, thus bringing to a close your three long years of struggle in those steaming islands.

My hope tonight is that you who were members of the Red Arrow Division will forever carry in your hearts a deep feeling of pride for having served with a division whose record is unsurpassed in the long annals of conflict. I hope, too, that your memories of those long and arduous days across the seas will fuse themselves into the memorable satisfaction of an impossible job magnificently done.

For myself, I can think of no finer tribute to pay a man than to say of him,

"He fought with the Thirty-second Division."

By the same token, there has been no finer tribute paid to you, the State of Wisconsin and its many communities than now to have the Thirty-second Division—the symbol of our participation in the war—assigned permanently as a Wisconsin unit. It evolves now upon us, the citizens of the State, to help perpetuate the traditions of that great unit so that it may ever serve as a permanent reminder of the unselfish sacrifices its members made for us in the name of freedom, justice, and humanity.

The Pullman Racket

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the June 25 issue of the Washington Post:

PULLMAN RACKET

Within a few days the Pullman Co. intends to request the Interstate Commerce Commission to impose restrictions on refunds for unused Pullman space. We sincerely hope the Commission will give this request favorable consideration. For the present practice of making 100-percent refunds for canceled reservations up to train time gives rise to serious abuses. The first type of abuse is one for which the system, not the public, is chiefly to blame. Since no penalty attaches to a last-minute change of plans, space is often reserved on the off chance that it will be needed. Blocks of Pullman space are also acquired by hotels, travel agencies, and corporations weeks in advance for the accommodation of customers and employees. If the tickets are not disposed of, they can be redeemed at the last minute without loss of a single dime.

The second type of abuse has assumed the proportions of a major racket on some lines. That is the practice of buying Pullman space for speculative resale at a profit. Unlike most rackets, this one is absolutely riskless since tickets not sold can be turned in. The net result of the present methods of reserving space in sleeping cars is that trains frequently depart with plenty of empty berths, leaving some disappointed travelers behind, while others find places to lay their heads only by paying outrageous premiums to black market ticket dealers. What's more the railroads lose revenue and incur the ill will of the traveling public.

To remedy this situation to some extent the Pullman Co. suggests that cancelations of space should be required a day before departure in order to get a refund. Otherwise refunds would be made only if the space were resold. Although such restrictions would put a crimp in speculative activity and ease the situation caused by advance booking, we doubt whether it would be sufficiently drastic to meet the needs of the case.

For a long time the Chesapeake & Ohio has been conducting a campaign to reform methods of disposing of sleeping-car reservations. Its proposals are much more drastic, but they strike at the heart of the evil and, in our opinion, have much to commend them. The C. & O. advocates a forfeiture of 25 percent on tickets not canceled within a reasonable time and abandonment of all block sales of sleeping-car space. The forfeiture plan might work some undeserved hardship, and possibly the 25 percent penalty is too high. But it would be a very decisive check on black-market operations in which, according to the C. & O., some railroad and Pullman employees are directly involved. Moreover, it would not prevent hotels and business houses from reserving space as heretofore, although reservations would have to be made in the name of individual passengers, and would be nontransferable.

With summer travel getting into full swing, any changes that seem feasible ought to be made promptly. For the present loose system is an imposition upon the traveling public as well as a source of trouble and financial loss to the roads that should not be longer tolerated.

Nathaniel Stevens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a very excellent eulogy on the life of a great man, Nathaniel Stevens. The editorial appeared in the Lawrence Sunday Sun, Lawrence, Mass., on June 23, 1946:

A COMMUNITY LOSS

In the passing of Nathaniel Stevens, Greater Lawrence has lost not only an outstanding business leader, but a man of whom the entire community felt proud. His loss will leave a void which will not easily be filled.

It sometimes seems as if the age in which we live is lacking somehow in those qualities necessary to produce men who stand out above the crowd as greater than the ordinary run of mankind. The rush of modern life with its scientific and mechanical marvels and trivial amusements fails to develop character above the average and commonplace pattern.

Nathaniel Stevens was an example of a leader of the old school. The stature of these men was not measured by their wealth, their power, or their business success. The qualities that made them respected in their communities were those qualities which man has always honored in his fellow man. Simplicity, integrity, and nobility of character were the traits which marked these men. But not these alone were enough. Combined with them was the innate courtesy of the true gentleman to win the love and esteem of all those who came to know them.

In any tribute to the memory of Nathaniel Stevens it is not necessary to recite his long record of achievements in the textile field. They are only too well known. The M. T. Stevens & Sons Co. stands as a monument to his career. It is one of the few large businesses which expanded and developed as essentially a family concern during the era when industry was becoming a network of vast corporations. It is worthy of note, however, that in spite of his far-reaching business activities, his interests still centered in the town of North Andover.

It is regrettable that Greater Lawrence has not more men of the quality of Nathaniel Stevens.

Worker's Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. MAY
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, one of the most inspiring statements I have seen in many months was a press release by our former colleague, "the gentleman from Indiana," Mr. Samuel B. Pettengill, a truly great American, who rendered his country a great service while a Member of this House. I am not including the article verbatim, but in substance, in my remarks.

When I hear talk about a "worker's republic" I rise up and place in nomination the United States of America. Where and when have workers ever had a better republic than this home-grown one of ours? Where on God's footstool have so many people, for so many generations, had a better chance?

Talk about workmen. Five of our Presidents were born in a log cabin; five were sons of farmers, including the present President; three the sons of artisans or mechanics; three the sons of country pastors. One was past 21 years of age before he could read or write.

Here on American soil rail-splitters have turned into Presidents; privates into generals; gobs into admirals; shoemakers into Senators; newsboys into Governors.

Yes, a worker's republic. A little hunchback immigrant boy by the name of Steinmetz became an electrical wizard; another, Pupin, a 6-year-old stowaway landing on America without a dime or a friend, became a great scientist; Karl Schurz, refugee from Prussian tyranny, became a general, a Senator, and a member of a President's Cabinet; Knute Rockne, brought here when 2 years old, became America's greatest football coach; Bill Knudsen, another immigrant, landed on American shores a penniless boy at the age of 14, and yet he became a big man in the biggest company in the world; and today the mayor of our greatest city, Bill O'Dwyer, was born in old Erin.

It was a worker's republic. It was not a lazy man's republic. No. No titles of nobility, no inherited rank or caste to buck against; free school, free libraries, scholarships, and a helping hand for the poor boy on the make.

I know a college where a boy came to get his feet on rung one. The only help his parents could give him was a cow. He walked that cow 50 miles to college. When he got there he found someone, as he had the right to expect in a neighborly land, who loaned him a meadow for his cow to graze on. The boy milked the cow, he sold the milk, and the cow saw the boy through. America!

Did the boy have to feel shamefaced about it? Not a bit. I know a little town in Vermont from whence the grandfather of one of our Presidents way back about 1820 walked 150 miles to New Haven to enter Yale. I know of another boy, a 16-year-old waif, who walked from Vermont to Iowa. He became the father of one of our Empire Builder railroad presidents.

And there is Bill Jeffers, of the Union Pacific, president of a great railroad upon which his father drove spikes as an immigrant lad from Ireland.

Call the roll! Tell the story of this worker's republic. Do not tell me that things have changed. Did not we workers in this Republic, in 1944, outproduce the entire world, friend and foe, in the munitions of war?

A worker's republic. Twenty-five million homes and farms, at least half fully paid for; more automobiles, telephones, and gadgets than the rest of the world combined; more money spent on our public schools than the rest of the planet spends; 75,000,000 life-insurance policyholders; 40,000,000 with something in the bank; 80,000,000 who bought Uncle Sam's bonds. Some Republic!

Why do we go around pitying ourselves? Why should we catch an inferiority complex from the sterile intellectuals of Union Square, New York?

Yes, I am leery about this workers' republic over in Russia. If it is so hot, why do not they let us in to see it? Why do they exclude our news reporters? Why do they hang an iron curtain across Europe and say no to every proposal for world peace and universal brotherhood? If you were a housewife and got yourself a new ice box would not you be glad to see the neighbors streaming in to see it? Or, if you were a farmer and raised yourself the biggest pumpkin in the State, would you shoo the photographers away?

But this republic over here, we can see it. It works. It was built by workers. It belongs to workers.

I think this notable document should be read at every high school, college, and university commencement, at every public assembly wherever Americans meet, either in schoolroom, public halls, or in the open air in God's sunlight, and at the end of it, all should stand before the Stars and Stripes and sing God Bless America, the worker's republic.

Extension of Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have voted against extension of the Selective Service Act only after much deliberation and careful consideration of all the arguments supplied by the Army. Their arguments indicate to me that they can, if they wish, obtain the required 1,070,000 men by voluntary enlistment and that there is no need for a draft.

I should like to point out that the Navy's full complement of over 500,000 men can be obtained by voluntary methods. Today Congress has passed finally a bill raising the pay of men in the armed forces for the sole purpose of encouraging enlistments. With that incentive and the proper salesmanship and cooperation by the Army, there is no doubt in my mind that the full complement for the Army can be obtained by voluntary enlistments.

While the Army have said that they would not use the draft if sufficient men could be obtained by enlistment, the fact remains that the physical standards for voluntary enlistments have been raised, at the same time they have been lowered for Selective Service inductions. Such action would appear to be an effort to reduce voluntary enlistments, rather than to increase them. Furthermore, when the Selective Service Act was first extended to include 18-year-old boys, the Army authorities assured the Congress that these young men would be taken only after all other available manpower was exhausted and that they would receive 1 year's training before combat duty. The War Department has never been able to explain satisfactorily why some of these young men were sent into combat and even killed 2 or 3 months after they were inducted. There is, therefore, no reason to believe that the draft will be utilized, as they say, only after voluntary methods have failed to produce the needed number of men.

I am also reminded that the Navy is now maintaining its full complement of over 500,000 solely by voluntary enlistments. It is ridiculous to assume that they Army cannot do the same thing. It can if it has the will and intelligence to do so.

Congressional Record on the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 24, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following copy of a radio interview over Stations WHN, New York City, and WOL, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. SHERMAN. From the Nation's Capital you are about to hear the one hundred and fifty-first broadcast of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD On the Air. This well-known public service feature brings you each week a Member of Congress in a discussion and interview on a subject of national interest. Tonight, our guest is a Member of the House of Representatives. He will be introduced to you now by Billy Repaid, the noted news commentator.

Mr. REPAID. Thank you, Winthrop Sherman. And good evening, ladies and gentlemen. From the modest collection of bookkeepers and clerks in the early days of our Government, housed in a few small buildings bordering the muddy streets of Washington Town, the Federal Government today has assumed the gigantic proportions of 3,000,000 employees housed in mammoth buildings all over the country. In fact, 1 structure alone, the Pentagon Building, accommodates over 30,000 Government employees—a figure more than the population of most American communities. From a community of village proportions the city of Washington today is the magnificent home of over a million people, virtually all of them deriving their income directly and indirectly from the Federal Government. It is conceded on every side that with the expansion of our country, with increasing complexity of our economic and political life, Government must keep pace. It, too, must grow. But the question is asked with increasing frequency: "Has the Federal Government grown too fast?" A few days ago the American people were given the impression that it has. That impression was etched upon our minds by a Congressman from Indiana. He charged inefficiency and laxity in Government personnel. He brought forth some rather startling figures to prove his charges. This spirited legislator is our guest this evening. He will address you briefly, following which he has agreed to answer some of our questions. It is indeed a pleasure to introduce to you now, Congressman EARL WILSON, of Indiana.

Congressman WILSON. Mr. Repaid, first, permit me to thank you and your sponsors for the opportunity to appear on this program. I am sure you are aware of the fact that, after a news story has been passed around from one reporter to another and rewritten by many people and from various viewpoints, it, in all probability, becomes distorted beyond recognition. Certain reporters can cleverly lift a sentence here, and a phrase there, to suit their own purposes and to stimulate reader interest. In fact, I doubt if I would be too unfair to them if I said that they cater to their subscribers' interests much more than they have a right to accuse me of catering to a selfish interest for a political advantage. Of course, I am flattered to be the Representative of the people of the Ninth District of Indiana, who still believe it is honorable to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows. Nor do they believe it is asking too much of these people who are paid by Federal taxes to do likewise.

I do not believe that anyone should have to work 16 hours a day to earn his living. I do not wish to interfere in the private lives of Government employees or dictate to them how they shall spend their time when off duty. I never have and I do not intend to propose that Government employees be in bed by 9 p. m. I do contend, however, that all Government employees owe Uncle Sam a good day's work for a good day's pay.

In the beginning, let us straighten out a few general misinterpretations. I have not been pointing my finger at Government girls but at Government employees, men and women, and I have not placed the blame on the innocent underclerks who work for the Government. The chief fault lies with the civil-service supervisors who make false pretensions as to the amount of work which their sections do in order to obtain additional employees and thus increase their own importance as well as their pay checks. I know, beyond doubt, that this condition does exist, and it should not be tolerated. I am not pointing my finger at those thousands of Washington employees who are doing a conscientious day's work for their pay. In fact, many of them have telephoned and written assuring me that they understand my position and that they back me to the hilt. They, too, are opposed to the taxpayers' money going to pay Government loafers on the public pay roll.

The thing that irks me most is the fact that with all of the days of leave provided and working only a 40-hour week, employees in the Government cannot get through the day without time off for a stimulant twice a day in addition to their regular lunch periods. Certainly the average day's production in many of the departments does not warrant "rest," "snack," or "coffee" periods.

Another thing that irritates me is that Government workers seem unable to get to work on time with their coffee and rolls in their tummies and their faces and hair fixed for the day. Employees in private industry are not permitted make-up or breakfast privileges. Private businesses could not operate under such conditions. Why then should they who pay the salaries of these Government loafers have to work so much harder to earn their livings and contribute tax money to meet large Government pay rolls?

Mr. Repaid, I come from a rural district. My people go to bed at night, they get their rest, get up bright and early (most of them before sun-up), and do a long day's work. They work in the fields from 6 in the morning to 6 in the evening, after which they must put in 2 or 3 hours doing chores before they can retire. They do hard, physical labor, but they do not take time off midmorning and midafternoon for coffee. They stay on the job, and they are able to turn out a good day's work because they went to bed the night before and got their rest.

Another thing that "sticks in my craw," Mr. Repaid, is the fact that this, our Capital City, the cleanest city in the world, is the "sickest" city in the world—that is, it seems to be filled with the sickliest people. There is five times more sick leave taken by Government employees than is taken by employees in private industry simply because the Government allows it. Another factor that contributes to the inefficiency of the Government workers here is the tremendous amounts of alcoholic beverages consumed.

The work done on "the morning after" is bound to reflect the indulgence of "the night before." Please do not misunderstand me. I do not believe we can correct these conditions by laws any more than we can outlaw sin, but as in the case of sin, I am "agin it," and believe that corrective measures should be taken—such measures as will, at least, discourage such goings-on.

Mr. REPAID. Congressman WILSON, you certainly present a strong case for your point of view on this extremely important question of efficiency in Government. Now, if you don't mind, sir, we'd like to play the role of the opposition in the remaining few minutes of this broadcast and ask you a few questions. First of all, sir, how does the number of days off with pay in Government compare with days off with pay in private industry?

Congressman WILSON. Of course, Mr. Repaid, private industry includes all types of work, some of which is very strenuous and requires much time off. Some work must be done under very unhealthful conditions, and, therefore, the employee must take much time off in order to preserve his health. However, I will assume that you are referring to jobs in private industry comparable to those in Government, and my answer is that in private business only producers are paid; drones are not tolerated. Actually, Mr. Repaid, it is not so much the number of days off to which I am objecting as it is the number of "off" days. However, roughly, I would say that the average Government employee has about a 3 to 1 advantage over an employee doing comparable work for a private firm.

Mr. REPAID. Well, I guess you score one on that answer, Congressman WILSON, * * * but tell me, just how do you propose to correct the situation? Would you eliminate the holidays, for instance * * * or cut down on annual leave?

Congressman WILSON. I would permit Government employees who are almost unanimously complaining about the low wages they draw to earn more money by working a 44-hour week. I would also require that sick leave be deducted from annual leave, which I am sure would eliminate about 95 percent of all sick-leave days taken. In addition, if I had a chance to get a bill through Congress, I would propose to set up a committee of experts from business industry and Government to make a survey of the necessary and unnecessary work being done in Washington and the efficiency with which it is being done. I certainly would change the present efficiency-rating system and endeavor to set up one which would be conducive to effective operation. In my proposal that we could reduce 75 percent of the employees on the Government pay roll, I suggested that 50 percent could be eliminated by dispensing with unnecessary work, or work which should be delegated to the States and Territories.

Mr. REPAID. We, of course, haven't had a chance to look over your mail, Congressman WILSON, but I imagine your charges had all the effect on Government employees of poking a stick through a hornet's nest. Did you get a great deal of protest?

Congressman WILSON. You would be genuninely surprised what little protest I have received. As a matter of fact, about 90 percent of my telephone calls and letters are from Government employees who are doing their own work efficiently and who, therefore, join me in my battle to eliminate those who are dragging their feet.

Mr. REPAID. Can you tell us, Congressman WILSON, how the salaries of Government employees compare with salaries in private industries where, we assume, the employees work a greater number of hours per year?

Congressman WILSON. In answer to that question, Mr. Repaid, high-school graduates who took Government jobs in Washington or elsewhere were paid more money than their former teachers receive after 5 years of college training and many years of practical experience in their profession. Furthermore, the school teachers in my State draw better annual wages than do stenographers in private employment in Indiana.

Mr. REPAID. There is a popular generality that has been kicking around for some time, Congressman WILSON, to the effect that it's almost impossible to be fired from Government service. Do you believe that? And if you do, do you think that factor contributes to inefficiency?

Congressman WILSON. Mr. Repaid, not only is it difficult to get fired from the Government service, but it is likewise difficult for conscientious department heads to fire incompetent underclerks. Under the present employment system, it behooves department heads to keep large numbers of employees under them. By doing so, the supervisor's own importance, as well as his salary, is increased. Consequently, there is actually an incentive to make work by creating unnecessary jobs. It is obvious, without stating, that such a system breeds inefficiency.

Mr. REPAID. Have you had any reaction, sir, from your colleagues in Congress on this subject?

Congressman WILSON. Yes, and all favorable. Many of my colleagues have relatives and friends working for the Government who unanimously substantiate my claims.

Mr. REPAID. We have time for one more question, I believe. We'd like to ask if you plan to introduce any legislation to correct these abuses that you see in Government operation?

Congressman WILSON. I have always planned to do so if and when I feel I can get it enacted into law. But, as you know, I am a member of the minority party, which has no control over the legislation presented to Congress. While I cannot believe the party in power endorses these deplorable conditions, I do know that the present administration tolerates them. I am also mindful of the fact that the party in power has done nothing to correct them. On the contrary, Cabinet members and top administrators of the Government are continually calling on Congress to increase appropriations so that even more employees can be added to already top-heavy pay rolls.

Mr. REPAID. Thank you very much, Congressman EARL WILSON, of Indiana. We're not in a position, of course, to take sides in this issue but we do feel that it is a healthy matter for you and your fellow Members of Congress to raise these questions as you see fit. We believe the end result will make for more efficiency in Government.

Monuments and Memories

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS

OF TENNESSEE

Monday, June 24, 1946

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I was granted leave to include in the RECORD a copy of an address delivered by Dr. Marshall Wingfield, of Memphis, Tenn., upon the occasion of the annual Confederate memorial celebration under the auspices of the Confederate Memorial Committee at the Amphitheater in the Arlington National Cemetery on Sunday, June 2, last.

Dr. Wingfield is the immediate past commander in chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans. He is an outstanding Congregational minister and is regarded as one of the most influential and useful men in the Midsouth. He is, in addition, a close student of history and those who heard this splendid address unanimously regarded it as the best delivered at any of the memorial celebrations. He clears up many misunderstandings in connection with southern history.

Because of the excellency of language, thought, and fact, I wanted my colleagues in the House to have the privilege of studying this address:

My fellow citizens, remembering the noted Americans who have spoken here in Arlington at the Confederate memorial exercises of other years, I am keenly aware of the high honor conferred by the Confederate memorial committee of Washington in asking me to join that illustrious succession. I am also aware of a particular joy which comes from speaking under the introduction of the Honorable Frederick P. Myers, commander in chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, into whose capable hands I yielded the commandership last September.

It was not easy to select a theme for this occasion. Our Southland is a land of monuments and memories. When one begins to assemble data on such a theme, the wealth of material is bewildering. It would be impossible to do justice in a single address to any one of a thousand Confederate heroes, and one is simply overwhelmed at the thought of attempting to do justice to the whole glorious company within the time limits which must be here observed. One might paraphrase the words spoken by Lincoln of Washington and say that on the heroism and devotion of the Confederate soldier no fitting eulogy can be expected, therefore let none attempt it.

But year after year we come to Arlington to eulogize our Confederate dead. We believe we can add to their glory. To think is to thank. To remember is to emulate. To emulate their virtues is to enhance their glory. If the greatness of the fathers is enhanced by the greatness of their children then we know that we can add to the glory of the men who wore the gray. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the writer calls the roll of the heroes and heroines of faith and then adds that though they "obtained a good report" they "received not the promise," "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." As the lives of the patriarchs and prophets were incomplete, so are the lives of the men who wore the gray. The "better thing" which God has provided for us, and for the generations which shall come after us, is participation in the completion of the incomplete lives of our fathers. As the architect lives and grows in the growing splendor of the cathedral he designed but never saw completed, so our Confederate ancestors may continue to live and grow in us and come to nobler completion through us. We may be coworkers with the men who wore the gray, just as the workmen who complete the temple are coworkers with the architect who designed it before the workmen were born. By faithfulness to the ideals of our fathers we may add luster to their glory and stature to their fame. Ours are the memories; theirs shall be the monuments which we shall build out of those memories.

What were the ideals of our fathers? What rights and principles did Robert E. Lee have in mind when he told a committee of the "reconstruction" Congress that he was satisfied the South had "sacred principles to maintain and rights to defend; for which we were in duty bound to do our best, even if we perished in the endeavor"? Here in Arlington National Cemetery at these annual meetings to honor the Confederate dead, the truth should be spoken or there should be silence. Surely no decent American could stand here above the sacred ashes of the heroic American dead and misrepresent the facts of history. Here at the door of the home of Robert E. Lee and in the shadow of the mighty monument to Washington there should be unusual inspiration to open one's ears to the truth.

There are millions of supposedly intelligent people who believe that the South fought to hold the Negro in slavery. Nothing could be further from the truth. It was not a slaveholder's war. The developing conscience of Southerners was rapidly settling the issue of slavery. Hundreds of Southerners had voluntarily liberated their slaves long before the war, Robert E. Lee among them. It is quite certain that Lee's opposition to slavery was just as fundamental as that of Lincoln. In his first inaugural address Mr. Lincoln said, "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so." General Lee said of slavery, "In this enlightened age there are few, I believe, but will acknowledge that slavery is a moral and political evil. It is useless to expatiate on its disadvantages. I think it is a greater evil to the white man than to the colored race, and while my feelings are strongly interested in the latter, my sympathies are more deeply engaged for the former. The blacks are immeasurably better off here than in Africa—morally, socially, and physically. * * * Their emancipation will sooner result from the mild and melting influence of Christianity than from the storms and contests of fiery controversy."

Thousands of Confederate soldiers had never owned slaves and came from families that had not owned slaves. In the Stonewall Brigade of the Army of Northern Virginia, nonslaveholders predominated in the ratio of 30 to 1; and in the Confederate Army as a whole, about 9 to 1. Many Southern States had prohibited or restricted the trade in slaves long before the war. The Southern States supported the ordinance creating the Northwest Territory though that ordinance outlawed slavery. The Constitution of the Confederate States expressly forbade the importation of slaves from any country, while the Constitution of the United States recognized slavery in at least three different places.

The South did not lead in setting up the institution of slavery in America: New England led. The first slave ship to sail from an American port was built there and came back there with a cargo of slaves in 1638. In 1750 Newport had 170 ships employed in importing slaves and in 1787 slave trading was Rhode Island's chief commercial activity. From 1755 to 1766, 23,000 slaves were brought to Massachusetts. Even Peter Faneuil, who gave Boston a lecture hall, was the owner of a slave ship. Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, Jonathan Edwards, and General Grant owned slaves. The Nation's Capital City was the hub of the slave trade from 1816 to 1830. There were 1,800 slaves owned in Delaware when the war began. Slave owning decreased in the North and increased in the South because it was less profitable in the North. It was more a matter of money than of morality. Before the Revolution many New Englanders captured Indians and sold them into slavery in the West Indies.

As the North led in the matter of setting up the institution of slavery, so did the North lead in the matter of secession. The South was not the first part of the Nation to threaten to secede. The seeds of secession were sown in the Constitution of 1787 and there was never a time from 1787 to 1860 without strife between the Union and the States. The failure of the Constitution to adjust the balance of power and to reconcile the Nationalists and the States' rights advocates opened the way to the long strife. If the Constitution had declared that a State attempting to depart from the Union should be forcibly kept in by all the rest, the strife could not have risen. But the Constitution seemed to recognize the right to secede, just as it recognized slavery. When Madison and Jefferson wrote the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions in 1788 and 1799, it seemed to be taken for granted that a State had the right to withdraw from the Union. When the Constitution was adopted it was the general understanding that each member State had the right to withdraw. Without this understanding adoption would have failed. Let me repeat, the doctrine of secession did not originate in the South: it originated in the Constitution itself. Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, said that the secession principle was taken up by New England and flourished there long before it had any consideration in the South. Gaillard Hunt, in his Disunion Sentiment in Congress in 1794, says that two New England Senators—King and Ellsworth—knowing the opposition in the South to Washington's Federalist views, invited several eminent men to a conference to consider the matter of a quiet and peaceable dissolution of the Union—the East from the South—with a boundary line to be drawn between the Potomac and the Hudson Rivers.

McMaster says in his History of the People of the United States that in 1803 Senator Timothy Pickering, of Massachusetts, complained of an oppression by the "aristocratic Democrats of the South" which almost drove him to despair. But, said he, "I will not despair: I will rather anticipate a new Confederacy. * * * This can be accomplished without spilling one drop of blood. * * * It must begin with Massachusetts. The proposition would be welcomed by Connecticut, and could we doubt of New Hampshire? But New York must be associated; and how is her concurrence to be obtained? She must be made the center of the Confederacy. Vermont and New Jersey would follow, of course; and Rhode Island of necessity."

When the bill for the admission of the Louisiana Territory was under consideration in 1811, Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, said: "You have no authority to throw the rights and property of this people into the hotchpotch with the wild men on the Missouri. * * * Do you suppose the people of the northern and Atlantic States will look with patience on Representatives and Senators from the Red River and Missouri pouring themselves upon this and the other floor, managing the concerns of a seaboard 1,500 miles from their residence? * * * If the bill passes and that Territory is admitted, the act would be subversive of the principles of the Union, and the several States would be freed from their Federal bonds and obligations; and as it will be the right of all the States, so it will be the duty of some to prepare definitely for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must." Thirty-three years later when the annexation of Texas was under discussion, the Legislature of Massachusetts declared: "The project of the annexation of Texas, unless arrested on the threshold, may tend to drive these States (New England) into a dissolution of the Union."

The Hartford Convention of 1814, made up of delegates from five New England States, considered circumstances under which the participating States would exercise their right to secede from the Union. The Convention concluded that "If the Union be destined to dissolution by reason of the multiplied abuse of bad administration, it should, if possible, be the work of peaceable times and deliberate consent. Some new form of confederacy should be substituted among those States which shall intend to maintain a federal relation to each other. Events may prove that the causes of our calamities are deep and permanent. They may be found to proceed, not merely from the blindness of prejudice, pride of opinion, violence of party spirit, or the confusion of the times; but they may be traced to implacable combinations of individuals or of States to monopolize power and office, and to trample without remorse upon the rights and interests of commercial sections of the Union. Whenever it shall appear that the causes are radical and permanent, a separation by equitable arrangement will be preferable to an alliance by constraint among nominal friends, but real enemies." The findings of this Hartford Convention were echoed by John Quincy Adams, another New Englander, who said shortly after retiring from the Presidency: "It would be better for the people of these disunited States to part in friendship from each other rather than to be held together by constraint."

When the issue of nullification was being debated in 1830, Robert Y. Hayne favored, and Daniel Webster opposed. But even the Senate vote failed to quiet the issue. At a celebration of Jefferson's birthday in Washington, President Andrew Jackson fixed his eyes on nullificationist John C. Calhoun and proposed this toast: "Our Federal Union: It must and shall be preserved." Claude G. Bowers says, "This was more than a toast—it was a Presidential proclamation." Calhoun arose with the rest to drink the toast, but his hand trembled so much that he spilled some of his wine. After drinking this disagreeable toast, Calhoun remained on his feet to propose another toast to the Union and this is what he said: "The Union; next to our liberty the most dear. May we remember that it can only be preserved by respecting the rights of the States."

In a speech in the United States Senate, in 1850, Salmon P. Chase, who was later Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, declared that in the case of a State resuming her powers, he knew no remedy to prevent it.

Senator B. F. Wade, of Ohio, said in the Senate in 1855, "Who is the judge, in the last resort, of the violation of the Constitution of the United States by the enactment of a law? Who is the final arbiter, the general Government or the States in their sovereignty? Why, sir, to yield that point is to yield up all the rights of the States to protect their own citizens, and to consolidate this Government into a miserable despotism."

Early in 1861 Horace Greeley declared, "If the Declaration of Independence justified the secession from the British Empire of three millions of colonists in 1776, we do not see why it would not justify the secession of 5,000,000 Southrons from the Federal Union in 1861. * * * If the slave States * * * choose to form an independent nation, they have a clear moral right to do so."

The New England historian, Charles Francis Adams, who served in the Union Army, recalled the rearing and education of Robert E. Lee, and said: "If my rearing had been that of Robert E. Lee I would have acted just as Lee did. * * * If Lee was a traitor so also were George Washington, Oliver Cromwell, John Hampden, and William of Orange." Historian Adams might also have recalled that when Lee was a student in West Point he used a textbook on the Constitution by William Rawle which expressly declared that the withdrawal of a State from the Union depended wholly upon the will of the citizens of that State. "It depends on the State itself," said Rawle, "to retain or abolish the principle of representation, because it depends on itself whether it will continue a member of the Union. To deny this right would be inconsistent with the principle on which all of our political systems were founded: Which is, that the people have in all cases a right to determine how they will be governed." General Lee told Bishop Wilmer, of Louisiana, that if it had not been for the instruction he got from Rawle's textbook at West Point he could not have left the United States Army to lead the Confederate Army.

Writing to Lord Acton from Lexington, Va., on December 15, 1861, Robert E. Lee said: "I yet believe that the maintenance of the rights and authority reserved to the State and to the people is not only essential to the adjustment and balance of the general system, but the safeguard to the continuance of a free government. I consider it as the chief source of stability to our political system whereas the consolidation of the States into one vast republic, sure to be aggressive abroad and despotic at home, will be the certain precursor of that ruin which has overwhelmed all those that have preceded it." He had learned that as a student in the Military Academy at West Point. It was sound doctrine when taught from Rawle, but Robert E. Lee was indicted for treason when he put the teaching into practice.

There is no competent or complete history of the United States that fails to show the universality throughout the Union of the doctrine of States' rights which included the right of secession. No history called the doctrine of secession treasonable until that doctrine became associated with the Southern States.

To those who say a recital of these facts cannot serve any useful purpose, I reply they can serve the highest purpose to be served in our Republic, namely, the unification of our people. When these facts are known and received by Americans who love the truth, the South will no longer be regarded as a section which, above all other sections, wickedly sought to destroy the Union. The South was reluctant to leave the Union. There was no attempt to alienate any Northern State which wanted to continue to operate under the Federal Constitution. There was no attempt by arms or otherwise, to coerce any Northern State into the Confederacy. The Confederate States wanted to withdraw peacefully. Had they been permitted to do so, there still would have been a great nation of many States. Such a separation would have been disastrous but it would not have been more disastrous than the war from which the country has not yet recovered.

When the Southern States seceded they exercised what they considered "rights" and what all other States had once considered "rights." As a native son and lover of the South, I am probably blind to many of her faults. But I know that I am not blind when I say the South's withdrawal from the Union was prompted by love of freedom. I also know I am seeing straight when I say that a broader view of freedom would have prevented secession. I refer to that view of freedom expressed by the apostle to the gentiles who said, "Though I am free, I bring myself under bondage that I may gain the more freedom."

It is clear from today's vantage point that a permanently divided Union would have abridged the freedom which we enjoy today as citizens of States that are united. We had to forego a freedom from something in order to have a larger freedom—the freedom for something. When freedom is for something as well as from something, it is always richer and finer. We are never wiser than when we curtail our own liberties in order to win a larger freedom.

The men in blue went home to cities and farms that had not been invaded. They returned as victors. Five of their army officers went on to the White House. The men in gray went back to devastated farms and ruined cities, to begin all over again. They set to work with battered and broken tools to help rebuild their shattered fortunes. They wrought so well that from the ashes of disaster and the dust of desolation the South has been raised from the dead, though the prints of the nails are still in its hands and the scar of the spear thrust is still in its side.

The time has come when we are able to speak of the heroism of our fathers without stirring up sectional animosities. As the victories of Pompey and of Caesar were the common renown of Rome, so the achievements of both North and South are the common renown of America. The red rose and the white rose are now entwined in the crown of British history. Likewise the blue and the gray are now blended in the garment of American history. The Athenians and the Spartans erected monuments of perishable wood to celebrate victories over their own fellow-countrymen, but they built monuments of enduring stone to commemorate their triumphs over foreign foes. The Romans never permitted a triumph to any victor in their civil wars. If the people whom we call heathen refused to perpetuate the hatreds of their civil strife, shall we be less magnanimous?

Regional lines and sectional differences will no doubt continue, but they will continue as landmarks of that diversity which is the law of the universe. It is not likely that the time will ever come when we shall be able to love all sections alike, any more than we shall be able to love all persons alike. And why may we not believe that the highest patriotism is the patriotism which loves one's own region best.

You have probably heard the story of the politician who so wanted the votes of all the people in his somewhat cosmopolitan audience that he shouted, "I know no North or South, I know no East or West." Whereupon an urchin in the gallery piped out, "Mister, you better go home and study your goggerfy." The man who cannot recognize that there are four great regions in America should heed the urchin's advice to the politician. Let us not think of the four sections of our country in terms of antagonisms. Let us rather think of the four sections as four pillars in the temple of our common country. Let the work of building hate monuments cease. If we continue to perpetuate the hates which grew out of our civil strife in the sixties, we shall be less magnanimous than the ancient nations which we sometimes call pagan.

I count it a high privilege, my fellow citizens, to come today to this hallowed spot and join you in calling back from the dusk of the vanished years some pictures of the "bonnie blue flag," and of the men who bore it, and of "the storm-cradled nation that fell."

Tragedy of Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of June 17, 1946:

TRAGEDY OF BRITAIN

One of the most fascinating subjects in history is the study of "leaders" who get run over by the social and political forces they help unleash.

In the French Revolution, one after another of the early chieftains eventually went to the guillotine they had helped set up, because they tried to curb some of the excesses of the movement they aided in starting.

Many other such examples can be found. The legend of Frankenstein's monster destroying its creator has a special application to innumerable historical events.

High tragedy of this sort appears to be in the making in England.

Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, one of the ablest and possibly the most eloquent of the political figures who talked the British people into discarding Churchill and "capitalism" and embarking on state socialism, is face to face with realities in two broad fields.

He has collided with the vast difference between what is wished and what is possible; and is up against the equally distressing fact that political subordinates, unimpeded with responsibility, may disregard the distinction.

The Labor Government, in which Bevin is a key factor, has promised to perform an impossible miracle—to restore national prosperity and individual security to a land which has been going down hill for two generations.

This basic dilemma in which Bevin finds himself has resulted in his facing equally distressing predicaments in every direction he tries to move.

In foreign affairs, for example, having helped destroy the Churchill program, he now finds that the policy of so-called imperialism is the only one under which England has, not so much a chance to regain her one-time proud position, but even to survive.

Having joined in a campaign against Churchill on the basis of that leader's suspicion of Russia, he now realizes that Russia deserves even more suspicion than Churchill showed. The Russian Bear is a menace to British sovereignty as great or even greater than that of Hitlerite Germany.

Having derided the United States (for campaign purposes) as a capitalistic nation, Bevin's party now is up against the fact that their only hope for financing their program is through borrowing American capital.

Pro-Russianism, both in the field of ideology and of international politics, in the present state of world affairs, demands coldness toward the United States; yet the outlook most clearly shows the picture Churchill already has painted—that Great Britain, to survive against Russia's expansion, must rely on financial and military aid from this Nation.

On the home front also there is a dilemma of equally grave consequences to Bevin's peace of mind. The Labor Party promised the British people all the advantages which could be enjoyed by a prosperous people; in effect, that they would live the life of Riley without having to work for it. Now it is most painfully clear that whatever the Britons get will be the result of labor and sacrifice—of "blood, sweat, toil, and tears" applied, not as Churchill did, to the war, but to many years of peace.

Bevin himself sees all these dilemmas, and has sought to grasp them by the horn which offers most for Britain's future. Unfortunately for him, this has swung him out of step with his party. Because he has sought realistically to face true needs, he is being accused of abandoning his party's promises; and because he helped make those promises, he cannot now reply that they are impossible of fulfillment.

Thus far Bevin's eloquence, plus an engaging frankness, has helped him pass the crises. Mainly, however, he has simply succeeded in stalling off the evil day of decision. But a certain desperation is creeping into his remarks.

The clash between reality and promise becomes progressively worse. The bitter disappointment of the British people themselves is being reflected in equally bitter recriminations.

Steadily growing is the list of matters which members of the Socialist group would like to see done, but which Bevin declares must be postponed or abandoned.

Repeatedly he has been forced to explain the gradual retirement of Britain's military forces from critical areas of Europe on the basis the Empire's finances do not permit such costs. The effect of such withdrawal, of course, is to place a larger share of the responsibility where the hotheads of Bevin's party would rather not see it—on the shoulders of Uncle Sam.

This, of course, is a fundamental point of difference between Bevin, who has to meet facts as they exist, and the starry-eyed visionaries of his party who want realities disregarded when they interfere with dreams.

An inevitable end product of the socialism doctrine as applied to Great Britain is enmity to the United States. This has flared up repeatedly; at the moment when even the Labor Party leaders were most eager for American money to finance their nationalization, few of them were able to restrain their unfriendliness to the banker they sought to do business with. Terms of a loan, which is virtually a gift, were described as stringent and miserly.

More and more, Bevin's public appearances are becoming the occasion for him to be interrogated by the lieutenants of his party. His attitude toward the United States has been challenged repeatedly.

His recent declaration in favor of the proposed American 25-year disarmament treaty with Germany, which is strongly opposed by Russia and therefore questionable in the minds of the Communist sympathizers so numerous in the Labor Party, stirred a new storm of such questions.

Americans who seek to understand the undercurrents of events in their own and other lands would do well to think over carefully the reply with which Bevin silenced (temporarily, at least) this line of criticism.

"Russia is socialized," he declared. "We are partly socialized. Americans can believe in private enterprise. * * * America may be a capitalistic country, but that does not mean that she will always be. There are great forces moving in the United States, and when they move they move very quickly."

This is the most explicit statement yet made officially by representatives of the British Government that the political future of the British Labor Party demands the encouragement of a socialistic revolution in the United States.

A United Nations Approach to the Cartel Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN
OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Gilbert H. Montague, of the New York bar, before the Symposium on Trusts and Cartels, Harvard Law School Forum, at Cambridge, Mass., on May 10, 1946. The address is entitled "A United Nations Approach to the Cartel Problem."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A UNITED NATIONS APPROACH TO THE CARTEL PROBLEM

American business will find considerable cause for encouragement in the proposals regarding restrictive trade practices affecting foreign and international trade which are contained in the proposals for consideration by an International Conference on Trade and Employment signed on December 6, 1945, by representatives of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain.

Both nations are now committed to advocating in this international conference soon to be called by the United Nations Organization the following procedure, viz:

First. "There should be individual and concerted efforts by members," that is, all nations who are members of the United Nations organization, "to curb those restrictive business practices in international trade (such as combinations or agreements to fix prices and terms of sale, divide markets or territories, limit production or exports, suppress technology or invention, exclude enterprises from particular fields, or boycott or discriminate against particular firms) which have the effect of frustrating the objectives of the organization to promote expansion of production and trade, equal access to markets and raw materials, and the maintenance in all countries of high levels of employment and real income."

Second. Procedure by which the International Trade Organization to be created under the United Nations organization "should receive complaints from any member (or, with the permission of the member, from commercial enterprises within its jurisdiction who allege that their interests are affected) that the objectives of the organization are being frustrated by a private international combination or agreement."

Third. Procedure by which the International Trade Organization to be created under the United Nations organization "should be empowered to call upon any member to provide information relevant to such a complaint," and "should consider such data and, if warranted, make recommendations to the appropriate members for action in accordance with their respective laws and procedures," and "should be empowered to request reports from members as to their actions in implementing such recommendations, and to report thereon," and "should also be authorized, within the scope of its subject matter, to conduct studies, to make recommendations concerning uniform national standards, and to call conferences of member states for purposes of general consultation."

As signed by representatives of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on December 6, 1945, these proposals provide that "any act or failure to act on the part of the organization," namely the International Trade Organization to be created under the United Nations organization, "should not preclude any member from enforcing within its own jurisdiction any national statute or decree directed toward the elimination or prevention of restrictive business practices in international trade," and also provide that "members may, by mutual accord, cooperate in measures for the purpose of making more effective any remedial order which has been issued by a duly authorized agency of another member."

Here, at long last, is a multilateral, international approach, to which the Governments of United States and Great Britain are already committed, and which it is hoped will receive the assent of all the other nations who are members of the United Nations organization, by which a world policy may be established regarding foreign and international trade.

This will be good news to American businessmen, who have long wearied of the uncertainties and the conflicts that in recent years have grown to intolerable proportions, because of the widely varying national policies in this field.

Labor and Management

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on June 11 the convention of Kiwanis International, held at Atlantic City, N. J., adopted certain resolutions on the subject of labor and management.

Mr. George E. Stringfellow, vice president of Edison Industries, of East Orange, N. J., who was a member of the resolutions committee, and who cooperated in the preparation of these resolutions, has forwarded them to me for the attention of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to have them published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR AND MANAGEMENT

Be it resolved, That the interest of the general public is paramount to the special interests both of labor and management; that the entire economy of our nations and the well-being and security of all our people suffer from uncontrolled conflict between management and labor; that we believe in the rights of labor to organize, to bargain collectively, and to protect its interests by all reasonable and lawful means, and in the rights of management to have peaceful enjoyment of its properties and free choice in establishing its policies provided that none of these rights be exercised without due regard to the rights of the other party, nor in such a way as to subject the public to loss or undue inconvenience; be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our respective national legislatures to enact laws which will define clearly the respective duties and responsibilities, as well as the rights and privileges, both of management and labor, and which will effectively enforce those duties and responsibilities, protect the rights and privileges, control disputes between them, and provide for compulsory arbitration of all disputes prior to the calling of a strike which might endanger the national welfare, or impinge upon the constitutional rights of the citizen; be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our legislative bodies to enact legislation which will prevent effectively any individual or group of individuals from disrupting the economy of our Nation and that the antitrust laws be expanded and revised to achieve that end; it being our considered opinion that excessive power over the economy of the country in the hands of any individual or group of individuals is inimical to the public interest, whether such individuals represent labor, management, or any other group, and that the rule of law shall be restored and maintained.

Joint Statement of Scientists and Educators on Need for a National Science Foundation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a joint statement of scientists and educators on the need for a national science foundation. Ten leading scientists and educators endorse Senate bill 1850. They are:

James B. Conant, president, American Association for the Advancement of Science; president, Harvard University.

George F. Zook, president, American Council on Education.

Morris Fishbein, editor, Journal of the American Medical Association.

Thomas P. Cooper, president, Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities; dean, College of Agriculture, University of Kentucky.

Isaiah Bowman, chairman, Committee Supporting the Bush Report; president, Johns Hopkins University.

Boris Bakhmeteff, chairman of panel on science legislation, Engineers Joint Council for American Institute of Chemical Engineers, American Institute of Electrical Engineers, American Society of Civil Engineers, American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, and American Society of Mechanical Engineers.

Arthur A. Hauck, president, National Association of State Universities; president, University of Maine.

Willard A. Givens, executive secretary, National Education Association.

Harlow Shapley, president, Scientific Research Society of America, and cochairman, Committee for a National Science Foundation.

Each of the organizations represented above have, either in their governing councils or in their special committees studying science legislation, endorsed the national science foundation bill, S. 1850, and urged its immediate passage. In addition, many of the local chapters and individual societies belonging to the above national organizations have taken similar action endorsing S. 1850 and urging action in this session.

In addition to the statement I ask to have printed a brief description of the organizations represented.

There being no objection, the statement and description of organizations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For the reasons stated in the report by Dr. Vannevar Bush to President Truman in July 1945 and the report on science legislation by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in April 1946, we are in favor of a National Science Foundation.

Sober analysis has shown that, because of the expanding frontiers of science and the increasing cost of many types of research, private grants and endowments are not adequate to support the national needs in basic scientific research and training of scientists either now or in the years ahead.

For many years the Government has wisely supported research in the agricultural colleges, and the benefits have been great. The time has come when such support should be extended to other fields of science and to advanced scientific education. There is not now in the governmental structure receiving its funds from Congress any agency adapted to providing the necessary supplementation of funds or the necessary additional support of basic research in medicine, national defense research, or basic sciences, or adapted to administering a program for the support of advanced scientific education.

We believe that the creation of a National Science Foundation to support fundamental scientific research and the education of scientists is of the utmost importance for the health, security, and welfare of the Nation. Believing the matter to be of great urgency, some of us recently joined with other groups in an appeal to the chairman and members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill on which the majority of scientists and educators could agree. S. 1850 is the result. We endorse this bill and appeal now to the Congress as a whole to create a National Science Foundation by the enactment of S. 1850 before the end of the present session.

All of us recognize that in the democratic process of Senate debate S. 1850 may be modified. We would regard, however, as highly prejudicial to the national interest protracted delay or failure to enact legislation because of differences of opinion among scientists and educators in the earlier stages of consideration. We are offering these joint views in order to reaffirm the unity among scientists and educators on the need for National Science Foundation legislation at this session of Congress, and our common belief that S. 1850 provides the necessary support of basic scientific research and education and is designed to safeguard scientific freedom and to advance the public interest.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science has 190 affiliated organizations, including virtually all the scientific societies in the country, with a membership of over half a million and in addition has 22,000 individual members. The governing council of 250 members representing the individual societies and the membership at large voted 10 to 1 to endorse S. 1850. A large number of the individual affiliated scientific societies have taken similar action.

The American Council on Education is an organization with affiliates primarily from higher education, including 550 affiliated colleges, departments of education, and individual higher education societies. The executive council endorsed S. 1850 as have many of the individual member organizations.

The American Medical Association has a membership of 125,000 individual doctors. The board of trustees has endorsed S. 1850 in a statement substantially similar to the joint statement.

The Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities includes all colleges in this category. The executive committee has unanimously endorsed S. 1850 and most of the individual colleges have, through their action, expressed similar endorsement.

The committee supporting the Bush report consists of 5,000 scientists and educators, the leaders of which took an active part in drafting the original report of Dr. Bush to President Truman, and who later participated actively in the science hearings and in the preparation of the joint Kilgore-Magnuson bill growing out of the original separate Kilgore and Magnuson proposals.

The recommendations of the science panel have been endorsed by the Engineers Joint Council, which represents the principal engineering organizations of the country with a total membership of over 100,000. Not only have the major engineering organizations endorsed S. 1850 and urged its passage, but similar action has been taken, after careful study, by a good many of the local and State chapters.

S. 1850 was endorsed by the executive committee of the National Association of State Universities, which includes 52 State universities, and by virtually all of the individual institutions.

The National Education Association, by its national executive board, endorsed S. 1850, as did a considerable number of the affiliated local and State associations. The total membership of the National Education Association is 340,973, of which 1,709 consist of State and local associations and institutions and the balance of individual members.

The Scientific Research Society of America has endorsed S. 1850 in its executive council, and, prior to that, in its national convention, which endorsed substantially all the provisions later incorporated. Dr. Shapley, together with Dr. Harold C. Urey, is cochairman of the committee of 500 scientists known as the Committee for a National Science Foundation, which includes leading scientists throughout the country who participated actively in the formulation of the joint Kilgore-Magnuson bill, S. 1850.

OPA Conference Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am confronted with facts, not theories.

Conditions today are such that, having the interest of the people at heart, I must vote for the conference report, because if we defeat it I fear we cannot pass a resolution in the House to continue the present price-control law. From information I have, it seems the other body could not pass a continuing resolution within 4 or 6 months, and by that time OPA would be disbanded and gone.

By accepting this conference report we save something, particularly control over rents and many prices. I feel that the conference report is better than either the House or Senate bills, but, of course, it is not what I had hoped and voted for, and I feel only that half a loaf is better than none.

The bill protects the prices of the manufacturer and the businessman, but it does not protect the pay of the wage earner. As I stated some weeks ago, if we guarantee certain profits to manufacturers and businessmen, why should we not guarantee the rate of pay of the wage earner?

Tomorrow the Committee on Rules will consider the granting of a rule to provide for the consideration of the minimum-wage bill, and I hope the rule will be granted.

Malvina Lindsay Discusses the Good Life As Women See It and Gives the Men Something To Think About

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, in her column for June 21, Malvina Lindsay reports the results of a recent study, The World Women Want, conducted by the Women's Institute of Audience Reactions. Miss Lindsay's summary is interesting and enlightening. It deals with public education, juvenile delinquency, military training, foreign policy, industrial relations, and other public questions. This is a timely comment and of interest to all students of governmental problems.

The article follows:

The average thinking American woman has a fairly modest, though as yet utopian, dream of the good life. It would be something like this:

She would live in a comfortable, though no pretentious, home, probably with a backyard grill, equipped by science to relieve her from drudgery and give her time for the subtler phases of homemaking.

Her husband would have a secure and stable job in an economy that had a minimum of unemployment. He would probably work but 6 hours a day, thus having time to help make the home a center of education and enjoyment.

Her children would attend an up-to-date school having high-class, highly paid teachers, and emphasizing character building and civic studies in its curriculum.

The family would worship at a church that minimized creed differences in religion, that prompted spiritual before social values.

Her government would provide protection against accident, illness, old age, and unemployment, make it possible for mothers of school-aged children or younger to stay home instead of work in office or factory. Yet, it would be free of bureaucratic dictatorship, and insure citizens the fullest possible liberty in their economic, social, mental, and religious life.

Her neighborhood would be socially minded enough to meet its public problems, including juvenile delinquency. Her nation would be world-minded enough to understand it could not enjoy prosperity and high standards of living in safety until it helped other peoples to attain them.

Above all, she would live in a world in which she would not have to worry about losing her children in the next war, in a world whose peace was guaranteed by at least a limited form of world government.

This picture of things that might be comes from the recent study, the World Women Want, made by the Women's Institute of Audience Reactions. In charge of it were Agnes M. Grew, who founded, endowed, and now directs the institute, and Lawrence J. Mannion, professor of history and social studies at Fordham University. Women from 41 States, aged from 17 to 70, and representing 40 different occupations, with homemaker predominating, expressed their views through the small sampling method.

This study reveals much about a type of citizen who has far-reaching influence in American life—the intelligent woman whose horizon extends beyond the kitchen, office, beauty shop, and fashion show. She shows up in this survey as definitely world minded and social minded, also with a deep-rooted faith in the home as the center from which all progress must stem, and in spiritual faith as giving life its meaning and hope.

But, in relation to the home, she is not sentimental or reactionary. She recognizes it must expand and progress to fulfill its functions. Hence, she strongly insists on what gadgets science can give her to free her from useless drudgery. She looks forward to more neighborhood services, as yard, nursery, and cleaning agencies to which she can telephone for trained, reliable workers to be paid by the hour. Peaceful leisurely home life is her goal.

She feels that women should be in the home while their families are growing up, and she would see those who have taken war jobs return home if this is at all possible.

She has no patience with religious or racial intolerance, or with selfish nationalism.

While the women whose opinions enter into the study varied widely in their viewpoints on some matters, their general attitudes were similar. They showed remarkable broadmindedness, human sympathy and vision in their replies to the question: "In what kind of postwar world would you like to live, and what are your ideas for getting it?"

Among the questions that found the women divided was military training. Seventy-eight percent were for it, 22 percent against. Those favoring it believed it would strengthen the Nation's efforts toward peace. Those against held it would promote militarism, was an obsolete defense in war.

On capital and labor relations, the women were reticent. Generally they felt there should be more spirit of cooperation on both sides.

As to how the world they want can be attained, they all recognized that would take a lot of doing. One point all emphasized was that each individual would have to shoulder his part of the responsibility. And apparently they were all ready to shoulder theirs.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. TAFT
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, June 25 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three editorials dealing with the subject of the reorganization of the Congress. The editorials are from the Dayton (Ohio) News of June 11, 1946, the Canton (Ohio) Repository of June 12, 1946, and the Cincinnati Times-Star, of June 12, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Dayton (Ohio) News of June 11, 1946]

CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

The Senate's courage in voting to raise its salaries yesterday was not quite matched by its selflessness in accepting a thoroughgoing reorganization of the congressional system. In eliminating the proposed congressional director of personnel and maintaining 21 members on appropriations committees, the Senators chose patronage over efficiency and politics over the public's interest.

The heart of the La Follette-Monroney bill was saved, nevertheless. Thirty-three Senate committees were reduced to 15. The result should be an increase in efficiency and greater recognition of the will of the senatorial majority. The outlawing of appropriation bill riders, requiring lobbyists to register, and furnishing each Congressman an administrative assistant—these measures too should contribute greatly to legislative reform.

We hope the House will go along with congressional reorganization. The country can well afford to reward the right men for their service in the Congress.

[From Canton (Ohio) Repository of June 12, 1946]

ANY OBJECTION?

The "streamlining" legislation which the Senate has passed and sent to the House has no connection with the Government reorganization undertaken by the executive department. This is a congressional project, to increase the lawmaking efficiency of the two Houses of Congress.

There can be no legitimate objections to the purpose of the proposal, nor can there even be any really serious differences of opinion over the means of carrying out the reform. But there will be objections and differences of opinion, and it will be interesting to trace them to their source. The source will be individuals and organizations in the United States with special reasons for wanting to keep the United States Congress inefficient.

For years these enemies of good government and the me-too lintheads who chime in whenever the call goes out to make fun of Congress have jumped on every proposal to increase the dignity, efficiency, and security of legislators.

[From Cincinnati Times-Star of June 12, 1946]

OUR HORSE-AND-BUGGY CONGRESS

By a vote of 49 to 16 the Senate passed this week a bill to streamline Congress and, incidentally, to increase the salaries of Members from $10,000 to $15,000, together with a project that would enable them to retire at 62 on a pension up to $7,500 a year. While most of the debate centered on pay and pensions, we dismiss that phase of the bill with the simple statement that the compensation of Members is now inadequate.

Of larger interest are other provisions of the bill. The report accompanying it properly stigmatizes the "crazy-quilt pattern" of Congress. In the Senate, "responsibility for legislative action is scattered among 33 little legislatures (committees) which go their way at their own pace and cannot act in concert." Many of these have duplicating functions. Though there are only 96 Senators, they occupy 568 committee seats, or an average of six apiece. Of course, they cannot attend all or even most meetings. It is proposed to reduce the number of committees to 16. For example, six of the present committees would be merged into one called Rules and Administration.

Of parallel utility is the section to provide each Member with an administrative assistant. Such an aide would take care of patronage matters, answer the questions of constituents, and relieve the Member from errand-boy functions.

A novel but promising section provides for the establishment of four "majority and minority policy committees," each of seven members. The purpose is to crystallize the determination of party policy as an offset to organized group pressures. As the report puts it, "beset by swarms of lobbyists seeking to protect this or that small segment of the economy or to advance this or that narrow interest, legislators find it difficult to discern the real majority will and to legislate in the public interest." As a further step, it is provided that pressure groups must register and disclose their membership and backing.

In place of special committees of investigation the bill would authorize the standing committees to employ qualified experts and exercise continuous surveillance over the execution of laws. Then, for the first time, Congress could meet administration officials with men of equal information. This is important.

The Jewish Black Book Is Required Reading

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the Jewish people have suffered the annihilation of almost half of their numbers at the hands of the Nazis. Six million Jews have been slaughtered in cruel, fiendish, ingenious ways. The surviving remnants of the Jewish people in America, in Russia, in Palestine, and throughout the world have united through four organizations to present to the world the record of this annihilation. This is the Jewish Black Book, sponsored by the World Jewish Congress, the Vaad Leumi of Palestine—Jewish Governing Council of Palestine—the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee of the U. S. S. R., and the American Committee of Jewish Writers, Artists, and Scientists.

The Black Book, besides being the documented record of the Nazi crimes against the Jews, is also a warning of the dangers of fascism to all people. It is a warning of the horrors that can be perpetrated against innocent people when the conscience of the world is not alert to justice—to the rights of every individual—everywhere in the world.

This Black Book, which must be obligatory reading for every legislator, and which I urge every Members of Congress to diligently peruse, is a momument to the 6,000,000 Jewish victims of facism. It is a monument established so that their suffering and their death serve as a warning to the survivors of this war. We, the lawmakers of this great Nation must seriously study what measures must be taken so that never again need such a black book be written. We must keep constantly in mind the perniciousness and injustices of our prejudices, particularly racial prejudices.

In Nuremberg, the Nazi fiends are on trial for their crimes against humanity. We read daily in the press of the ingenious horrors that they caused to be perpetrated against innocent men, women, and children; of the millions they strangled, burned, shot, tortured, and starved to death.

Today people read the press and it leaves no lasting impression. Nothing is more completely lost than yesterday's headlines. They shrug their shoulders and say "how horrible" or "it's a good thing that the beasts will be punished." And then they forget. That is the sad and human truth, that already, the horrors of anti-Semitism, the horrors of the concentration camp, like the horrors of war, are forgotten. The human mind rejects what is unpleasant unless the impact can be made strong enough.

And some of those who remember the horrors fail to draw the proper connection between the terror of anti-Semitism in a concentration camp and the anti-Semitism around the corner. Well-meaning people who cry out against the wholesale murder depicted in this volume, do not see that they may be the unwitting supporters of a program that leads to wholesale murder when they tolerate what they consider mild and personal anti-Semitic measures. They have not learned of the tragic continuity from "No Jews Admitted Here" to an extermination camp for Jews.

Hitlerism met a stunning military defeat. But the vicious ideas that it disseminated fell on too-fertile soil. We see today a fearful increase of anti-Semitism. Many people who join the anti-Semitic wave do so out of ignorance. To prevent the growth of anti-Semitism there must be widespread knowledge of its dangers, its dangers to all people, its inevitable connection with fascism and war.

The text of the Black Book has been presented to the tribunal of the United Nations War Crimes Commission convened at Nuremberg, to bring to justice the dregs of the human race. Much of the evidence presented by the prosecutors of the trials has been based on the evidence found in the text of the Black Book. But it is even more than a demand for punishment of foul and brutal crimes already committed. It sounds a warning to the peoples of the world that the peace is not yet won—that it cannot be won nor the future safeguarded until anti-Semitism is outlawed and the last vestiges of fascism and uprooted and destroyed in every land. Until the equal rights of every people, of the Jew not the least, are made secure, the safety of every people is in jeopardy. This is the lesson that the nations of the earth must learn.

The Black Bock is a contribution to the future peace and security of mankind. It will help all men to recognize the seed of fascism even in its most commonplace forms—the anti-Semitic jest, the rumor, the quota, the sign restricted. The Black Book is an exercise and lesson in racial unity. The Black Book is a ringing demand to civilized mankind, for united judgment of those who caused these crimes, lest our children one day edit an even blacker Black Book. Never again must any people cry out in helplessness, "Where is the conscience of the world?"

Congressional Reorganization Up to House—Press Applauds La Follette-Monroney Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1946

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include several editorials of leading newspapers praising the congressional reorganization bill which was recently passed by the Senate and is now awaiting House action. They are as follows:

[From the Nashville Tennessean of June 2, 1946]

CONGRESSIONAL RETIREMENT

The submission of the La Follette-Monroney committee report to the House so soon after the death of Senator Glass, and the striking down of several other aged Senators with illnesses more or less connected with advancing years, focuses attention on the recommendation that a retirement system be set up to encourage Members of Congress to leave Government service at the age of 62.

The tremendous work load under which Congress has found itself is too much for men in the prime of life, much less those beyond retirement age ordinarily enforced in the private business and professional world. Even if the complete modernization of congressional machinery proposed by La Follette-Monroney committee is carried through, the work load will still remain too heavy for aged men to do efficiently. The proposal for retirement is therefore a very practical program to prevent Congress from being slowed down by the presence of over-age or senile men in the body.

George Washington was desperately afraid senility would overtake him in office and this fear had much to do with his starting the two-term tradition, though he quit Government service still in advance of the present retirement age.

As things now stand, however, it is likely that more Senators will be inclined to follow the Glass example than the Hart example, preferring prestige to pension and clinging to the power and emoluments of office as long as they can induce their constituents to return them to office. The problem will not be solved until a law is passed or the tradition can be evolved in Congress that Members, whether or no, retire at a specified age, on the theory that while it may work a hardship in a given case, the public interest is served in the long run by its enforcement.

The people can help bring such a reform about by refusing to return to office congressmen who are threatened with or overtaken by the disabilities of old age.

[From the World Herald of Omaha, Nebr., June 9, 1946]

THE LA FOLLETTE BILL

Little attention has been given to the La Follette bill to reorganize Congress.

It has been buried under such pressing matters as the Case bill and the President's antistrike bill, extension of the draft, and of OPA, and a host of Senate measures bearing the label "urgent."

Moreover, the La Follette bill is not one that captures the imagination. It is a reform bill. It does not concern the people directly. It concerns an indifferent Congress, one which has not made a real effort to improve or modernize its ways of doing business in the past 50 years.

Thus, when Senator LA FOLLETTE appeals to his fellow legislators to clean up the unholy mess they have made of their duplicating committees and their time-wasting and money-wasting processes, he is appealing to the conscience of men who know they have been remiss in their duty, but who also know they can get away with it a little longer if they choose.

No outraged public will rise in its wrath, as it does in the case of labor troubles or the OPA, and demand that Congress pass measures to eliminate its outmoded procedures and cut down the number of standing committees.

But the Members of Congress know in their hearts that their inaction is stifling the democratic process. They know there are abuses which can be cured by some painful but quite simple self-surgery. They ought to begin the operation immediately.

Senator LA FOLLETTE'S special Senate-House Committee on the Organization of Congress has been at work for many months. The members have consulted with the leading authorities on government, including college professors and efficiency experts. Most important, perhaps, they have consulted among themselves. As Congressmen and Senators they know what is wrong, and they have a good idea of what to do about it. The 88-page bill reported by Senator LA FOLLETTE is the fruit of their research and their thinking.

The bill would cut the standing committees of the Senate from 38 to 16 and provides specifically what matters shall be referred to each.

It would provide for joint consideration of revenue and expenditures by the appropriating and revenue committee of both Houses. There would be joint estimates on over-all receipts and expenditures for each coming fiscal year.

There would be new machinery for handling property-damage and personal-injury claims against the United States and the flood of petty claims bills would be stemmed. There would be a charter for the District of Columbia and the Congress would no longer have the full burden of supervising the governmental affairs of a large city.

There would also be increased clerical help for Congressmen and for congressional committees. There would be a bevy of researchers and administrative assistants—a crying need if Congress is to legislate intelligently and independently of the various executive departments which now do the experting for the legislators.

There would be salary increases for Senators and Representatives—$15,000 instead of the present $10,000—which would make it possible for able men to make the financial sacrifice of serving in Congress. And there would be retirement pay for congressional veterans. This would be an incentive for oldsters to quit rather than hang on to their seats in order to make a living.

The backing of the La Follette bill includes organized labor and chambers of commerce. It is nonpartisan and aids no special group. It is "must" legislation if the Congress of the United States is to continue its legislative functions. It is to be hoped that Members of Congress will rise to their duty, avoid rabble-rousing attacks on this measure that is already misunderstood in many quarters, and pass the La Follette bill for the reorganization of Congress.

GOOD LEGISLATION

It is a pleasant task to record a good deed in a naughty world.

While recent Washington headlines have been devoted to some rather glaring instances of ineptitude and some disheartening instances of bickering, the Senate has passed what seems to this newspaper a highly beneficial piece of legislation. This is a bill for the organization of Congress which was sponsored in the Senate by Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, and will be sponsored in the House by Representative MONRONEY, of Oklahoma.

The bill makes many long overdue changes and simplifications in congressional procedure but it seems to us that one of them stands out conspicuously. This is a provision for budgetary reform, which, if carried out in the spirit in which it is conceived, will put this country a long way on the road back to fiscal sanity.

Under this provision of the organization bill, the revenue and appropriation committees of both House and Senate would submit to Congress within 60 days after the opening of each session a concurrent resolution setting over-all receipts and expenditures—they would have to be estimated, of course—for the coming fiscal year. If recommended expenditures exceed estimated receipts, Congress would be required to authorize creation of additional Federal debt in the amount of the excess.

This proposal would change the present system whereby the appropriations committees of Congress can, and usually do, operate without regard to what the taxing committees are doing; whereby there is not only lack of responsibility for Congress keeping expenditures within the limits of income, but, worse still, whereby there is not even a source of accurate information as to whether expenditures and income are likely to be in balance.

There is nothing in the organization bill to prevent Congress running a government deficit. What it would do is to bring the fiscal considerations of Congress into the full light of publicity. It would enable each Congressman and each citizen to have a readily understandable picture of what is going on.

The report on the over-all fiscal situation 60 days after Congress met would not only explain but it would dramatize the Federal Government's financial affairs. They would be described in a simple way. The citizen could form opinion and express his reaction.

If appropriations after being made were found to exceed estimates of receipts all appropriations, except those of a permanent nature such as debt interest or pensions, could be reduced by a uniform percentage through Presidential proclamation.

The proposed fiscal procedure is nothing more nor less than any business or individual would follow if he hoped to stay out of bankruptcy and it is not too much to say that the same end awaits a government which does not bring order into its spending.

There are many good aspects of this organization bill; reduction and consolidation of committees, higher salaries for Members of Congress, more trained assistants. All in all, it is aimed to restore to Congress the legislative functions, which the Constitution meant it to exercise but which in too many cases have been usurped by the Executive.

[From the Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times of June 13, 1946]

LA FOLLETTE'S WORK

Congratulations to the Senate, and in particular to Senator LA FOLLETTE, for the 49-to-16 vote in favor of the reorganization bill which embodied the report of the La Follette-Monroney committee. It was a victory for good government that was as welcome as it was unexpected. So many vested interests have been built up in the creaking machinery of Congress that few observers had anticipated either quick or affirmative action. Let this be a lesson to those of little faith. It is apparent now that more Senators than we had dreamed of had become troubled over the negativism and procrastination—inseparably associated with our Topsy-like system of government—which inhibits action in Congress. Improvement can come only from awareness, and the Senate has demonstrated that awareness. It is a heartening spectacle and we hope that statesmanship of the same order will be shown in the House when the Representatives begin their consideration of the Monroney bill.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, in presenting the legislation, referred to the criticism to which Congress is subject. He implied that much of it is unjust because "under our present archaic organization it is impossible for Congress to transact the business which it has become imperative that it handle." But institutions are man-made. Granted that the archaic organization has throttled action, yet the criticism of Congress has hitherto been justified by reason of congressional chariness to take remedial steps in streamlining the machinery. Indeed, the neglect has gone on so long that the La Follette bill should be regarded as only a first installment of improvement. The new bill, for instance, omits any recommendation for better means of selecting committee chairmen and personnel, for clarifying the powers of the tyrannical Rules Committee of the House, for experimentation with periods for questioning executive department heads, for the limitation of senatorial debate. We trust that Senator LA FOLLETTE will not tire of his well doing. He began something in the Senate that will be a lasting memorial to him, though we trust he will spare a niche in that memorial for the late Senator Francis Maloney, of Connecticut, who started the job that in the present instance the Senator from Wisconsin has so excellently finished.

AND NOW THE HOUSE

All eyes that are looking for the completion of congressional reform at the present session of Congress are now focused on Speaker SAM RAYBURN and the House Rules Committee. It is they who can transform into a reality the streamlining for which the Senate voted so overwhelmingly the other day. We are convinced that the rank and file of the House will vote for modernization of the agencies through which they must work if they get a chance. The full responsibility of giving them that chance falls upon the Speaker and the gentlemen who control the rule-making function.

The success of the reorganization bill in the Senate may be traced in large measure to the strategy that was followed. One complete bill was submitted. Instead of being referred to a regular committee unfamiliar with its provisions, it was sent to the six Senators who had long studied the complicated task of overhauling our legislative machinery. It was that special committee headed by Senator LA FOLLETTE that quickly whipped the bill into shape and presented it to the Senate with such cogency that it could not be resisted.

Obviously, then, the same strategy should be followed in the House. In that body, too, are six men who sat through the extensive hearings of the joint committee and participated in preparation of that committee's excellent report. Only by referring the Senate bill to them for further study and filling of the gap left for the committee structure of the House, will there be a fair chance of securing its enactment at the present session. If this strategy is followed, we are confident that Representative MONRONEY, vice chairman of the joint committee, will be able to pilot the bill through the House with skill equal to that of Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the Senate side.

Before this strategy can be put into effect, however, the Rules Committee and the Speaker must give their consent. We hope they properly sense the responsibility that is theirs. We hope they also realize the wrath that defeat of this vital measure would bring down upon their heads from an irate people intent on buttressing the machinery of democratic government. In this particular, the tide of progress, thank Heaven, seems to be running strong. We doubt that any group can block these essential improvements in the long run. All that obstructionists standing in the way temporarily could expect to accomplish would be to bring discredit upon themselves.

Reason for Sugar Shortage: Loss of Philippine Islands Production; Large Demands of Armed Forces; Shortage of Labor; Diversion of Raw Material for Manufacture of Industrial Alcohol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM R. THOM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, there are many erroneous ideas in circulation among consumers as to the reasons for the sugar shortage felt so keenly when the canning season comes around.

The North Canton Sun, a newspaper published at North Canton, Ohio, published the following editorial, attributing the scarcity to an unsound trading basis between the United States and Cuba. This editorial follows:

WHY CAN'T WE HAVE SOME SUGAR?

Housewives throughout this country, as well as industrial users of sugar like the bakers, confectioners, canners, ice cream manufacturers and others, would like to know why they "can't have sugar."

The war has been over for months and sugar is still scarce—still rationed. Why? What are the facts of the sugar shortage?

Sugar is a major and vital part of this country's diet, particularly those in the low income brackets. Sugar is the least expensive of all the basic foods. It is highest in energy value.

Housewives and the industrial users want an adequate supply of sugar at all times at a reasonable price. There doesn't seem to be any doubt of that.

Cuba, the largest sugar producer in the world, has been prepared to make available just such an adequate supply, according to the United States Cuban Sugar Council in New York City, but has often been prevented from doing so by restrictions imposed by the United States Government.

"No one will need to fear a sugar shortage, even in wartime," said a recent statement by the Council "if the sugar trade between the United States and Cuba were put on a sounder basis."

United States Government figures show that Cuba supplied almost 60 percent of the total sugar made available to the United States and the Allies in World War I and over the supply made available in World War II. Cuba has maintained, throughout war years, its high sugar production record when other suppliers of the United States market, for one reason or another, have been unable to do so.

Cuba has demonstrated both the capacity and the willingness to ship an adequate supply of sugar to United Statees consumers.

Sugar-hungry Americans can serve their own best interests by insisting that low-cost Cuban sugar reaches their dining tables and the plants which use sugar for many other kinds of foodstuffs.

In a desire to discover and publish the truth, I submitted the editorial to the Department of Agriculture, and I have received from Under Secretary N. E. Dodd, the following letter:

JUNE 21, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM R. THOM,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. THOM: This is in reply to your letter of May 31, 1946, enclosing a clipping from the North Canton Sun which was headed "Why can't we have some sugar?" The editorial attributes to the recently established United States Cuban Sugar Council the statement that "No one will need to fear a sugar shortage, even in wartime, if the sugar trade between the United States and Cuba were put on a sounder basis."

Sugar has been in short supply here during the war period primarily because of (a) the loss of the Philippine Islands' production, (b) large demands by our armed forces, (c) the diversion of raw material for the production of industrial alcohol, yeast, and citric acid instead of sugar, (d) the shortage of labor in the continental sugar producing areas and Hawaii, and (e) the need for the production of other crops on land which otherwise might have produced sugar beets. During this period our working stocks of sugar were reduced to a very low level. Since the close of active war the demand for sugar has continued at a high level and Cuban supplies have been shared with many other nations which are seriously in need of food.

It is true that beginning in 1934, when the Jones-Costigan Act was enacted by the Congress, marketings of sugar in the United States from various producing areas, including Cuba, became subject to the quota provisions of that legislation, or its successor, the Sugar Act of 1937, as amended. Under the emergency provision of this later act, the quotas have been in suspense since 1941. The determination of the size of these quotas has been a subject of much controversy. In his message to the Congress of February 8, 1934, President Roosevelt stated:

"Steadily increasing sugar production in the continental United States and in insular regions has created a price and marketing situation prejudicial to virtualy everyone interested. * * * The problem is difficult but can be solved if it is met squarely and if small temporary gains are sacrified to ultimate general advantage."

The outcome was legislation which represented a compromise on the important matter of quotas. Under the provisions of this legislation the United States was assured a diversified source of supply: continental, domestic insular, and foreign. Consequently when Axis submarines interfered with shipping during the early part of the war and seriously disrupted the ocean movement of sugar into this country from Cuba and Puerto Rico, substantial supplies were available in the continental producing areas. On the other hand, when beet sugar production in the continental United States declined in the period following our successful campaign against the submarines, it was possible to turn in increasing degree to Cuba for our supplies. With sugar quotas under suspension because of emergency conditions, the total Cuban production from the past several crops, other than that required for local use and for certain small South American markets, has been purchased by the United States Government.

It is for the Congress to determine, after full consideration of the conflicting claims of the various areas supplying the United States market, whether legislation shall be continued whereunder that market is to be divided among such areas.

Sincerely yours,

N. E. DODD,
Under Secretary.

Washington Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
Monday, June 24, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include a radio interview over Station WLW, Cincinnati, Ohio. As you know, Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been in Congress, I have been a stanch advocate of economy in Government, and I have exerted special efforts toward bringing about conditions which would be conducive to more efficient operation of the administration of our Government. When I think of the fact that my farmers work four times as many hours per year, and for less pay, than our Government employees, and that office workers in my district work from two to three times as many hours as do Government employees in Washington, I am compelled to continue my fight to save my taxpayers' money by removing the loafers from the Government pay roll.

WASHINGTON FRONT

(Radio interview with Representative EARL WILSON, of the Ninth District of Indiana)

Participants: Gilbert Kingsbury, radio commentator; EARL WILSON, Member of Congress.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Good evening from Washington. The Nation's station presents the sixty-seventh edition of the Washington Front, an examination of world and national affairs. Within the next few weeks, Congress will be called upon to complete action on no less than seven appropriation bills—money for Government operations for the coming year.

On Capitol Hill there is a growing demand for economy, a cut in Federal expenditures, fewer persons on the pay roll, and a reduction of Government functions.

Representative EARL WILSON, of Indiana, has been among those seeking a cut in the number of Federal workers. He has called for the elimination of many Federal activities. And tonight he's going to explain his position.

Representative WILSON is a former Indiana educator and is now completing his third term in Congress. He comes from the Ninth Indiana District.

Question 1. Congressman WILSON, to give us a basis for our discussion, would you explain your philosophy of government and the service it must give the people in return for taxes?

Representative WILSON. Mr. Kingsbury, may I take just a minute of our time to say how truly grateful I am for your kind invitation to be here tonight. I sincerely appreciate this opportunity to express myself directly to the people without benefit, as it were, of a news hawk's interpretation of what I say. I have found that the reporters often play to the whims of their reading public when some such newsy incident breaks. They are inclined to lift and distort from the whole for the sake of reader interest.

To the subject at hand, however, I must quote my favorite American and my political ideal, Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln said, "That government governs best which governs least." I am convinced that this was the basic philosophy of the men who wrote our Constitution, and I know that it was the conviction which fired the spirits of our Revolutionary forefathers. If this philosophy of government were put to work in our present top-heavy Washington bureaucracy, the sluggards, the drones, and the loafers on Government pay rolls would leave the Capital like so many foxes with their tails on fire.

My own philosophy is simply this: A dollar's worth of Government service for every dollar spent.

Question 2. I gather, then, Congressman, that you believe that many functions of Government invade the field of private enterprise. What specific functions would you eliminate?

Representative WILSON. I certainly do think that the Government has invaded the field of private enterprise. It has also usurped the liberties of the individual beyond limits never dreamed of by the founders of the country. The first thing I would suggest would be to take the hands and noses of the self-ordained experts of the OPA out of the business of our small businessmen. The OPA was a war agency set up to meet a war emergency. Its day is done and every day that it continues to wield power over our postwar production problems is just that much longer we shall have to get along without enough farm machinery, food, cars, refrigerators, or whatever else we need in the way of peacetime goods. The power to set prices and to control by the priority system the materials of reconversion should be taken from men whose main qualification for their jobs is their personal friendships with other men high in the administration. I'm pulling no punches, Mr. Kingsbury, I presume that my directness is permissible.

Question 3. How about such Government operations as the Rural Electrification Administration and the school-lunch program? Those programs have been under discussion recently.

Representative WILSON. I believe the Rural Electrification Administration is a fine organization. Bringing greater work-saving facilities to rural areas is a wonderful thing, and America boasts no more worthy group than her farmers who are undertaking to feed the world.

The school-lunch program under Federal subsidy I approve only because the individual schools in many cases could not support such a plan. As a former school man, I could never see America's children denied the food they need to grow into healthy useful citizens. I do hope, however, that Federal funds will never carry with them Federal controls whereby any administration can indoctrinate the minds of our children while it feeds their bodies. That was one of Hitler's points for control of his people. If the Federal Government is contributing to the school-lunch program in order to build healthy young Americans, I am all for it. If this aid to our youth is ever used to mold young party members, I am against it.

In the Washington News of Tuesday a reporter played the demagog to his subscribers in his comment on my 75-percent-reduction-in-Government-employees' program. However, on the same page appeared this headline in boldface type on a two-column story, "Four Government agencies probe." Imagine one agency's work being duplicated by three others.

Mr. Kingsbury, you would have a difficult time convincing my farm folk that Washington bureaus are doing a useful service when during the war such statements as these were sent out to farmers: One Texas cattleman applied for a permit to sell steers and was advised from Washington that he could not sell all of his steers, but would have to keep a certain percentage for breeding purposes.

A western sheepman wired Washington for a priority on tin roofing for sheep sheds and advised that his need was urgent since the lambing season was near. Some bureaucrat wired him back that tin roofing was scarce and suggested that he postpone the lambing season.

Then there is the story about the wiseacre in the Government whose conservation suggestion is a classic. He suggested to his department head that wear and tear on horseshoes could be saved if the farmers would remove the horses' shoes at night.

Question 4. Recently, Congressman WILSON, you charged that Government workers—under present schedules—work less than a half a year out of the full year. I wonder if you'd give us your figures on that—explain your charge?

Representative WILSON. That created quite a stir, didn't it? However, there was truth in what I said, and truth is always a sharp sword. I maintain that no Government employee under civil service works more than 216 days and those eligible for every day off provided for Government employes can work as little as 176 days and draw full salary.

I arrive at these figures in this way, Mr. Kingsbury: 52 Sundays off, 52 Saturdays off, 26 days annual leave or vacation, 15 days sick leave (which most employees use at random). Then we have New Year's Day, Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Fourth of July, Labor Day, Armistice Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas Day, and this usually becomes a week-end off, and we have 154 days off and all provided under the regulations.

Then we have travel time of 4 days in addition to leave for all employees living west of the Mississippi. There is provided 14 days of leave for former members of the Armed Forces who are in the active reserve.

Then we have the 15 minutes in the morning and 15 minutes in the afternoon allowed for a smoke, rest, or extra snack period. I have the word of employees themselves that it always takes at least 15 minutes in the line in the Government cafeterias and this plus the time to eat or drink and get back to their desks means a half hour to an hour twice a day. I have conservatively deducted a half hour, the minimum which in the course of the year (counting only the days present at work) amounts to nearly 17 days.

This brings the total to 189 days that it is possible for a Government worker to be off and yet draw full pay, or 176 work days for 365 days of pay.

These concrete figures do not include the days when an employee reports in but leaves to shop or get her hair done or stand in nylon lines for half a day.

Question 5. You've made some other charges, too, Congressman, charges that Government agencies fail to get a full day's work for a full day's pay. On what factors do you base that complaint?

Representative WILSON. I pretty well covered your question in the one before, Mr. Kingsbury, but I want to say that I base my case on the black-and-white statements of the workers themselves, and hundreds of them have written to agree with me and to call my attention to specific incidents in their own divisions or departments. On these facts and the signed statements of Government employees themselves, I base my charge that the Government is handling the people's business inefficiently and that we are paying too many people who "work" their Government instead of work for their Government.

Question 6. We've been talking, primarily, about conditions in Washington. What about conditions outside the Capital—in the Ohio Valley?

Representative WILSON. Conditions in the Ohio Valley; well, since the area is made up almost solely of good, hard-working farm folk who put in as much time in 72 days as a Government employee does in a whole year, I'd say that conditions aren't so good in the area. It will always seem the height of the ridiculous to me, Mr. Kingsbury, to ask men and women who work from sun up to dark to make this the greatest and richest Nation in the world in order to pay people at desks to work and loaf a 40-hour week. It's the perfect "cart before the horse" illustration. America was not built by three-fourths of the people living off the sweat of the brows of one-fourth and it is my firm conviction that America cannot survive under such a program. With the greatest food shortage in the country's and the world's history facing us, I think the Government—that is, this administration—should be paying more attention to getting the tools for farming into the hands of our farmers than tolerating on Federal pay rolls 78,000 men and women who have been listed repeatedly as communistic by the Committee on Un-American Activities. We're top heavy, or to put it more colorfully, we have too many passengers on our ship of state and not enough folk who will bend to the oars to keep us afloat. This is no luxury liner, but a very busy merchant ship where all hands abroad should be pulling their weight.

Question 7. Suppose, Congressman, that all that's been said is agreed to. Suppose it's decided to trim the Federal pay roll. There, are undoubtedly, many worthy workers in the Government. How would you go about eliminating the deadwood and protecting the superior worker?

Representative WILSON. The first thing I'd suggest would be to scrap the out-moded, muchly abused, so-called efficiency ratings now in operation under civil service. As it works today, it is but a weapon in the hands of unscrupulous supervisors and department heads. As the employees themselves report it to me, Mr. Kingsbury, no matter how efficiently a girl or man may do his work, if the supervisor does not like the way he or she "parts his hair," a high efficiency rating can be withheld, and therefore the lower-grade employee gets no chance at promotion. On the other hand, and again I am advised by the employees themselves, most of the supervisors have a little "inner kingdom and court" set up in each division. The inner courtiers are automatically pushed up and on, the rest are treated like stepchildren and kept behind the door when promotions or recognition is being passed out.

If this supervisory autocracy could be smashed and if some plan could be worked out which places a premium on performance and pays the employee proportionate to his efficiency and ingenuity on his job, I would think that Government service would have much greater appeal to much better qualified people. As it is, we lose our best to private industry, and most of the best never find their way into Government work, because they know what organized forces of "vested authority" they would have to combat to get recognition. It should be a badge of honor and a proud claim to say, "I work for the Government." That should mean that the speaker was of superior ability and of unusual qualifications. Instead, however, the means of getting ahead in the Government service has come to depend in too many cases on considerations which are better not discussed in public. Of this I am extremely sorry, and I hope to see an improvement.

Question 8. Thus far, Congressman, we've talked about the evils of government—the deadwood. Let's take another approach to the problem. Wouldn't better salaries attract better workers? What could the Government offer to obtain the finest brains?

Representative WILSON. If I knew the full answer to that one, I'd know the answer to the $64 question for sure. However, I can suggest some moves which I believe would put us on the right track to get better public servants in all departments of the Government. I would suggest that the Congress authorize a committee of investigators (and I do not mean a committee of Congressmen, who have plenty to do otherwise), but a committee made up of two or three leading industrial efficiency experts, men who have never been connected with the Government and therefore have not learned any of the bad habits which infect too high a percentage of those who get on the Government pay roll. In addition to the efficiency experts, there should be two professional Government men who should know and be able to substantiate the really necessary work the Government hires employees to do. I would not be averse to having two or three long-time Government employees (women if the G girls would feel better about it) made part of the committee. This group would be doing the people a great service and the bill authorizing the expenses of such an investigation would be supported by me wholeheartedly in the Congress.

Question 9. Conclusion: And now—our final question. How about summing up—in our remaining minute of time—our discussion here tonight?

Representative WILSON. Mr. Kingsbury, our Government has become big business, really big business, and we must stop operating it like a general store. The workings of the Government should be the most efficient in the world and a model for industry and management alike. If our form of government is to survive the threats of wars, communism, and bureaucracy it must become efficient or it will be undermined. As in a productive beehive, the drones must be eliminated if we are to secure our position as the leading nation in the world today.

As one of the editors of a city newspaper wrote the other day, and it bears repetition, "If private industry ran its business as the Government does it would go broke before it got started."

Thank you for having me on your Washington Front program. It has been a pleasure to be with you.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Thank you, Congressman WILSON.

Representative EARL WILSON, of Indiana, Congressman from the Ninth District of Indiana, was guest tonight on the Washington Front. He discussed the need for the elimination of Government functions and a reduction in the Federal pay roll.

Meat Prospects for Hungry Americans Will Grow Dim if British Hand-out Is Passed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, over 40 percent of the first billion dollars given Britain by the so-called British loan will immediately be used to buy up meat and related products in America.

Four hundred and twenty-five millions of this hand-out will be spent during the next 6 months for meat and other animal products, according to official estimates on page 179 of the hearings.

This quantity is estimated as minimum British demands. Armed with wartime priority powers, Secretary Henry Wallace will decide who gets meat—Americans or Englishmen. He can set aside any part of our production to supply English demands, ahead of our own people, who must pay the bill—regardless of who gets the meat.

Perhaps the present scarcity of meat is largely due to OPA uncertainty. However, it may be due in part to Government hoarding of supplies, to be sent to England immediately upon passage of the British hand-out.

Those who are going without meat may be interested in knowing where much of the meat will go if the House defies the people and votes for the British gift-loan.

Restrictions on Livestock Curb Leather

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday June 21, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an article which appeared in the Boston Herald on Friday, June 21, 1946, by W. E. Playfair:

RESTRICTIONS ON LIVESTOCK CURB LEATHER—JOBS OF 79,000 HANDS THREATENED UNLESS CONGRESS MOVES

(By W. E. Playfair)

Unless Congress moves swiftly to lift controls on livestock, New England's basic shoe industry, employing 79,000 workers, is in for one of the most serious crises in its history.

With an unprecedented demand for their product and a backlog of millions of dollars in orders which would keep them at peak production through September, shoe manufacturers are experiencing the tortures of Tantalus as they see their supplies of leather drying up, principally because of OPA blundering, and to a lesser extent Russia's operations in the international hide market.

EMPLOYMENT UP 15 PERCENT

Already the shortage of leather has caused interruptions in production in the past few weeks, although there has been no general shut-down of any group of factories which are operating on a day-to-day, hand-to-mouth basis. In some of the tanneries, staffs have been reduced and there have been sporadic lay-offs.

The worst of the crisis, spokesmen for the trade say, will come in the next 30 to 60 days, even if Congress acts favorably on the bill now before it to remove price controls on cattle July 1. That length of time would be required to bring the increased supply of hides into manufacture. If Congress fails to act, then the crisis will continue indefinitely and become more acute.

All this at a time when New England's shoe production was galloping along in the first quarter of 1946 at the record clip of 550,000,000 pairs a year, against the highest previous output of 498,000,000 pairs in 1941. The current production represents four pairs of shoes per person a year, compared with three pairs prewar and two during the shoe-rationing era. Employment in the industry has increased 15 percent since VJ-day.

Immediately after VJ-day, the shoe industry received increased quantities of leather, particularly of the heavy types used in men's shoes, as the Army and Navy cut back their demands from an average of 5,000,000 pairs a month to the present half-million. In the past 4 weeks, however, there has been a marked decline in the leather supply, owing to ill-considered OPA regulations which have driven most of the cattle—hides and all—into the country's biggest black market.

SLAUGHTERING ENTERS IN

In normal times almost 70 percent of all hides used in the manufacture of shoes come from the big packers and other federally inspected slaughterers. The sharp reduction in the number of cattle slaughtered by these plants has brought this ratio down to 30 percent today. The condition has been further aggravated by other Government regulations, particularly those applying to grain and feed, so that many of the packers are now operating at from 10 to 12 percent of capacity.

Hides that go into the black market are lost, of course. The operators in this area, who are primarily interested in meat, either destroy the hides or strip them so crudely as to make them unfit for tanning. Trade estimates indicate that in the first 5 months of this year there was a decline of almost 25 percent in the slaughter of federally inspected cattle, and of 15 percent of calves, from the corresponding period in 1945.

The United States has always been a heavy importer of hides and skins, bringing from abroad about one-fifth of all cattle hides and as high as 90 percent of all goatskins tanned in this country. But there is little help from this quarter now. For the international hide price controls set up during the war have virtually broken down, thanks to Russia.

HEAVY RUSSIAN BUYING

In the war years since VJ-day the American Government and 14 other nations controlled the prices of foreign hides and skins through the International Hides, Skins, and Leather Committee. Only last month President Truman supported the operations of this group and its control functions were continued in an effort to maintain ceiling prices on the domestic product.

Since certain sources withheld their hides and Russian buying was heavy, the Committee was compelled to increase prices constantly to obtain deliveries. Last month, for example, the price of India goatskins was raised 25 percent and of Latin-American cattle hides and calfskins from 15 to 20 percent. Russia proceeded to pay up to 15 percent above this figure, making heavy purchases in Argentina, which included finished leather and shoes, and disrupting the international machinery.

The net result will be that this country must export hides to other countries that are committee members, notably Great Britain and France, to fill the deficit. Reliable trade estimates are that the United States, instead of importing from four to five million cattle hides a year, as in the war years, will be compelled to export about 2,000,000, adding to the shortage here.

Meantime, the demand for shoes by the consuming public has continued at an abnormally high level ever since rationing ended. Sales are more than keeping pace with production, and no inventories have been accumulated. In this situation men, who insist on leather footwear, are in a worse plight than women, who do not.

OPTIMISM EXPRESSED

"In the hides-leather crises," Maxwell Field, executive vice president of the New England Shoe and Leather Association, said yesterday, "manufacturers are resorting to increased use of fabrics and plastic materials to supplement the lack of leather for women's shoes. Throughout the war and up to the present, they have been very ingenious in perfecting the use of materials unheard of before the war and developing new types of shoe construction.

"I remain optimistic that Congress will take the appropriate action and that the danger ahead will be averted. If controls on cattle are removed, we can expect a heavy flow of hides from the packers and an early improvement in the leather situation. In that case our shoe industry will continue to expand and 1946 will see all production records shattered."

But Field was a little reluctant to discuss what would happen if Congress did not act, and whether in that case "all God's chilluns" in New England and elsewhere would have something to wear on their feet.

A Bum Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank C. Waldrop from the Washington Times-Herald of June 25, 1946:

A BUM DEAL

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

From within the United States Treasury comes news of official discovery that the British have kidded us again, and about big money.

A person who was a member of then Secretary of the Treasury Vinson's original staff for handling the British proposal for a $4,400,000,000 "loan" discloses that Britain's claims of poverty are false, and recommends the loan be cut back, accordingly.

This analysis has been furnished to top governmental authorities. It is so important that we reprint it here in full without attempting to translate. It's plain enough, anyhow. Here it is, dated June 19:

"The British loan should be re-examined and cut down to size.

"Actual trade developments since VE-Day—as distinguished from the guesstimates made by those responsible for negotiating the loan—now demonstrate that the British do not need anything like the sum agreed on by the negotiators.

"As of last August the British claimed that in the first year following VE-day they would incur a balance of payments deficit of three billions and in the next 2 years a further deficit of two billions.

"The British estimate for the balance of payments in the crucial first year of transition was as follows (Mr. Clayton's testimony, Senate hearings, S. J. Res. 138, p. 118):

	In billions of dollars
Minimum imports, austerity level	5.2
Net balance on war expenditures	1.3
Total imports	6.5
Commercial exports	2.6
Net balance on invisible items	.6
Total exports	3.2

Deficit: $3,300,000,000.

"Ten months have now elapsed since VE-day and actual export and import figures are available against which to check the estimates made last August.

"British imports are actually running at a rate $1,000,000,000 less than they estimated. On the other hand, British exports are running at a rate $1,000,000,000 more than they estimated, thus reducing their estimated balance of payments deficit by $2,000,000,000.

"No information is currently available as to the actual developments with respect to the net war expenditures or the net balance on invisible items, but both these are very probably more favorable than was estimated last August.

"Taking into account the actual flow of commodities it is perfectly clear that the balance of payments deficit in the first year after VE-day will amount not to the three and three-tenths billions assumed in August of last year, but to no more than and probably much less than one and three-billions.

"This conclusion is confirmed by the British holdings of gold and dollar balances. During the last 10 months when the British expected a deficit in their balance of payments to cut sharply into their holdings of gold and dollar balances, nothing of that sort has occurred.

"According to British figures, their net holdings of gold and dollar balances at the end of the war amounted to $1,840,000,000. The latest figures supplied by the British show that 9 months later their net holdings were still $1,750,000,000.

"The decrease is accounted for by settlement of a Canadian account.

"It may be noted that as of April 1941 the British reported a net balance of gold and dollar exchange of zero.

"During the war and by reason of lend-lease and troop payments made to Americans throughout the empire their net balance of gold and dollar exchange increased to a level of approximately one and nine-tenths billions.

"There can be no doubt that during the war this country made a very powerful contribution to the improvement in the British gold and dollar balance position.

"The loan should be referred back to committee and cut down in size.

"The figures cited above demonstrate the British balance of payments is actually very much more favorable than assumed by the administration when it negotiated the loan. If the loan was proper on the basis of the estimates made in August, it is obviously too large in the light of actual developments.

"The administration has failed to supply the committees of Congress with information showing the actual course of trade developments. This was not the only item on which they have failed to tell the whole story.

"They did not point out that empire countries during the war enormously increased their holdings of gold and dollar balances. South Africa alone holds nine hundred millions, three times her prewar holdings. Nor did the administration indicate what it knew to be true, that the British liabilities to empire countries would be substantially reduced.

"The British owe India four and one-half billion, Egypt one and one-half billion, and Palestine five hundred and fifty million. These sums, the administration has been informed, will be settled just as lend-lease was settled, at a small fraction of the nominal indebtedness.

"In the light of these considerations a cut in the British loan is clearly indicated. Indeed, there is reason to believe that quite apart from any loan or gift the British can receive all the assistance they may need in their balance of payment problem through the International Fund.

"Through that fund, it may be recalled, the British can get without any struggle at all three hundred and fifty million every year to total one and three-tenths billion. If necessary they can, of course, receive much more than that."

There it is. Nobody in his right mind can misunderstand that memorandum. Nobody with the best interests of the United States at heart will ignore it.

The House of Representatives this week begins final consideration of that so-called "loan" to Britain. The memorandum quoted in full above shows as plain as day why that loan is a bum deal for the United States of America.

Instead of merely cutting it down, Congress will throw the loan out entirely if it wants to serve America first. At any rate, just remember what you read here. If the loan goes through there will be big trouble to follow—and never let it be said that we didn't know.

Preservation of World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I feel the special importance in the present epochal trend of international relations at the new crossroads of peace and war to bring before the Congress a sentiment which might contribute toward those intangible but most far-reaching moral and spiritual forces essential for not only the progress but also the very survival of civilization. As we have won the Second World War at tremendous cost of men and treasure as well as by indomitable spirit, we should devote at least equally unconquerable will to win the peace. Accordingly, despite the grave difficulties which we recognize today in the path of the United Nations, I urge the planting of fruitful seed for peace on fertile ground in one among other possible forms. I present this recommendation now in the hope that the period of adjournment of the Congress may offer a season for the deliberative reflection, less likely during the actual sessions, upon this touchstone to peace for which I ask your favorable consideration.

As a symbol of the goal for world peace in this atomic age, I propose that a monument be erected at the seat of the United Nations; and that as a spiritual force to make effective this symbol, I propose further that the following words be inscribed upon such monument: "War would ever be a fugitive if only Christ among us all might live."

These lines are from a poem, New Roads to Rome, by James Patrick McGovern. The poem, as the quoted words imply, presents without distinctions of creed, or color, or race the universal spiritual significance of Christ whose life was conducive to peace, good will, and love among mankind. New Roads to Rome was first published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on August 3, 1944, under unanimous consent obtained by Representative J. GLENN BEALL, of Maryland; it was reprinted in the Notre Dame Scholastic on August 4, 1944, and in the Christian Advocate on September 21, 1944; and it has since appeared in other religious, patriotic, fraternal, and general publications. Mr. McGovern, a former Army captain in the American Expeditionary Forces during the First World War, and a member of the Bethesda-Chevy Chase Post, No. 105, of The American Legion, Department of Maryland, has lived an uphill, public-spirited life as citizen, soldier, lawyer, and crusader. My knowledge of him relates to Arizona, to which he came from New York as a poor boy of broken health to win life and a living as the young editor of a tabloid form of newspaper which has become today one of the leading weeklies of the Southwest, The Coconino Sun, of Flagstaff.

OPA Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Sun of June 20, 1946:

ASKS OPA PROPAGANDA INQUIRY—THOMAS CITES PRESSURE DRIVE WITH PUBLIC FUNDS TO SAVE PRICE CONTROL AGENCY

(By Phelps Adams)

Representative J. PARNELL THOMAS, New Jersey Republican, introduced today a congressional resolution "to investigate the dissemination of propaganda by the Office of Price Administration."

The measure which was dropped in the hopper at the opening of the session of the House of Representatives at noon today, would require the OPA and all other wartime agencies of the Federal Government to provide the House Banking and Currency Committee with a complete statement of all public funds expended by them for radio broadcasts and news releases in support of the huge propaganda campaign which the Administration has been conducting for the last 4 months in an effort to prevent the enactment of any legislation which would curb the powers of the OPA.

The Thomas resolution was seen here today as an expression of the mounting congressional resentment against administration efforts to influence the action of the congressional conferees who are now meeting in secret sessions to iron out the differences between the Senate and House versions of the pending OPA extension bill.

RESTRICTIONS DIFFER

As the legislative situation stands at the moment both the House and the Senate—by heavy majorities—have passed bills extending the life of the OPA, but restricting in a number of important respects the existing power of OPA to throttle industrial production by regulating profits in accordance with the best economic and social concepts of the New Deal. The restrictions voted by the House, however, differ in many cases from those voted by the Senate.

In accordance with established parliamentary practice, therefore, both Houses have appointed conferees to meet and resolve the differences existing between them. The conferees will redraft the bill in secret, and will then present their version of the measure to the Senate and the House again where it must either be accepted or rejected without amendment.

Because the conferees appointed by each House are predominantly the administration leaders who handled the bill in that Chamber, and because the administration has consistently opposed any and all curbs upon the present powers of the OPA, a majority of those now engaged in rewriting the bill are entirely out of sympathy with the restrictions which were voted into the measure by the rank and file of the House and Senate membership over vigorous administration objections.

INTIMIDATION SEEN

The present purpose of the great propaganda campaign which the administration is now conducting through the press and radio on a Nation-wide scale, therefore, is to intimidate the congressional membership to the point where it will accept blindly the terms of the bill which the conferees, who represent the minority viewpoint of the administration, will ultimately present. Action in Congress must be completed within the next 10 days or the OPA will automatically die in its entirety.

What angers Congress chiefly and what has provoked the resentment that led to the introduction of the Thomas resolution today are the deception and misrepresentation that have characterized the administration's propaganda campaign.

No one is more anxious to prevent inflation than the Members of Congress who must face their constituents at the polls in the November elections. They have studied the whole problem of price controls and production for many months. They have heard hundreds of witnesses and have taken thousands of pages of testimony from persons representing every shade of economic opinion. They constitute today probably the best informed unbiased body of public opinion to be found anywhere in the country.

They have written bills which they believe will preserve the power of OPA to maintain a reasonable degree of price control on the one hand, and will tend on the other to prohibit those OPA practices and policies which demonstrably prevent industrial production today and which therefore create scarcities that perpetuate the need of price control.

The administration on its part, they charge, has completely ignored the weight of the evidence which has been written into the record at congressional hearings, and has persisted in a campaign of misinformation which is designed to convince the public that the bills now pending before Congress would destroy price control entirely and leave the citizenry at the mercy of an uncontrolled inflation.

Inspired stories about the dangerous rise in the cost of living have been broadcast widely during the past week despite the fact that all the price rises which have thus far occurred have been approved by the OPA itself.

During the last 48 hours nearly a dozen different Government agencies and officials have circulated dire warnings about the necessity of saving the OPA. The Acting Secretary of State and a spokesman for the Department of Agriculture denounced the pending bills on the grounds that they would interfere with the shipping of relief supplies to starving Europeans. Their argument was that the removal of price controls on meat would bring about an increase in supply, and a consequent shortage of grain feeds which now flow into European relief channels. This, of course, does not square at all with the OPA's insistent contention that price controls are not interfering with meat production. An unsuccessful attempt was made to draw former President Herbert Hoover into this phase of the controversy.

Housing Administrator Wilson W. Wyatt emerged with a statement that the lifting of price controls would wreck the housing program. Secretary of Commerce Wallace came up with one saying that the lifting of price controls would wreck business. Secretary af Labor Schwellenbach chimed in today with another one saying that the lifting of price controls would lead to another Nation-wide wave of strikes; and Director Chester Bowles, of the Office of Economic Stabilization, called another press conference today to add to the deluge of statements.

The truth is that neither the Senate nor the House OPA extension bills lift price controls save on a few specified items where existing controls are either preventing production or are no longer necessary because production has caught up with demand.

The truth also is that the OPA has been raising price ceilings right and left on hundreds of items ever since the extension bill was first brought up for debate in the House. Members of Congress believe that this was done partly for political reasons in an attempt to prevent the complete abolition of OPA and partly because it is impossible for OPA or any other agency to keep prices down while the administration is constantly encouraging wage increases on every hand.

Finally, they declare, the truth is that, with or without price control, the cost of living will continue to rise until production can be increased to meet demand, and that since the administration is apparently unwilling to create conditions which will encourage production Congress must at least curb those administrative practices which are now strangling the output of goods.

Commencement Address by Hon. Albert W. Hawkes, of New Jersey, at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 26 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Monday, June 24, 1946, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES] delivered the commencement address to the graduating class at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y. He chose for his subject Individual Responsibility and Freedom.

Union College conferred upon the Senator from New Jersey the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Laws, which is conferred only upon those who are likewise chosen an honorary Chancelor of the college.

In conferring the degree of Doctor of Civil Laws and selecting the Senator from New Jersey as its honorary Chancelor for the ensuing year, Union College conferred upon him one of the oldest and most distinguished honors of its kind in the history of American education. Union College was founded shortly after the Constitution of the United States was adopted, at a time when there was a new dawn of freedom. The Chancelorship was established 70 years ago, but during the war it has not been conferred upon anyone.

Among the distinguished holders of this position at Union College in past years will be found the names of Charles Evans Hughes, Joseph H. Choate, Elihu Root, William Howard Taft, Leonard Wood, John W. Davis, Bernard M. Baruch, Wendell L. Willkie, and Joseph Grew.

The commencement address was broadcast over Station WGY, from Schenectady. It is a very challenging address on a very challenging subject.

I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND FREEDOM

Union College and the Constitution of the United States, creating our great Federal Union, were born within 6 years of each other at the dawn of a new era in freedom.

Your college followed the precepts of the Declaration of Independence as a nonsectarian institution, thereby setting an example to many other schools and colleges of the Nation. This is undoubtedly the reason for the adoption of the name "Union" College, and proves that its founders were farsighted in recognizing that "in unity there is strength," and that opportunity for education should be open to all.

Whether or not we realize it, the barriers between different creeds and doctrines and forms of worship, as well as the barriers between different philosophies of life, are being broken down generation after generation.

The speed with which these barriers are totally destroyed is largely dependent upon true individual freedom of thought, expression and action with no iron curtains to bar from the rest of the world full information regarding the human relationships which exist in any part of the world. The United Nations organization can have no hope of peace unless and until we have full information under the limelight of publicity regarding the rules of conduct established by all governments for the proper control of their people in seeking justice, equity and equal opportunity for all as the only foundation upon which peace can survive.

This reminds me of an occurrence when the late Dr. S. Parkes Cadman was holding his question-and-answer session on the radio. Someone asked, "Dr. Cadman, do you believe the time will ever come when all Jews, Catholics and Protestants will worship one religion in the same church?" This was a pretty big question for the doctor, because he was talking to millions of Jews, Catholics and Protestants, but he hestitated only a few seconds when he replied, "Yes I do; but I don't mind saying that I would hate to be the first archbishop of the church!"

This leads me to say that in the United States of America we are 140,000,000 people born into the world without our consent and under the processes established by God Almighty. We are not responsible for what we are when we come into the world, but we should have a deep sense of responsibility regarding what we are when we leave the world.

Between the two points of birth and death the responsibility as to what we make of ourselves and what we do with the talents God has given us, is largely our own responsibility, and that is the responsibility I am going to talk about with you today.

Let us remember that Christ said, "the laborer is worthy of his hire," but He also talked about those who worked in the vineyard and referred to earning our living by the sweat of our brow. You should also remember, as you graduate from this college, that Christ called unto Him the men to whom He had given 1 talent, 2 talents, and 5 talents, and asked them for an accounting of their use of those talents. Your individual responsibility is to see that the talents that have been given to you are used in such a way that you can be satisfied when you have run your course—that you have been a good steward.

Thirty years after Union College was founded, it was recognized as standing on a par with Yale, Harvard, and Princeton. Today it has an extremely high rating, and the advantage of not being so large that an individual loses his identity. To me this is important.

Perhaps we might draw a little conclusion regarding Union as related to some of these other colleges, which are known as great storehouses of knowledge. The president of one of these great universities recently told me that the reason his university is such a great storehouse of knowledge is that the freshmen bring so much knowledge to the institution, and the seniors take so little away! I am informed that exactly the reverse is the case with Union—that the freshmen come here acknowledging their limited wisdom, and leave here with an abundance of knowledge.

Dr. Nott, who at the age of 30 became president of Union, served 62 years—probably longer than any other college president ever served in the United States. He invented many kinds of stoves, which may account for the heat that is put on the students here at Union by the president and professors. I am told the students leave Union well warmed up to the necessity of accomplishment.

Union has given to our country a President of the United States, 6 Cabinet members, 15 Members of the United States Senate, 91 Members of the National House of Representatives, 13 Governors of different States, 49 important diplomats, approximately 200 judges, 40 missionaries of prominence, 15 generals, 90 college presidents, and many others who have risen to prominence and success in their chosen fields. This is a fine accomplishment, when you consider the total output of graduates from Union as compared with all the other colleges and institutions of the Nation. It should add to your determination to continue the fine record of your college.

Your institution was blessed by having had the great Dr. Charles P. Steinmetz as head of your electrical department.

A few of your notable alumni are:

The present Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson.

William H. Seward, Secretary of State under Lincoln.

John Howard Payne, the author of Home, Sweet Home.

Lewis Henry Morgan, a founder of the science of anthropology.

Union College has had fine leadership since its foundation, and under your new President, Dr. Carter Davidson, your institution is again in the hands of a man with extensive experience and fine accomplishment in educational work. I wish for him and those associated with him the greatest success.

In the educational field, as in all walks of life, voluntary cooperation is vital for the accomplishment of the greatest results. No rule of conduct in a college can, of itself, give the student an education. The directors of the institution can prepare the way, but the student must seek in order to find and must knock in order to have it opened unto him, and must recognize established authority.

Years ago Dr. Al Stearns, the much respected and loved head of Andover School for Boys, told me of a strike by the students against the established rules of Andover. The students revolted and wrote to their parents for sympathy. Most parents furnished sympathy, and the revolt continued. The father of one boy, a leader in the school, studied his son's letter carefully, and finally sent the boy this telegram, "My dear son, I have received your letter of complaint against the established authority of the school. Steady, my boy, steady." This telegram stopped the revolt, and the boys went back to class determined to abide by the rules of the school until the unjust rulings could be changed by orderly process.

What a lesson that telegram would be to the world right now which is showing disregard for law and order, disregard for their chosen representatives, and trying to accomplish great things by disorderly processes! We can always afford to pay the price for doing things in an orderly, established way. We can only hope for peace on earth if we sacrifice speed for orderly process, based on the conviction that the great majority of the people wish to do the right thing when they understand.

One of the greatest scientists in the United States, who has made tremendous contribution to the discovery of nuclear energy and the atomic bomb, recently told me that the greatest value in the discovery was to be found in the fact that it demonstrated to all human beings throughout the earth, who can read and write and understand, that the human family has it within its power to destroy itself.

He hoped that, with the recognition of this fact, the human family would follow the course of making the necessary sacrifices to maintain peace, rather than use the atomic bomb for the destruction of the human family. He hoped that the discovery of the atomic bomb would cause people to accept ways and means for settling their differences, both great and small, in the local, national and international courts established for the purpose of settling all human disputes, without resorting to the use of power, which so frequently leads to the destruction of right by the power of might.

While we are referring to great men who have graduated from your college and performed their accomplishments in the world, I do not wish to forget that fine body of students and your alumni who went forth in World Wars I and II to defend the freedom which I am here today to talk about. Seventy-four of your students and alumni are listed as killed in action in World War II alone. Mrs. Hawkes and I understand this contribution to the welfare of free men, in view of the fact that we lost in this war our only son, the father of two fine children. In addition to these contributions, your college has handled a quota of more than 500 V-12 trainees, and to each of these men I extend my congratulations while we bow our heads in solemn reverence to those who made the supreme sacrifice.

I wish we could all understand what freedom is. I wish we could all understand how it is born. I wish we could all understand what it takes to preserve it in the true sense and meaning of the word.

You are graduating at a time when the people throughout the world are at the breaking point with freedom. You must fulfill your individual responsibility in deciding whether government will be the master or simply the agent of the people, subservient to their will.

Liberty is freedom, but freedom is not free. It is the most expensive thing in the world, because it is the most desired thing in the world. That is the reason millions of men and women have been willing to give up their lives, either in an effort to establish it, or in an effort to defend it when there is a threat to take it away.

If anything is certain, it is the fact that the price of freedom is full acceptance of individual responsibility on time.

Full acceptance of individual responsibility carries with it full contribution to the welfare of all the people who make up any nation, of which any particular individual is a part.

The national character can never be higher than the composite of the individual characters of the citizens who make up the nation.

In addition to accepting our full individual responsibility as citizens of our own country, we must see to it that our Nation justly and fairly accepts its national responsibility to the world.

In the case of our great country at this particular hour in history, our national responsibility is one that carries with it the penalty of leadership. That penalty will always continue so long as we are leaders.

To me it means doing a little more than our share in helping to raise the distressed nations of the world to their feet. However, it does not mean that we should foolishly jeopardize our own national safety by doing the things for other nations which they should do for themselves. It means temporarily helping them to get on their feet and to accept their own responsibilities. It means rendering that help on a practical, sound basis, tinctured with as much humaneness as is possible in the face of the conditions which confront our own people.

If we lose ourselves, we shall not save others, and if we fail to do those things that lie within our power, in cooperating with others to establish a way to peace, then we shall not save ourselves. We want a peace that keeps faith with the principles our armed forces, living and dead, fought to preserve.

We don't want a peace that compromises those principles or sanctions compromises by our allies over dead men's bodies. The way to peace on earth is a road paved with practical, concrete rules of human conduct, along which road we establish spiritual guideposts which point the way to the essence of the Golden Rule.

Hard-made laws without this spiritual seasoning can only lead to the curtailment or destruction of vital human liberties granted to mankind by God Almighty.

Freedom of the individual involves voluntary cooperation, because no one can be free who has to be forced by law or the strong arm of government to perform his functions of life in cooperation with the rest of mankind.

Our rule of action and human relationships must cause the heart and brain to function in proper proportions in directing our course of cooperation; and the conscience must not be put aside. Our human relations cannot be directed solely by the brain, because it is too calculating and cold. Neither can they be directed solely by the emotions of the heart, because they are too warm and often carry us astray.

A few of our most important individual responsibilities are:

1. To understand our form of government and its processes. To use actively and intelligently our right of suffrage to make necessary changes in accord with the prescribed methods in the Constitution. To remember, as you are embarking upon life's journey, that no accomplishment in life will be of any permanent value unless we preserve the foundation of government upon which rests our security and reward for accomplishment.

I had this indelibly impressed upon me when I flew over the ocean the day after VE-day and went through England, France, Germany, Italy, Malta, Greece, Africa, Palestine, and then flew home. I saw the results of the human family standing idly by while leaders usurped the powers that belonged to the people. I saw the results of the people looking to government for guaranteed security. I saw the results of the individual being willing to trade his freedoms and opportunities for government-guaranteed security which the citizen believed would relieve him of his individual responsibility.

The results were chaos, abject misery, suffering, starvation and death—all combined with injustices and inequities.

Greece, which was once the leader of the world, is now torn by factional differences, hatred and bitterness between groups, none of which have the vitally necessary regard for law and order. I remembered that 431 years before Christ, Pericles, in addressing the Athenian people in honor of the dead, made this remarkable statement, which should make every American pause and think—

"But before I praise the dead, I should like to point out by what principles of action we rose to power, and under what institutions and through what manner of life our empire became great. . . . We do not copy our neighbors, but are an example to them. It is true that we are called a democracy, for the administration is in the hands of the many and not of the few. But while the law secures equal justice to all alike in their private disputes, the claim of excellence is also recognized; and when a citizen is in any way distinguished, he is preferred to the public service, not as a matter of privilege, but as the reward of merit. To avow poverty with us is no disgrace; the true disgrace is in doing nothing to avoid it. An Athenian citizen does not neglect the state because he takes care of his own household; and even those of us who are engaged in business have a very fair idea of politics. We alone regard a man who takes no interest in public affairs, not as a harmless, but as a useless character; and if few of us are originators, we are all sound judges of a policy."

2. You have an individual responsibility to learn from the past for your guidance in the future. To know that wherever governments in the past have attempted to relieve the individual of his normal responsibilities and promised an easy life under government-guaranteed security, the scheme has ended up in the destruction of individual freedom. Grover Cleveland once said he understood it was the responsibility of the citizen to support the Government, but not the responsibility of Government to support the citizen.

Most of the former leading nations of the world lie in the international "junk pile," because the citizens have been willing to trade freedom for government-guaranteed security, which never matured. There is no substitute for diligent and efficient work, and any government rules, capitalistic rules, or labor union rules, which have as their objective the elimination of work, the reduction of efficiency, or the standardization of accomplishment, will end in failure.

What would you athletes in college think if the director of athletics should say to those seeking to enter athletic events, "Now, I want you to train diligently and avoid overindulgence in things that will interfere with your athletic success." Then you sacrifice and train and prepare for the competitive event, only to have the director of athletics say, just before the event, "Now, we don't want anyone to win; therefore, in the running of the 100-yard dash we are going to ask everyone to stop at the 95-yard line so you can all break the 100-yard tape simultaneously.

What a fine track team you would have through such standardization of accomplishment! You just wouldn't have anyone entering the athletic field. So it is in all walks of life.

3. It is your individual responsibility to remember also there is no substitute for honesty and integrity in whatever walk of life you choose. There can be no real success in the life of any individual unless it is attained on a foundation of honesty and integrity.

4. It is your individual responsibility to fight incessantly for the fair rights of minorities, realizing always, if you happen to be of the majority today, you may be of the minority tomorrow. In this fight to preserve the rights of minorities, it is your duty and responsibility to bring home to the minorities three of the cardinal rules of equity on the grounds that what they seek, they should likewise give.

(a) Equity aids the vigilant, not the slothful;

(b) He who seeks equity must do equity;

(c) He who comes into equity must do so with clean hands.

No minority group has a right to seek for itself that which it does not, or is unwilling to, grant to others. An organized minority that usurps power is quite as dangerous as an arbitrary majority that misuses power.

5. It is your individual responsibility, not only to your Nation, but to your Creator, to so use the talents with which God has endowed you, as to not only bring success to yourself, but to make a contribution to the welfare of the world, and thus serve your purpose in walking along life's highway. Just to live, and play, and die is not accomplishment.

6. You have an individual responsibility to develop and bring into general understanding the greatest science of them all—the science of human relationship. We have forged far ahead in our understanding and development in the applied sciences, but we, and all other people of the earth, have woefully failed in properly balancing scientific development with true understanding and application of the rules necessary in the science of human relationship.

I suggest here that the successful businessmen of this Nation should be willing to give 2 or 3 days a year of their time by presenting themselves at the different colleges to discuss this question of human relationship, and submit to questions and answers. I am willing to volunteer to be one of those men and to use my best efforts in securing volunteers throughout the United States for every college which may be interested.

In studying this great problem, we must remember that monopoly in the hands of any one group is quite as dangerous to the welfare of all as is monopoly in the hands of any other group. This is evidenced right now by the monopoly that has grown up in our society in the hands of labor leaders who apparently have the power without restraint of law to bring the Nation to its knees.

We have corrected, or attempted to correct, monopoly in capital. We must, in the true interest of the patriotic American working men and women, take wise and just steps to stop the monopolistic practices of labor leaders which interfere with the guaranteed rights of our free people. This must be done temperately and wisely without vengeance or bitterness or any effort at reprisal. It must just be in the interest of the people as a whole. That is one of your individual responsibilities.

Monopoly must not be permitted in this country in the ranks of ownership, labor, agriculture, religion, or any other phase of our life if we are to survive as a free people. Whenever any individual or group attempts to monopolize anything in the United States to the detriment of the welfare of the people, they should be controlled by law to the extent necessary to protect the interests of the people as a whole. There should be no excepticns to this rule.

Let each of us determine to rebuild the moral fiber of the people of our Nation, remembering that morals are always at a low ebb after a horrible war such as we have been through. We must preserve the vital and fundamental principles on which our great form of government has been built. It is our responsibility not to trade a success for a failure. There is pretty good evidence on the wall of history that we are a success, as compared with the rest of the world. Witness the fact that the world has come to us twice in the last 25 years imploring our aid to preserve the cause of freedom. The fact that hundreds of thousands of human beings all over the world are seeking entrance into this country as a permanent home, substantiates this claim of success, because people do not flock to failures. People flock to success.

It is just as unsound for anyone in public office to tell you that everything is all right in this country as it is to tell you that everything has gone to the dogs and there is no hope for the future. Neither statement is correct.

Everything is not all right. The people of the world are confused and in a state of bewilderment. Millions are seeking a way out without being willing to pay the price of solving the problems confronting us.

Some people say that no matter what our national debt is, we have nothing to worry about because we owe the money to ourselves.

Many are openly preaching group hatred, trying to pit capital against labor, and labor against capital.

Majorities are intolerant of minorities and minorities are intolerant of majorities.

If those involved in this process are permitted to be successful, then there is little opportunity for the development and success of the individual as a free man.

Of course, we owe our national debt to ourselves, but unless we repay those among us who have advanced the money, then we will have broken faith and repudiated the obligations of the people to each other, made through their government. Repudiation does not make for confidence, and without confidence and voluntary cooperation we can have no future success.

Unless and until the capitalist and the owners of property see that there can be no success with, or safety for, capital without the sanction and approval of a majority of the people, and unless and until the workman understands that his success and future prospects depend upon fair service in return for fair wages, and that fair wages can only come from the fruits of voluntary cooperative effort, then there is little hope of our making a success of reconversion from the war to normal peacetime operation.

For these and many other reasons, the future of this country will be what you make it. Youth of today is maturity tomorrow, and I here wish to call your attention to a few contributions that youth has made to this country and elsewhere. There are many other worthy examples of importance, but I note here:

Alexander Hamilton was a lieutenant colonel at 20, a framer of the Constitution of the United States at 30, and Secretary of the Treasury at 32; Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone at 28; George Eastman produced dry plates for photography at 26; George Westinghouse, an alumnus, invented the air brake at 22; Henry Ford produced his first motorcar at 29; Thomas Edison, an honorary alumnus, invented the incandescent lamp at 32; the Wright brothers were 32 and 36, respectively, at the time of their first air flight; Woolworth established his first store when 24; John D. Rockefeller organized the Standard Oil Co. when 31; John Wanamaker opened his first department store at 31; Lord Byron published his first book of poems at 19; Charles Dickens published his first book of Pickwick Papers at 24; John T. Delane was editor of the London Times at 23; Edward W. Bok was editor of the Ladies Home Journal at 26; Luther Burbank produced the "Burbank potato" at 22; Dr. Hyde became president of Bowdoin College at 27; Mark Hopkins became president of Williams College at 34; Dr. Eliot became president of Harvard at 35; Dr. Robert Hutchins became president of Chicago University at 30; your own Dr. Carter Davidson became president of Knox College at the age of 31.

This is the march of youth instead of the "march of time," and it indicates what is expected of you in the crisis ahead.

If you will accept your full individual responsibility and the students of other colleges will cooperate with you in accepting their full individual responsibility, then I have no fear for the future. Remember, the greatest accomplishments of mankind have been made when the troubles and problems of the world seemed insurmountable.

You will not attain your objectives if you agree with those who are preaching the philosophy that everything is going to be all right. I would change that little song to everything is going to be all right if the American citizen, who is qualified and equipped to do a job, will accept the full call of duty.

Let us remember always that individual responsibility is so interwoven with individual freedom that together they make the fabric of liberty, and if you destroy the warp, you destroy the woof.

There should be no room in your vocabulary for any words of failure as you embark upon the sea of life.

Fifty years ago, when I was 17 years of age, I remember telling my mother, "I wish I had been born 50 years sooner, because all the opportunities for advancement and success are gone."

She remarked, "No, my boy, there will be increasing opportunities for accomplishment as the world and the human family develop. They may be in different fields for different generations, but the opportunities will be there." She further said that success must not be measured in dollars, but rather must be measured in the value of the accomplishment to the welfare of the human family. She was right.

How often I have heard men and women say, "Why, I had that idea, and now this fellow has made millions out of it." My response to them was, as it is to you, that a good idea is of little or no value unless it is put into action. Success in life comes from thinking and acting on time.

I wish to tell you a story to strengthen your determination never to give up.

Two little frogs fell into a milk can. They fought vigorously for a while to get out. Finally one said to the other, "I am tired. We can never get out of here, so I am going to quit." He was drowned.

The other frog said to himself, "I will never give up so long as I live." He kept kicking away until he discovered he had churned the milk into a solid foundation of butter, which to him at that moment was the top of the world.

I urge you, who still live in a free country, to do your part in reharnessing government to make it the servant of the people. I urge you, in respect for the millions of boys who served in this war and the millions preceding them, who made the supreme effort and the supreme sacrifice in the cause of liberty, to try to find a fair balance in equity between all groups which make up our American system of freemen.

In closing, let us vow that we will not contribute to the tearing down of our national house; rather let us choose the right architects to repair and make the improvements desired at a rate of speed compatible with the preservation of our foundations and the principles vital to the safety of our superstructure. Then it will stand the storms of temporary differences which come from the processes of evolution in human desires and objectives. God grant you sustained determination and guidance to use your talents well. May you help solve the greatest objective of mankind—peace—not by force, but with freedom.

The Embattled Farmer

REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 25, the Washington Post reported Chairman of the Famine Emergency Committee Chester C. Davis as saying that the United States "is nearing its goal of 6,000,000 tons of wheat for famine relief in the first 6 months of 1946." Chairman Davis further stated that by June 30 there will be 5,723,000 tons of wheat in port, en route, or available for shipment.

What do these facts mean? Simply this: The American farmer who produces food crops is putting forth the greatest effort to do the most with the least of any single group in America today.

The latest census figures reveal that 7,500,000 Americans are now employed on farms. This number compares with the 7,500,000 Americans employed in trade and commerce and the 11,750,000 Americans employed in manufacturing. Farming, then, engages the services of enough Americans to make it the second or, at least the third occupation in this country from the numerical point of view. But we must not lose sight of the fact that 20 years ago farming was still America's chief job numerically. The demands of war, the lure of high wages in industry, and increased mechanization of all farm tasks have wrought this great change in the span of a single generation.

What has happened to the American farmer in the midst of this great change; a change as momentous as that of the so-called "industrial revolution" in England during the latter part of the eighteenth and the first part of the nineteenth centuries; a change of country-wide and worldwide significance which took place in approximately one-fifth the time as that of its earlier English counterpart?

The American farmer has not looked up from his labor. He has fed his family. He has fed his countrymen. He is now asked to feed the world.

With what human aid is the American farmer expected to do this tremendous task? With what hope of security? With what purely mechanical means of production?

Let us look at Nebraska.

Even before the war there was a population drift from the farm to the urban centers of industry. The armed services took 25 percent of Nebraska farmers and farm workers in the most efficient and productive age group. Slightly less than this percentage went into defense plants. The true picture of the farm labor supply in Nebraska during the war years is that 10 to 30 percent more food crops and more livestock were sent to market with between 46 and 47 percent less farm workers to do the job.

Do I hear the comment: "But that was during the war. The situation is bound to ease up now"?

The fact is that the situation is not easing up. It is, on the contrary, growing progressively more serious. Hundreds of Nebraska farm boys came back from the war with the determination to go into industry. Hundreds more had decided to take advantage of the educational privileges of the GI bill of rights and go to occupational schools or to colleges and professional institutions. Hundreds more were physically incapacitated for farm work because of wounds incurred in the defense of their country. Other hundreds of Nebraska farm boys will never return.

And it is difficult to recruit new labor from industry to the farm where wages are not so high and where—instead of an 8-hour day in an air-cooled factory—the farmer must work 16 hours a day, with the thermometer 109° in the shade—and no shade.

What about farm machinery? I have been told that some 2,000,000 tractors were released for domestic use during the war. That figure may be accurate. But I can assure you that Nebraska farmers never saw their full share, one-half of their share, or one-fourth of their share. The well-worn, overworked Nebraska tractors were held together—like the flying fortresses of Bataan—by chicken wire and good old-fashioned American mechanical ingenuity. They were held together by a bolt and a prayer.

It has been over a year since VE-day—nearly 10 months since VJ-day. It must be better now. But the truth is that the situation in regard to machinery is no better. In fact, to use a Biblical comparison, the farmer is today making more bricks with less straw. He, together with the Americans who went out on strikes and those who did not go out on strikes, has lost 3,000,000 autos and trucks, 415,000 washing machines, 95,000 electric ranges, 75,000 gas water heaters, and 3,000,000,000 board feet of lumber because of work stoppages due to industrial disputes. When you consider that the three major manufacturers of farm implements have been among the hardest hit by strikes, then you will realize the extent to which the farmer has been deprived in peace of the necessary equipment to make peace workable.

The Washington Star for June 25 quotes the Federal Reserve Board as the authority for the statement that "our production of industrial goods is now 64 percent above the average for 1936–39." And the Star goes on to quote the OPA as pointing out that "passenger-car tires are being turned out at the all-time record of 68,000,000 annually; that in April, 174,000 vacuum cleaners left the factories, 18,000 more than in any prewar month; that in the same month we made 177,000 washing machines, 19,000 better than the best previous month; and so on."

Just try telling this to the farm wife who has had to go back to scrubbing her clothes on a washboard or to the farmer who cannot get tires for love or money for his all-duty, ramshackle 1936 "Chevy" truck. If you do, you will resemble what a coal-mine owner might look like after walking through a John L. Lewis picket line in the year of law and order 1946.

The people in my district do not enjoy being told that they are getting what they know they are not.

The American farmer who turns out the food crops does not want a New Deal. He does not want an old deal. He wants a square deal. You want him to produce, labor, so that you can stay at your jobs rather than face the seething wrath of a hungry world. All right, then, give him the tools he needs to produce. Stay on the job yourself. You want him to produce, management, so that you can make a fair profit from your investment. All right, then, see to it that the goods that are produced are apportioned so that the man in the country gets as much as the man in the city, so the small-town dealers get the same percentage quota that the dealers do in Chicago, New York, Detroit, and San Francisco. You want him to produce, Government, so that taxes will be paid and budgets balanced. All right, then, see to it that the farmer gets protective and progressive laws, along with those that protect and advance labor, management, and commerce.

If the rest of America pitches in and helps the American farmer instead of hanging back and refusing to help or actually making it harder for him to turn out food crops, then there need be no worry about the farmer shouldering his rightful burden and doing more than his job.

Do you doubt the farmer's sincere determination to cooperate in order to bring a good way of life out of this seeming chaos of reconstruction? Listen to the pledge taken by young farm men and women at the sixteenth national 4-H camp recently held in Washington:

I pledge my head to clearer thinking, my heart to greater loyalty, my hands to larger service, my health to better living—for my club, my community, my country, and my world.

Listen to this pledge, you would-be betrayers of the Constitution: Listen, and be afraid. Listen to this pledge, you patriots of all parties, all races, all creeds, and all walks of life; listen, and gain new courage. Deprived of opportunity, the American farmer will still fight on for what makes this country great; and, should he be allowed to fall, we will all fall with him. Granted opportunity, the American farmer will go forward, hand in hand with his countrymen of other occupations, to attain a better future for every one of us.

Gallinger Hospital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to tell this House of my long interest and experience in hospitals and in the care of the sick. Nor is it necessary for me to remind you that I come to the well of the Chamber only when I am impelled by the gravity and seriousness of a problem.

I have asked for time this afternoon to discuss with you a situation that is quite definitely and indisputively one which we have neglected and set aside and mishandled for so long that a serious situation exists. I speak of Gallinger Municipal Hospital, the general hospital of the District of Columbia which in addition serves certain outlying areas for communicable disease and psychiatry. Many of the conditions existing there are a horror and a disgrace. I bring them to you with a keen sense that perhaps my own responsibility in the matter is greater than that of most of you because I have worked so many years in these fields. But there are any number of you who serve on hospital boards in your own communities who have been here much longer than I who have seen fit to turn away your heads even as I. This afternoon I propose to give you a picture of actual conditions presently existing in what should be the finest municipal hospital in the United States. These conditions are due fundamentally to our apathies, our carelessness, our failure to assume our responsibilities as the authoritative body in the situation.

Frankly, I have been shocked wide awake by the attitude that appears to be abroad among us that patients in Gallinger Hospital because many of them are indigent, unable to pay for their care, do not require what patients at other hospitals do. It would seem that it does not really matter if windows are not washed, cracks not mended, plaster not repaired, walls not painted; that it does not matter that there is little if any rubber protection for the beds, or even sheets in certain departments; that these patients do not need what is generally considered the decencies of adequate medical care.

Gallinger is the general hospital for the great metropolitan community of the District of Columbia—a community that has multiplied itself several times in these last years, and consequently increased its need for the kind of medical service that only a municipal hospital can give. A city such as this must have a hospital for communicable diseases to protect the whole population from epidemics and a psychiatric service to care for the mentally ill quite regardless of their ability to pay. In addition, a city of this size must have a place where those who can pay only a part or even no part at all of their care can be treated and nursed back to health. It is this place that Gallinger fills. It has all the departments other general hospitals have, including services for general medicine and surgery, pediatrics, obstetrics, crippled children, venereals, and other communicable disease requiring isolation, tuberculosis and psychiatry. It should not be compared with the Army and Navy hospitals of Walter Reed and Bethesda, nor with the specialized psychiatric hospital of St. Elizabeths but rather with the Philadelphia General, the Boston and St. Louis City, the great Cook County Hospital in Chicago, and so forth. Such comparison reveals that these great hospitals have virtually completed plants and in addition the people of those communities can go directly to their city councils or State legislatures with their complaints. Here in the District the people have little recourse. The responsibility upon us is therefore very great, Mr. Speaker, and I fear we have not been watchful stewards in their behalf.

Recently I spent a morning at what should be the finest municipal hospital in the United States. I found it on a beautiful location on the Anacostia River with a few well constructed buildings and some shockingly old ones. Accustomed to modern facilities I asked for the administration building. What a hunt that was—for there is not any. Mr. Speaker, we are expecting an economically functioning hospital that has no proper administration building.

There is nothing less economical than trying to function in old buildings as certain departments at Gallinger are having to do. Take as an example pediatrics. The one saving grace is that the wards have cubicles. But when I tell you that in spite of the fact that the new and very efficient superintendent is having the holes and the cracks filled in as he can with the small staff and the little money at his disposal, and that the utility rooms are sprayed three or four times a day and the wards as well, the roaches invade the cribs during the nights, you can perhaps get some idea of what the condition of that building is—and that is not the only one. I have heard Members of this House protest the insect world in their offices, I have heard no protests against the crawling population at our hospital.

The psychiatric building is quite unbelievable. It is so old that it has no elevators of any kind. This means that not only must all patients be carried up the difficult stairs, but that every single thing used by them and for them has to be carried up, too, and this when labor personnel has long been at a premium. Completely unadapted to the care of mentally ill people as the building is, we have supplied none of the facilities required in the treatment of such cases. We have not even seen to it that there is enough linen to make a change of sheets possible, nor have we supplied rubber protection for the horrible looking mattresses. We supply leather wristlets and anklets to immobilize the difficult patients to whom we give none of the treatments modern medicine has found helpful. There are a few bath tubs and two cabinets downstairs, but these cannot be used in bad weather as the roof leaks too badly and it is not possible to carry violent patients down and up and up and down anyway.

I suppose even this much in a great city like this where people come from everywhere and are suddenly taken ill, is better than nothing at all—but the sooner we get a new building for psychiatry the sooner can we build our self respect.

When we do build for psychiatry and the desperately needed buildings for pediatrics—for this we have appropriated—and crippled children, I trust we shall really do a job. We seem to have the habit of putting up four walls and a roof, so to speak, and expect such little things as facilities and paint and furnishings to drop from heaven.

I understand that a group of eminent psychiatrists has made a study of the psychiatric situation here and have given their unanimous approval of the plans worked out for an adequate psychiatric service at Gallinger. That should speed us on our way. Nor do we need to junk the present old building. We can remodel it for the treatment of chronic diseases and for convalescents. At the present time there is no provision at all for these important services.

We must not lag behind in the matter of a building for the crippled children. At the moment they are housed in a building at least 100 years old wholly inadequate in size and not even fireproof. I have no historic tale to connect with the children's building but believe it or not, Thomas Jefferson was taken care of when he had smallpox in the building now used for the rapid treatment center.

It is my understanding that in addition to a new pediatrics building we are at last providing funds for a clinical and pathological laboratory without which no modern hospital can function. Again let me urge that these funds be made adequate to furnish and equip these buildings adequately. A most necessary facility not yet provided for is the outpatient department where treatments of all kinds can be given, diagnosis made and illnesses averted.

Before I leave the physical side of the hospital I must tell you that everywhere I went during my morning at Gallinger I saw evidence that our efficient new superintendent was beginning to make inroads upon the dirt, the decay, the disrepair that was general when he took over less than a year ago. The underground passages are clean, though all need paint; windows have been washed at least once in most of the buildings, plaster patching is going on; such paint as he could secure is being put on empty wards with the hope that this may be done everywhere. Cracks and holes that serve as runways for the crawling population always present in old buildings especially in this climate are being filled in. Everywhere one sees that Dr. A. R. Sweeney, recently come from the Marine Hospital in Cleveland, is bringing his knowledge and his ability to bear upon the appalling problems that would have discouraged a less courageous man.

But no superintendent can build new buildings, put in modern equipment, patch plaster, renovate, paint without the understanding and backing of his board, and the appropriations necessary to carry out the needed reforms. Ultimately we are Dr. Sweeney's board, Mr. Speaker, and we need much more understanding and a great deal more firsthand knowledge.

Up to this point I have spoken only of the physical set-up of Gallinger. I should be doing less than my bit if I did not make an effort to bring to your attention the problems involved in the actual care of the sick for whom we are responsible. The food, for instance. Food is, after all, a very large part of a patient's need; 38 cents a day, Mr. Speaker, is pretty slim. Oh, yes; there is a somewhat larger amount allowed for tuberculosis patients, but even that is less than we housewives would think adequate to rebuild a sick body—and I seem to recall that German prisoners were fed on a 75-cent basis.

Most of all do I want to speak for a moment of the inadequate staff—from the cleaners up to the medicos. There are not enough of them and there cannot be enough of them unless we appropriate more money for them. Similar hospitals function on a basis of two employees per patient. Gallinger, so the superintendent tells me, is doing the best it can with less than one employee per patient. What the hospital will do after July 1 with a 40-hour week I cannot imagine. At the moment it would seem to me that more wards would have to be closed—a tragic eventuality. Already a 52-bed ward in TB and a 50-bed surgical ward has been close due to lack of personnel.

In spite of the lack of these beds during the fiscal year of 1945, 20,240 patients were admitted to the hospital, 2,524 births took place, 35,597 outpatient visits were made. Patient days in the hospital were 406,064. That represents an enormous expenditure of human energy, and, unfortunately, the numbers employed have not been sufficient to do a proper job.

I am quite well aware that more numbers were allowed than were actually employed, as it has been quite impossible to secure the necessary personnel; but more is involved than just permission to employ. Salaries and working conditions play a large part. When to these are added living conditions, we who are responsible have permitted a very serious obstacle to continue to exist.

The conference committee of the Congress in recommending a grant of $3,150,000 increased the House figure by $808,852, but $691,000 less than the amount recommended by the other body. My understanding is that that body based its figures upon the figures submitted by the hospital to meet the dramatic situation that will be created by the adoption on July 1 of the 40-hour week. I am informed by the committee clerk that in recommending this cut the conference committee maintained that the Senate figure would allow a 2-to-1 ratio of employees to patients, further contending that this is higher by 45 percent than the employee-to-patient ratio maintained in comparable hospitals elsewhere, and therefore Gallinger would be able to maintain a ratio similar to that of Bellevue in New York and Johns Hopkins in Baltimore. To begin with, Johns Hopkins is not a comparable hospital; and it is my understanding that this cut of nearly seven hundred thousand from the figures presented on a 40-hour-week basis will necessitate the closing of additional wards.

Worse even than that, it will mean little, if any, improvement in the care of the patients. Even though the appropriation allowed is considerably larger than that of last year, it seems to me that we are taking action that is not only penny-wise but pound-foolish, for it is a refusal on our part to look the problem squarely in the face and take sane steps to meet it.

One reason that I blame myself for leaving these matters so long to others is that the nursing situation at Gallinger was brought to my attention some time ago by the American Nurses' Association because there has been question as to the accrediting of the school of nursing. At that time a new nursing superintendent was being sought, and until one was found and time allowed for her to study the conditions nothing could be done.

The present superintendent of nurses comes from the splendid hospital in Binghamton, N. Y., peculiarly well equipped by both training and experience. She has accepted the challenge of the situation with a courage, I confess, I should not have had.

A group of municipal hospital buildings always presents a greater nursing problem than when all services are under one roof. When a goodly portion of these are antiquated beyond belief and tragically out of repair the problem is increased immeasurably. When, in addition, there are few tools to work with, then the situation can become quite intolerable.

Some of the buildings are a little better equipped than others. But in the old psychiatric building, where everything must be carried up and down by hand, there are not enough sheets to give a change of linen—few pillowcases, towels, and washcloths. There are no rubber protecting sheets there, and few anywhere in the hospital. Stop and get the picture for a moment.

Sutures for surgeons; rubber gloves for various treatments, examinations, and operations, clinical thermometers—often 1 to 52 patients; water pitchers; dishes for patients' food. As I understand it, these lacks are not wholly due to lack of funds but also to the required method of purchase.

The nursing care is made fantastically difficult by the fact that no aspect of the service is set up for economy and safety, and yet both are imperative factors which are taken for granted when a patient goes to a hospital today.

Because of the shortage of equipment it is not possible to teach and demonstrate good nursing care—not even such elemental matters as bath, skin care, oral hygiene, and wound care can be taught and followed up adequately. A nursing school is one of the most valuable assets in a municipal hospital, where so many varieties of cases are available for study and care. But if the nursing load of the hospital falls as heavily upon the unready student as it does at Gallinger, the nursing profession cannot continue to accredit the school and the students will not be eligible for registration.

One of the results of placing too much responsibility on the student group, with overlong periods of night duty, no recreational opportunities, no opportunity to practice good nursing procedure, is a very high illness rate, especially TB. Lack of clinical instructors added to the fact that students are supplying nursing service at Gallinger at the expense of their own instruction with the result that there are numerous failures in State board examinations.

If we had taken our responsibility in all these matters seriously we would not have permitted the nurses' residence to go unpainted, the furniture unrepaired for 24 years. Nor would we have failed to put in laundries and kitchens, both of which are essential in group living.

In 1945 a new wing was completed for a professional library. Libraries of this nature in any good school of nursing are supposed to have at least 1,000 text and reference books, ours has approximately 300. The entire residence administration is on a plane accommodating 25 or 50. The current housing load is 202.

All these things provide increasing problems difficult of solution. I confess to belief that the conference committee's recommendation does materially raise the amount with which the Superintendent will be able to work. Perhaps it was expecting too much to hope that the budget finally worked out on a basis of a minimum for adequate care and hospital maintenance should be granted. A very great deal can be done with the amount recommended. Perhaps the achievements will be dramatic enough to insure a more complete understanding of the complicated matters involved when another year brings us another budget.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, it is my earnest hope that all of us will take this responsibility for the health care of the unfortunate who are dependent upon our understanding for the care they receive.

Two Vacancies Needed on the Supreme Court

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK L. CHELF

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Louisville Courier-Journal:

TWO VACANCIES NEEDED ON THE SUPREME COURT

Both Justice Hugo L. Black and Justice Robert H. Jackson should resign from the Supreme Court. The Nation is shocked and disgusted by the revelation of their personal feud. It is plain that they could never serve together on another case with any proper degree of judicial impartiality.

This is one of the unhappy situations in which everybody comes out badly. Justice Black should never have sat on a case in which his law partner of 20 years ago represented one of the litigants. The Court had no authority to eliminate him from the Jewel Ridge case, but his own regard for his high position should have led him to eliminate himself, even though Court precedent was not conclusive on this point.

Chief Justice Stone had refused to serve under similar circumstances, making it clear that he considered such conduct improper. It is unfortunate that he pleaded his age as an excuse for not making an issue of this matter with Justice Black.

Justice Jackson, on the other hand, has disqualified himself for further service on the high Court by the violence of his attack on an associate. He directs his fire at a newspaper columnist, but Black is obviously the real target. Unflattering references in newspaper columns may be galling to any individual, but the man who accepts appointment on the Supreme Court surrenders the privilege of striking back at such annoyances.

The whole tone of the Jackson statement is bitterly intemperate. Further, he is less than honest in saying that he considers Black's connection with the Jewell Ridge case involves only lack of judgment, not lack of honor. If only a question of judgment were at stake, it would be not merely unwise but preposterous for Jackson to have uttered his blast. Obviously, questions of judgment frequently arise.

This mess cannot be cleaned up with the two warring Justices still on the Court. Neither will want to yield to the other, so both should step down. Both have given valuable service to the Court during their tenure, but their joint presence there now presents an impossible situation.

In fairness to Fred Vinson, who is about to assume the duties of Chief Justice, they should withdraw voluntarily and permit a reorganization of the Court.

What a Veteran Thinks of the War Assets Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every veteran in the country who has been misled and deceived by the War Assets Administration will be interested to know how a veteran feels about it. To my mind it is a disgrace that the majority in power permits the veterans to be given such an unconscionable run-around with reference to surplus property. Under leave to extend, I am inserting a statement by Lt. Comdr. Tyrrell Krum, which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of June 23, 1946:

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

(By Lt. Cmdr. Tyrrell Krum, USNR (retired))

By far the most heartening news for war veterans to come out of Capitol Hill for many a long day is the announcement by Representative SLAUGHTER, Missouri Democrat, that his special committee is about to examine the method by which war goods are being sold off.

The men and women who served in the armed forces in World War II have a big stake in the $20,000,000,000 worth of equipment and goods left over from the huge stock piles built up during the past 5 years.

And, with rare exceptions, about all that these veterans have been able to get of the surplus items which would mean so much in giving them a chance to get into a postwar business was a monumental run-around.

Every reputable veterans organization in the country has condemned the War Assets Administration for its mishandling of disposal problems. Even the left-of-center American Veterans' Committee which hugs closely to the national administration, has come out with demands that the whole surplus property disposal mess be dug into.

Senator WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, has denounced the WAA with accusation of a worse scandal than Teapot Dome.

In brief, from what I've heard in various parts of the country, a large part of the legion of 12,000,000 ex-servicemen is up in arms against the shoddy treatment they are getting all along the surplus property disposal line.

There was a time when it was evident that the Congress had foisted off a sham and a delusion in granting alleged preferences to veterans to purchase war goods no longer needed by the Government or the armed forces.

But the pressure was so terrific that late one afternoon there was jammed through a bill, intended to give war veterans top priority for what they wanted from Uncle's stock piles.

The only thing wrong with the scheme was that it merely added to the confusion and frustration. Because, as one veteran put it so aptly, the "preference we got from WAA was only a hunting license. We still have to find something to buy."

Time after time, according to authenticated reports surging into headquarters of old-line veterans' organizations, veterans of this war have scurried hither and yon only to find that items advertised "for sale to veterans only" had been picked over or had vanished entirely by the time they arrived.

And that's the key to the whole thing. With billions of dollars' worth of goods paid for by the taxpayers still in existence somewhere around the world, a veteran finds himself in direct competition with thousands of smart operators and speculators with well-lined purses and a total lack of scruples.

On three occasions in past months this writer has pointed out the injustices and inequities of the "phony" disposal processes. We're glad that Congress is about to pick up the ball and run with it.

But when the men on Capitol Hill get under way they shouldn't be deluded by a lot of rigged figures and WAA "bunk." They should summon the men who are most concerned—the veterans themselves.

Let these lads who fought and won this war tell of their travels here and there with their "hunting licenses," vainly seeking—at considerable money out of their own pockets—the things they need and the country wants them to have.

And another thing, Mr. SLAUGHTER and gentlemen of Congress:

Take a good look at exactly how WAA operates and see why so many second-hand stores, used-car dealers, and even big city department stores are able to offer great stocks of surplus war goods to veterans who can't get these things direct from their own Government.

In other words, who's running WAA—Uncle Sam or the sharpshooters with little black bags of greenbacks?

The Flag and Its Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. MILLET HAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a speech which I made at Millville, N. J., on the occasion of the community's celebration of Flag Day, June 16, 1946:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I must say to you at the outset that I have been deeply impressed with the Flag Day celebration, which today has been celebrated here. I want to compliment this community and its surroundings. It is quite clear to me that this is no mere gathering of people bent solely on enjoyment, but it is a true and serious demonstration of love of country and the flag which symbolizes it.

I have said many times before that the future strength of America depends upon the people of just such communities. The spotlight of national attention is focused on the Capitol at Washington, but ultimately, the great decisions which will profoundly affect the future of our country, and the future of the world, are born in the minds and hearts of people in thousands of communities like yours, scattered over the length and breadth of our Nation.

Our flag had its birth before the Nation itself was formed. It consisted of 13 stripes and its blue field first bore the cross of St. George and St. Andrew, signifying union with the mother country. This banner was first flown by ships of the Colonial Fleet in the Delaware River, nearby the spot where we now stand, in December of 1775. Even before that, a somewhat similar flag appeared as the standard of the famous Philadelphia troop of Light Horse, who escorted General Washington to his command of the Continental Army. And, of course, you all know that in the summer of 1776, Betsy Ross of Philadelphia sewed the flag which was adopted by the Continental Congress on June 14, 1777.

We, here in South Jersey, have pride in being citizens of one of the Thirteen Original Colonies and living within an hour's journey of the scenes where the flag was first created, and where it was first flown.

It goes without saying that we are here to celebrate not a mere piece of bunting; we pay our respects to the inspiring symbol of our country's glorious traditions. Henry Ward Beecher well said: "A thoughtful mind when it sees a nation's flag, sees not the flag, but the nation itself. And whatever may be its symbols, its insignia, he reads chiefly in the flag, the government, the principles, the truths, the history that belong to the nation that sets it forth. The American flag has been a symbol of liberty and men rejoiced in it."

Note well the words that he used. He was not talking about wealth or power, but of principles, truths, and liberty. It is with the eternal principles of our unique system of government, and my fear that we stray from them, that I concern myself with today.

The world is being torn asunder in a bitter struggle between two widely different philosophies of government. On one side are arrayed the forces who preach the doctrine of statism. The central theme of this doctrine is the belief that man, as an individual, is of no consequence; that his dignity, his liberty, and his freedom of action must either be wholly sacrificed or rigidly restrained for the good of the state itself. The state is master, the individual its servant. A dull and uniform security is the apparent goal, and a dull and uniform and regimented people is its prime characteristic. At the opposite pole, is the doctrine of democracy, which teaches—as does the Christian religion—that individual man is a creature of dignity and worth, that he has certain inalienable rights and liberties of which government, itself, cannot deprive him, and of which he may not be deprived by any pretext, no matter how plausible. Here the state is the servant and the people its masters.

The world is rapidly adopting statism. The sense of freedom and the desire for liberty has been greatly weakened since the day when those great ideals gave birth to our flag. By one name or another, whether you call it communism, totalitarianism, or fascism, Europe is drawing away from democracy, if indeed they ever fully understood or appreciated it. Russia, and the great group of satellite countries which it ruthlessly controls, obviously has no conception of its meaning. The defeated Axis Powers, who openly scoffed at individual freedom, have not learned their lesson. And even England, for centuries a stronghold of the rights of man, is rapidly traveling a road which leads away from freedom. Of all great powers, the United States of America alone remains a democracy, and whether we continue to be depends wholly on the wisdom of our people over a period of the next few years.

Democracy can survive, only as it affords a strong and competent government, alert to the interests of all of its people, and unswerving in its devotion to principles of individual freedom. We are being put to the test, and it is not entirely certain that we will meet it.

Many months ago we concluded with overwhelming victory a war fought with totalitarian states. If that war had any meaning at all, it was to preserve our way of life. Twelve million of our young men and women made great sacrifices for victory, and the industrial capacity and genius of the American people on the home front was strained in their support. After such a tremendous and successful effort, we are richly entitled to peace, and the products of peace, but we are failing to win the peace.

We own more than one-half of the world's coal, but we do not produce it. We can manufacture more steel and steel products than the rest of the world combined, but we are not doing it. We produce a surplus of food, but we can't buy it. During the war, we produced a quarter million airplanes, two and one-half million machine guns, 150,000 tanks, almost a million trucks, and more than $12,000,000,000 worth of electronics. Now we cannot get a truck, a radio, a shirt, or for that matter, a loaf of bread. The gallant men who won this war have come home to find a shortage of everything they require to get back into comfortable civilian life. We do not have houses in which they can live. We are short millions of homes, and the only answer that we can find is to give Mr. Wilson Wyatt dictatorial powers and $400,000,000 with which to start the hammers and saws of the country. I wish him luck, because no need is more acute, but I have grave doubts as to the methods we are using.

In the field of our foreign affairs, we are being outbluffed and outmaneuvered by Mr. Stalin. The European war has been concluded more than a year, the Japanese war for 9 months, and we have not commenced to write a single peace treaty, and if we have found Russia in agreement with us on any important matter since the fighting stopped, I am not aware of it.

In our laudable attempt to feed a hungry world, we are sending white flour to Japan, a country which heretofore has gotten along nicely on rice and fish, while the American housewife haunts the grocery stores for bread. We are sending thousands of tractors abroad, and telling our farmers to do without them for a few more years. In a recent conversation which I had with a highly placed official in the Department of State, he was bragging to me about the increased volume of our exports. Exports—exporting goods and material now vitally needed by our own economy.

I feel that the American people are convinced that we must participate fully in world affairs; that we must, for example, strongly support the United Nations; that we must do everything within our power to maintain world peace—because the next war, if there is one, will be the last war. And it won't last long, in the day of jet propulsion and atomic energy. Nevertheless, I venture to suggest that we put our own house in order before we settle the affairs of the world.

The executive department, with countless agencies and thousands more employees now than in wartime, is tangled up in its own red tape; the Congress itself is struggling with a parliamentary system that was antiquated 50 years ago; and now, as a crowning humiliation, the Supreme Court venerated for generations by all Americans, is engaging in a disorderly brawl.

I dislike exceedingly to paint so pessimistic a picture. It would be easy to look the other way, and say that everything will come out all right, but the stakes are too important. It is still true that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Upon the competence of your Government in the next few years depends the survival of democracy, itself. Upon the solution of these problems, both domestic and foreign, depends the welfare of your children and their very lives. Whether your boy will be drafted for a Third World War hinges upon the strength of government, and the wisdom of the people.

Above everything else, we have to recognize that the crisis which we presently face is the most serious that has ever confronted our people. The ordinary game of politics as usual, will not do the job. The answer will not be found in the quarrels of one group with another. Management and labor, storekeeper and farmer, all of our people, regardless of race or religion, must start fighting for each other, instead of against each other.

We can go forward to the greatest era of our history. We can achieve the greatest prosperity and the greatest social welfare that any people on earth have ever known. We can do all of these things without the sacrifice of a single important liberty or right that we have, and in the traditional American system, but we cannot do them without a revival of real old-fashioned patriotism and love of country. Nor can we do them without a spiritual reawakening; without a renewed recognition of the eternal truths of our religion. We must pull together as friends and neighbors.

Let me conclude with the thoughtful words of the late President Wilson, who said on another Flag Day years ago:

"This flag, which we honor and under which we serve, is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought and purpose as a Nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute those choices, whether in peace or in war. And yet, though silent, it speaks to us; speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us, and of the records they wrote upon it.

"We celebrate the day of its birth; and from its birth until now it has witnessed a great history, has floated on high the symbol of great events, or a great plan of life worked out by a great people. * * *

"Woe to the man or group of men that seek to stand in our way in this day of high resolution, when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the Nation. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new luster. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people."

God bless our great country, and its traditions, and help us to preserve its future.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am including as an extension of remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD certain editorials dealing with the subject of the reorganization of Congress.

First, may I include an excerpt from Mark Sullivan's letter of last week, which reads as follows:

What LA FOLLETTE and those associated with him did could have little value to them personally in the political sense. It contained no appeal to popular emotion, hardly even was it noticed. Had LA FOLLETTE, or any of those who worked with him, been primarily intent on his political fortunes, he could with complete justification have devoted that time and energy to oratory upon exciting questions, or to the politics of his State. Only conscience and sense of high duty could be served by the patient toil that went into the reorganization of our legislative machinery.

FLAWS OF DEPUTIZING

The heart of the problem was this: in the modern world, Government takes a hand in an increasing number of matters. To deal with these, Congress must set up administrative agencies. To the agencies it must give authority to make rules and regulations, binding upon the citizen. Presently, because of conditions that Congress could not foresee, and in some cases because of the human tendency of men composing the agencies to expand their authority and their functioning, things are done which Congress did not anticipate.

The problem became: how should Congress retain contact with, and some supervision over, the exercise by administrative agencies of authority which Congress had conferred? To do this the reorganization consolidates the existing 33 standing committees of the Senate into 16, each with carefully defined jurisdiction. Each main committee is the "opposite number" of—that is, corresponds to—agencies in the Executive Department.

Thus from day to day, whether Congress is in session or not, each committee will have continuing contact with the administrative agencies to which it is related.

The bill has passed the Senate and is now in the hands of the House and the lap of the gods.

The House Members of the committee referred to by Mark Sullivan are: MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, vice chairman; COX, of Georgia; LANE, of Massachusetts, representing the majority; and MICHENER, of Michigan; DIRKSEN, of Illinois; and PLUMLEY, of Vermont, representing the minority.

The editorials are from the Lewiston (Mo.) Sun of June 13, 1946; Boston (Mass.) Christian Science Monitor of June 13, 1946; Manchester (N. H.) Union of June 14, 1946; New Bedford (Mass.) Standard-Times of June 17, 1946; Burlington (Vt.) Free Press of June 18, 1946; St. Johnsbury (Vt.) Caledonian-Record of June 24, 1946.

Incidentally, this morning I have received the following telegram from Dudley Harmon, executive vice president of the New England Council:

BOSTON, MASS., June 25, 1946.

Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
Washington, D. C.:

With the passage by the Senate of the La Follette-Monroney bill for the reorganization of Congress may I remind you that the New England Council has approved and publicized to its members and affiliated organizations in New England the specific recommendations contained in the report of the Committee on Organization of Congress. It is our very earnest hope that you and other New England Members of the House of Representatives will encourage favorable action on this legislation free from crippling amendments prior to the adjournment of the present Congress.

DUDLEY HARMON,
Executive Vice President,
New England Council.

LONG-NEEDED ACTION

Largely unnoticed in the press of great national events, the Senate has voted an epochal bill overhauling the machinery of Congress and simplifying, to some degree, its cumbersome horse-and-buggy age procedure.

There was some doubt whether the bill would get by this session, and it still must be considered by the House. It ought to be enacted, and Senator LA FOLLETTE deserves a good deal of credit for introducing and shepherding the measure in its journey through the Senate.

Considering how the bill strikes at time-honored prerogatives and privileges, it is surprising that the final vote was 49 to 16. The die-hard enemies of it were mostly southerners, who fought the loss in patronage entailed by the reform measure, and gained some slight satisfaction by eliminating a provision which would have ended the patronage system in naming congressional employees, such as page boys and clerks.

But the really vital parts were salvaged. The bill reduces senatorial committees from 33 to 15, lifts congressional salaries from $10,000 to $15,000 a year, gives each Member a well-paid administrative assistant, sets up a pension plan for Congressmen, registers lobbyists, and strengthens Congress' watch over execution of laws by the President. Other provisions provide for clear-cut analyses of each agency of the executive branch, take away from Congressmen many of the time-wasting "chores" they are now burdened with, and set up better research facilities.

Taking the example of higher congressional pay alone, the salary boost is valuable in the inducement it offers able men to run for public office. If $15,000 sounds like a lot of money, it must be remembered that the 535 Senators and Representatives are the legislative custodians of this vast Nation. If the public wants good government it must be willing to see conditions created that will favor it.

One of the stanchest backers of the "streamlining" bill was Senator WALLACE WHITE, of Maine, and he made one of the best speeches for it. The Auburn man is a veteran of the Washington scene. Perhaps even some local people may have forgotten that he first came to the Capital as a clerk in 1899, 47 years ago. He told the Senate of the "leisurely" way that body then conducted its business, and said "my grandfather (Senator Frye), if he received 15 letters in the morning mail, thought he was being oppressed by the people of his State."

Thus he pointed out the contrast with today, when Members are deluged with correspondence and demands upon their time. And it is well that the Senate heeded his warning that its "prestige with the people" would suffer unless its methods were modernized.

Now it is up to the House to act in the same statesmanlike manner. It ought not to require repetition that we are living in momentous times that demand the closest attention and thought of every Congressman. They will serve all of us better if they are relieved of the tasks this bill would either eliminate or divert elsewhere.

[From the Boston (Mass.) Christian Science Monitor of June 13, 1946]

TO STRENGTHEN REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

The legislative machinery of the United States cannot rightfully be called a machine—it is an oxcart in an airplane age. It is so ill-fitted to the tasks now imposed on it that it frequently frustrates democratic purposes and weakens the people's trust in representative government. For these reasons Senate approval of the La Follette committee's proposed reorganization of Congress may become the most important action of this session.

This plan should have two effects: (1) To make Congress more effective and thereby make it stronger in relation to the President and the administrative agencies; (2) to facilitate cooperation between Congress and the Executive.

The first purpose would be achieved by streamlining the committee system, improving the clerical and research staffs available to Congressmen, and increasing salaries. If the reforms have the desired effect Congressmen would be able to free themselves from a vast burden of detail and to devote their best thought to vital questions of national and international policy.

The second major purpose of the La Follette-Monroney bill is to make the American form of representative government more responsible. It would do this by improving the coordination of parties within Congress and the coordination of the legislative and executive departments. The specific agencies proposed are policy committees for each party and a joint legislative-executive council.

The policy committees are designed to develop unity within each party in carrying out its platform pledges and party commitments. We have no assurance that such committees would do very much better than the present caucuses in establishing party responsibility, but they would have official standing and some other advantages.

The legislative-executive council could—if rightly developed—become a vital means of preventing the deadlocks which too often render American democracy governmentally impotent, and it could greatly assist voters in fixing responsibility as between Congress and the President in case of dispute—as at present over labor legislation, OPA, and the draft.

The congressional members of this council would be drawn entirely from the majority party. In this respect it would differ from the recent precedents of consultation between the Executive and foreign-relations leaders from both parties on the United Nations Charter. But conferences of the President with two-party committees are far less feasible on domestic legislation, and the proposed council holds more promise of achieving party responsibility. It also affords more hope of attaining legislative-executive cooperation than any plan we have seen that stays within the traditional lines of American government.

This bill is not a panacea. No machinery will achieve good government unless used by the people with alert and consecrated effort. But improved machinery can encourage that effort—improve its product. Senate approval of the La Follette-Monroney bill by an unexpectedly big majority is one of the most hopeful things that has happened since VJ-day. Public opinion should put a stout shoulder behind it to make sure that it gets through the House before vacations or vested interests can kill it.

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Union of June 14, 1946]

WELL DONE

The Senate merits congratulation for its prompt passage of the La Follette-Monroney reorganization bill with only slight modifications. This question, before Congress for a long time, has been blocked by the reluctance of Members to surrender certain cherished privileges. Meanwhile, the demand for reorganization of the congressional machinery has become more insistent, as the inability of Congress to meet the increasing pressure of multiplying responsibilities, became apparent. In deciding to meet the issue squarely and make the functioning of the Federal Government paramount, the Senate showed the right spirit. It is now up to the House to exercise the same good judgment.

In speaking of the Senate action, Senator LA FOLLETTE, chairman of the joint congressional committee charged with drafting the reorganization bill, stated that the "keystone of the arch" remained intact. In this statement, the Senator referred to the provisions consolidating the functions of standing committees.

Under these provisions the present number of 33 committees is reduced to 15, while the number of committees on which a Member may serve is limited to 2. Committees are authorized to appoint four professional staff members, in addition to the regular clerical staffs. Thus relieved of the present heavy load of routine committee work, it is hoped Members will be free for the more important task of shaping legislative policy.

In the matter of shaping policy, the Senate bill has another important provision, which requires that majority and minority party policy committees shall be formed to crystallize party policy. The policy committee of the party in power is to serve as a formal council to meet with the President and his Cabinet in order that the administration's major policies shall be formulated jointly by the executive and legislative branches. This is a constructive provision aimed at bridging the chasm that so often exists between the Executive and Congress in shaping the legislative program.

One other provision of importance is the requirement that the four revenue-raising and appropriating committees of the two Houses shall estimate expenditures and receipts at the beginning of each session and these estimates shall be binding. If receipts are found to fall below expenditures, the President shall be required to reduce appropriations made by Congress. Congress shall not be allowed to exceed estimated expenditures without a joint resolution to that effect. Thus at last the financial operations of Congress are brought within sound business limits.

With some other more minor provisions, these measures are intended to rid Congressmen of routine detail, and make the congressional machinery more efficient. If the Senate bill is passed by the House, we may hope to see a new era of congressional action begin.

[From the New Bedford (Mass.) Standard-Times of June 13, 1946]

STREAMLINED CONGRESS

Of the many provisions of the La Follette bill for the reorganization of Congress, one that promises an increase in efficiency provides that each committee, in drafting legislation, shall have the assistance of four experts. These experts are to be chosen on the basis of competence alone, and on the recommendation of the Director of Congressional Personnel—a new office which the bill creates.

In many fields, such as taxation for example, the practice has been for the administrative department directly concerned to present a draft of a bill and to assign its experts to the task of arguing in support of it before committee. All departments are heavily staffed with experts, and it is not always easy for the layman to evaluate their testimony. If committees of Congress can match experts of their own against the administrative experts, they will be in a better position to meet their responsibility for framing sound legislation.

Another provision of the La Follette bill which has merit is the one that assigns to each Member of Congress an administrative assistant whose duty it will be to assist the Member in carrying out his departmental business and other duties. This should relieve Representatives and Senators of the many nonlegislative tasks which are commonly listed under the heading of "errand-running," and have become burdensome.

Further to promote the aim of giving Members of Congress more time to devote to the major business of law-making is a prohibition of what are called private bills. These usually are concerned with small claims for damages, and the plan is to transfer the settlement of such claims to the Court of Claims.

[From the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press of June 18, 1946]

STREAMLINING CONGRESS

The Senate falsified some predictions by passing promptly and by a large majority the La Follette-Monroney congressional reorganization bill. On the objection of some southern Senators a provision removing certain appointments from congressional patronage were eliminated. But this characteristic clinging to an old privilege was a small matter compared with the advantages of the measure.

Congress has been blamed for delays on critically pressing measures, and sometimes the delays have been deliberate and indefensible, as in some Senate filibusters. But the vast numbers of bills before Congress, and the careful study required by many important measures, in addition to the numberless calls on the time of Members, made prompt action often impossible.

Among the provisions that will aid in hastening the transaction of legislative work is the consolidation of 33 Senate committees into 15, and the limitation of each Senator to two committees. In addition each executive department is made the special subject of consideration of one particular committee. This should insure adequate information in Congress on the work of each department. The work of each Member is lightened by providing for an administrative assistant at a salary of $8,000.

Equally important, and aimed at other significant results besides hastening legislation, is the formation of policy committees for both majority and minority parties. The policy committee of the majority party is expected to meet with the President and the Cabinet for the purpose of shaping majority policies. The purpose of this provision is clear. It should result in more carefully considered policies; it should greatly reduce friction between the President and Congress; it should above all tend to fix party responsibility. Clearly for efficient democratic government, there should be an effective majority policy as in Britain, without which the party and the Government as well may be at cross purposes, when a coalition of wings of both parties may otherwise result in a powerless administration.

Independent action of individual Members would always be possible, but such action would be taken in clear desertion of party policies, and would consequently be less frequent and less irresponsible.

The La Follette-Monroney bill now goes to the House. It is to be hoped that no supposed political or individual interest will prevent its prompt adoption.

[From the St. Johnsbury (Vt.) Caledonian-Record of June 24, 1946]

REORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

The Senate on June 10 passed the bill for the reorganization of the Congress and the measure will soon come up for debate in the House. The public in general has little idea of what it is all about, and, in particular, fail to realize the amount of time and energy expended by the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, of which Representative CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, of Vermont, was a valued member. This committee had the "intestinal fortitude" not only to bring in a report, but to draft a bill to carry out its recommendations.

The most important feature of the bill relates to congressional committees. The extent to which the work of Congress is carried on in committees is not generally realized by the layman. Committee assignments account for nearly 90 percent of the work of the national body on legislative matters. Termed the "workshop of Congress," the committee structure has long stood in need of modernization in order to meet present-day standards of efficiency.

It is now proposed that the 33 standing committees of the Senate be reduced to 16, with each Senator limited to membership on two committees. In the House, the present 48 standing committees would be reduced to 18, limiting each House Member to service on one major committee.

Of equal importance are provisions of the bill for easing the nonlegislative work of Members of the Congress. Testimony introduced at hearings on the bill, held over a period of more than a year, indicated that as high as 80 percent of the time of the average Member is spent on nonlegislative work. Expansion of governmental activities has greatly increased the volume of correspondence and requests for service from the Member's home State and district. Such service is now a generally accepted part of the duties of a Member and affords a means of direct contact with constituents.

The bill provides for increased help to Congressmen. If the pending measure becomes law as presently drawn, each senatorial and congressional office will be authorized to employ an administrative assistant to aid Members in performing nonlegislative duties and thus permit the Member to give more time to the study and consideration of national legislation.

Other recommendations of the joint committee embodied in the bill provide means of legislative reform which cannot be considered at length in this brief review. Such recommendations include pay increases; staff experts for reorganized legislative committees; enlargement of legislative reference service and the establishment of a congressional personnel office. Only with regard to this last-named provision did the Senate balk, fearful of being deprived of patronage founded on long-established tradition. But this was a comparatively minor matter and its failure to be included in the bill passed by the Senate in no way struck at the heart of the measure.

What is important is the need of reforming the committee structure. Nearly 50 years ago, Woodrow Wilson, a professor at Princeton, inveighed against the committee structure of the Congress, referring to the committees as "little legislatures." The number and extent of such committees has for too many years created a barrier to efficient lawmaking for all the people. That reform is now actually under way is the best possible news for all Americans interested in the art of efficient government.

The Senate has passed the reorganization bill and one hurdle has been overcome. Whether the bill will pass the House is another question. It will doubtless be attacked and amended. Then there will be a conference and some good is bourd to result. The importance of Senate passage of the bill cannot be overemphasized. For it is in the Senate where tradition is exceptionally strong. It is certain that when debate opens in the House, PLUMLEY, of Vermont, a member of the joint committee which drafted the measure, will be found in the front ranks of its advocates, ready to share with his fellow Members the benefits of his own years of observation and experience relating to the work of the Congress.

OPA Ceiling Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, a friend of mine sent me the following letter. It speaks for itself and needs no further comment by me.

JULY 27, 1945.

DEAR GENE: Beginning with your postscript, I can't imagine what curse would be on you to inspire you to ask questions about Holy Writ. Ask me what God said to Moses on Mount Sinai, how many sardines in a can, or what became of last year's snow; but when you ask how the ceiling prices were originally established on print cloth, brother, you reach a new high in abstract interrogation.

I am not privileged to sit in on the inner councils of OPA, and I am hardly in their confidence at all, so I can only surmise the method of computation. I think they took the average rainfall of the Gobi Desert, divided by the current rate of exchange of Greek drachmas to the pound sterling, subtracted the specific gravity of mercury at 72° F., multiplied by Elliott Roosevelt's percentage of settlement with his creditors, and gave you the answer in price schedule No. 35, as presently amended.

There was a guy in OPA at the beginning who suggested that they take the cost of production, plus a reasonable profit, but they threw him off the roof of Federal office building No. 1. He is now running a black market in brains in Washington, and starving to death, so he must have been crazy, too.

Are there any more questions?

As ever,

FRANK.

An Intimate Message From Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Richard L. Strout:

GOOD ENOUGH FOR HENRY CLAY, BUT—

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—America has grown, the world has shrunk, but the procedure of Congress has remained the same. That, in a sentence, is the reason for the fight to modernize Congress today. The need is made vivid by the reminiscences of some of the old-time Congressmen who have seen the spectacular change—and who feel a terrifying urgency to modernize antiquated congressional procedure which otherwise can't keep abreast of modern problems.

Take Senator WALLACE H. WHITE, Republican, of Maine, for instance. He came to Washington in 1899 as clerk to his grandfather, Senator William P. Frye, Republican, of Maine, chairman of the Commerce Committee and at one time President pro tempore of the Senate.

Not so tough a job being clerk to a Senator in 1899. The other day he told his colleagues that his grandfather felt himself abused by constituents if he received as many as 15 letters a day. The young secretary in all the years he served did not keep a single letter which he received, nor did he bother to keep a copy of a letter which he wrote in reply.

It was a calm, leisurely era, judging by present standards. Contrast to that easy-going period recent weeks in the Senate where the office of Senator WHITE has received hundreds of letters a day over the single OPA bill. Senator WHITE is the minority leader of the upper Chamber. The old-fashioned methods of running Congress, he told his colleagues, "are utterly unable to cope" with current problems. He favors the pending La Follette-Monroney modernizing bill which, among other things, reduces the number of committees from 33 to 16, attempts to bridge the gulf between the Legislature and the Executive, provides a modernized system of accounting, stronger clerical staffs, and higher salaries.

Even in relatively recent days, the legislative pace was much slower than now, Mr. WHITE recalled. He told of speaking with "Ted" Clark, a generation ago, the then secretary to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, the elder, of Massachusetts, and later secretary to President Coolidge. They were chatting about a manuscript Clark was carrying.

"It's a speech Senator Lodge is going to make in the Senate," Clark explained. "I am getting ready to rewrite it for the eighth time."

Senator WHITE emphasized the words "eighth time." In those days, he pointed out, a Senator like Lodge "had time, and took time to rewrite a speech eight times before delivering it on the floor of the Senate." Today, on the contrary, Senators feel themselves lucky if they are able to follow current legislation at all.

Formerly the Senate's time was not crowded. Today it is jammed. In the old days they could hear floor debates and attend committee hearings, study the RECORD, and discuss the issues. Today, Mr. WHITE commented sorrowfully:

"I believe that very few of us have that time now."

Majority Leader BARKLEY took the matter back to a still older day. He recalled his famous fellow Kentuckian, Henry Clay. Mr. BARKLEY described his first visit to the former's spacious estate in Lexington, Ky. With some awe the man who is present leader of the Upper Chamber was shown a little depression under a row of trees where Henry Clay had worn a path, walking back and forth during the recesses of Congress, arms folded behind him, preparing speeches which he would deliver when Congress reassembled the following December, 6 months later.

Mr. BARKLEY turned half sadly, half ironically, to the other Members of the Senate as he told this story: "How many of them nowadays," he asked whimsically, "have time to fold their arms behind them, march back and forth under a grove of trees, and prepare speeches which they will make in the Senate next January?" Not many of them, he opined, with the load of drudgery and detail which they carry today.

Henry Clay seems a long way off. But he is connected with the present by the fact that much the same Senate rules under which he worked continue today. The world changes, but the procedure of Congress remains about the way it was. Senators BARKLEY and WHITE and many other veterans who have the good name of Congress at heart warn that it must be modernized if it is to fulfill democracy's task.

Closing of Coast Guard Stations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, a very serious situation has arisen with respect to the closing of Coast Guard stations along the coast for lack of funds and personnel. If it is not remedied, I am afraid it will result in loss of life because these stations for many years have done an extremely valuable job of protection along our coast. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including two editorials on the subject, one entitled "A Death Sentence We Should All Protest," in the Cape May County Times, and the other in the Wildwood Leader entitled "What Justification Can There Be?" The editorials follow:

A DEATH SENTENCE WE SHOULD ALL PROTEST

Protests against the closing of all Coast Guard stations between Cape May and Atlantic City continue to reach the hands of the Navy Department and New Jersey Congressmen.

There should be no let-ups in the protests.

With the Coast Guard stations of Ocean City, Corsons Inlet, Sea Isle City, Avalon, Stone Harbor, and Hereford Inlet abandoned by the Government, except for caretakers, the area from Cape May to Atlantic City is now entirely without protection for boatmen for the first time since the establishment many years ago of the old life-saving service from which the Coast Guard was created.

This would be an unbelievable situation—if we didn't know it to be true.

The closing of a few of the stations might be justifiable. Abandoning all of them is inexcusable, for by so doing our Government has, unless it reopens at least four of them, condemned a number of boatmen, perhaps eventually many of them, to death.

Cape May countians, as individuals and collectively as organizations, should let the Government know how they feel about the death sentence it has so callously imposed on no one knows how many persons.

Get your protest off at once.

WHAT JUSTIFICATION CAN THERE BE?

One wonders what justification can be found for the closing of the Hereford Inlet Coast Guard Station. That it has saved more lives than most of the other stations on the Atlantic coast is a well-known fact. Its record stands high, if not the highest, for efficiency in doing that for which the Coast Guard exists and for which Coast Guard stations were established and maintained. Less than 2 weeks ago seven persons were rescued from drowning when their boat capsized. The Hereford Inlet Station is one of the oldest on the coast, and throughout its existence it has played a major role in the saving of lives. If that be the purpose of Coast Guard stations, what justification can there be for the order from Washington which places the station on the inactive list? Are lives less valuable on the Jersey coast than they are in certain other sections of the coast?

With the station on inactive status, there is to be no one in the lookout tower, entailing great danger to commercial and fishing craft.

During its long life the station has been fortunate in having had exceptionally efficient men in charge. The present efficient chief, Lt. Charles Hargis, in commenting upon the station's closing, is reported as saying: "This move certainly deprives the public of something they are paying for. The commercial and fishing craft will be in danger, and I predict that many lives will be lost. With the closing of this station there will be no look-out station along the coast." The only service to be available will be that of the air-sea rescue unit stationed at Cape May. The stations at Ocean City, Strathmere, Townsends Inlet, Avalon, and Stone Harbor are already virtually closed.

So far as can be learned, the excuse given for the closing of the Hereford Inlet Station is the shortage of personnel and the cutting of the Coast Guard program by the Congress to the tune of $20,000,000. That may be taken as the conversion of the service from wartime basis to peacetime, and no one expects to have the Coast Guard continue as it was during the days of war. But the Coast Guard program is primarily one of peacetime. It was established not so much to serve as a fighting unit, nor even to assist fighting units, as it was to serve in time of peace. To curtail that activity is to deny the American people the protection to which they are entitled and for the giving of which the Coast Guard has existed these many years.

A few petitions about the matter have already been sent to our representatives in government. The Greater Wildwood Chamber of Commerce has appointed a committee to contact Congressmen T. MILLET HAND and United States Senators H. ALEXANDER SMITH and ALBERT W. HAWKES. Undoubtedly these men are cognizant of the situation, but undoubtedly, also, they will be more zealous in their efforts to keep Hereford Inlet Coast Guard Station open if they know that the matter is something in which voters are interested, and to that end it would not be amiss if voters were to write and tell them so.

Highway Robbery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 21, 1946:

HIGHWAY ROBBERY

Why it has taken the Senate Judiciary Committee more than 3 years to make up its mind that robbery and extortion interfering with interstate commerce ought to be forbidden by Federal law is one of the inexplicable mysteries of our time. There is no uncertainty in the public mind. Nor in the past were these crimes, when affecting interstate commerce, looked upon with indifference by Congress. Twelve years ago that body enacted penalties for any person attempting to obtain the payment of money by force, violence, or coercion., But since the Supreme Court in 1942 held that this act did not apply to racketeers acting under the cloak of a labor union, the Senate has pusillanimously failed to correct the judicial blunder.

Apparently President Truman's endorsement of the objectives of the Hobbs bill in his veto of the Case bill gave the Senate committee a modicum of courage. In any event, it has given its blessing to this anti-racketeering measure twice passed by the House. That seems to insure its enactment. We cannot imagine the Senate as a body turning it down, for the bill does nothing more than to make it unmistakably plain that robbery and extortion are not legitimate methods for unions or their members to employ.

It is true that President Truman asked for some changes in the Hobbs bill—changes which the Senate Judiciary Committee did not see fit to make. But we doubt that he will insist on such amendments when he has had an opportunity to study the bill in detail. The phrase to which he referred as being omitted—that forbidding construction of the law so as to "impair, diminish, or in any manner affect the rights of bona fide labor organizations in lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof"—is precisely the language upon which the Supreme Court seized in scuttling the previous act. To insert such language in the new bill in the light of the Court's attitude would be to make it a farce.

The bill as it stands removes all doubt that any right of organized labor under the Clayton, Norris-LaGuardia, Railway Labor, and National Labor Relations Acts would be disturbed. It is aimed solely at a particular type of lawlessness for which no justification whatever can be found.

We hope the Senate and the President will act promptly. No argument for delay until a comprehensive labor bill can be shaped is effective in this case. Apparently the practice of holding up trucks on the highways and robbing their nonunion drivers of a day's wages or even the amount of the union initiation fee has spread since the Supreme Court struck down the Federal penalties for such conduct. One report says that as many as a thousand truck drivers a night are being robbed. To leave that outrage uncorrected would scarcely be conducive to clear consciences for Senators during the forthcoming vacation period.

Importance of America's Investors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, June 26 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received a letter and enclosure from my friend, Dr. B. C. Forbes, president of the Investors League, which I ask be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. Dr. Forbes, who is, of course, also known as the publisher of Forbes magazine, has submitted to me an article from another renowned publication, the Saturday Evening Post, regarding the crucial significance of America's great investing public.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter addressed to me by Dr. Forbes and the article from the Saturday Evening Post be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

INVESTORS LEAGUE, INC.,
New York, N. Y., June 24, 1946.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Remembering your own stirring efforts on behalf of America's 15,000,000 small investors, I felt that you might be interested in the enclosed Saturday Evening Post editorial on this same theme.

The editorial confirms the view which you have so ably upheld in many public statements and actions, and which the Investors League, through its forums, publications, and other activities, has also advanced namely, that on the well-being of America's investors and its great middle class depends the well-being of all America.

It occurs to me that in furtherance of your efforts to protect America's investors, you might care to have this illuminating editorial reproduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

More power to you and all your legislative colleagues who are nobly fighting to preserve American freedom of opportunity and America's uniquely high standards of living.

Yours very sincerely,

B. C. FORBES.

[From the Saturday Evening Post of June 8, 1946]

"THE INVESTOR" IS ALMOST EVERYBODY

The foes of our economic system have had remarkable success in at least one respect. By processes so gradual and subtle as to defy analysis, they have caused millions of people to think of corporations as invariably wicked profiteers intent on enslaving their workers; and to sneer at investors as low, calculating, and fabulously rich men who, if they paid enough taxes, could support the rest of us in idleness. The result is that millions of Americans contemplate with delight the woes of corporations and the impoverishment of investors—without suspecting how deeply that ubiquitous little man is involved in the fate of these capitalistic entities.

Essentially the corporation is only a legal device by which the savings of millions of people can be utilized in enterprises which few of them, as individuals, could carry on alone.

And the despised investors, whose impoverishment brings pleasure to so-called progressives, are people who have put their savings at the disposal of corporations in the hope of receiving a profit or at least breaking even.

The investor may be a millionaire, although millionaires represent but an infinitesimal fraction of investors. Far more likely, the investor is you—as an owner of stocks and bonds, or an insurance policy, or an annuity, or a savings-bank deposit. Or it is the widow of a saving citizen trying to make ends meet on the dwindling proceeds of the small trust estate he managed to leave behind him. The investor is also the labor union which may be using its funds to finance a strike which will lower the return on its own investment. In short, in a society based on investment, it would be pretty hard to pick out anybody outside the almshouse and guarantee that he isn't in some respect an investor.

Even as a beneficiary of social security, you have an interest in the success of investment, taxes on which are the basic source of the payments made to old people or the unemployed. The same is true of you as a patient in an endowed hospital, or as a participant in a private pension or group-medicine plan, or as a veteran attending college by virtue of the GI bill of rights. The money for all these social services must be set aside from taxes on current profit. If we consume the profit as we go, instead of investing it in new productive enterprise, it will not be long before the source of our social services will dry up.

Furthermore, if our collectivists succeeded in collectivizing us, we would still be investors. The difference would be that the investing would be done for us, with no choice of risks by the individual. Instead of tempting savings out of the sock, the users of capital, who would be the Government, would extort our money from us as Stalin seized the crops of the kulaks, so that Russia could invest the proceeds in the engineering supplies necessary for the 5-year plan. We Americans built up our own economy from voluntary savings and the savings of foreigners invested in our railways and utilities. However we organize our economy in the future, we shall still need investment from somewhere. Large and small investors handling over their savings to corporations represent the best way yet discovered to mobilize our resources and still keep liberty. How well are we preserving the conditions under which such investment is possible?

The facts are not encouraging. L. Robert Driver, a New York tax expert and financial analyst who was formerly with the SEC, has compiled some interesting figures showing what has happened to income from investments in recent years as compared to what has happened to income in the form of wages. Between 1939 and 1946, Mr. Driver shows, average industrial wages in the United States rose from $1,24[illegible] to $2,386. These figures include both skilled and unskilled workers, and overtime payments have been estimated. Otherwise they would be much higher. In the same 7 years the income from $33,000 invested in bonds dropped from $1,241 to $825. In other words, the man who left $33,000 in insurance or other capital to provide $1,241 a year for his widow ought to have put aside almost $50,000 to produce that amount. To leave the equivalent of his wages at the 1946 level, he would have to have saved $95,400.

When you consider the case of the large investor, the facts are even more striking, although most of us think we are indifferent to what happens to him. To show what is going on, Mr. Driver cites the case of a rich man in New York who is married and has an income for 1946 of $1,500,000, representing a 3 percent return on his investment. After paying his Federal income tax, this man would retain $228,000 of his $1,500,000. The New York State income tax would cut this down to $221,000. If he saves $100,000 of this, and invests it in bonds yielding 2.39 percent, his gross return would be $2,390, but all that he would have left after taxes for his bracket would be $312.50. If this investor dies and leaves $50,000,000 in stocks and bonds, the Federal and New York estate taxes will take $38,700,000, to pay which his heirs will be forced to sell the greater part of his holdings.

That a redistribution of wealth is in progress is shown by a study of Statistics of Income issued by the United States Treasury. Therein we find that the percentage of dividends paid to persons with incomes of $1,000,000 or more had declined from 1.53 percent in 1939 to 0.92 percent in 1942. The same statistical source reveals for 1942 that 90 percent of all salaries and wages and 53 percent of all other classes of income were received by taxpayers having net incomes of less than $5,000. The actual percentage is undoubtedly higher because the figures do not include income received by persons with incomes too small to require the filing of a tax return. Whatever is happening to the poor, the rich can hardly be said to be getting richer.

The net of it is that, having decided to dissipate the great fortunes which have until recently provided a large proportion of new investments, we are now forced to rely on the mass of small investors for the money to reconvert industrial plants, re-equip rail roads and utilities, and in general do over America for the brave new world. However, if the war against saving is carried much further, our users of capital will be driven to Government lending agencies, with the inevitable evils that arise when investment is made, not to produce a profit, but to augment political power, and it is immaterial what party is in control. For the little people the prospect would be much as the London Sunday Times lately stated it: "The worker will face a single vast monopolistic employer—the state—whom he can neither emulate nor fight."

Most of these evils can be avoided if the so-called common man will consult his own interest instead of letting demagogs and executive secretaries of leftist committees define it for him. If he did that, he might even champion the right of the investor to his just share of the pie, if only on the ground that, when you come down to earth, we are all investors.

The Palestine Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, June 26 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received an important letter from Maj. Nathan Ruby, vice chairman of the Political Action Committee for Palestine, with headquarters in New York City, calling my attention to a letter written by his committee to the Secretary of State, submitting its views and suggestions with regard to the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry. I ask consent to have this letter printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE FOR PALESTINE, INC.,
New York, N. Y., June 17, 1946.

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We have the honor, on behalf of the Political Action Committee for Palestine, to acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 27, 1946, inviting our committee to submit its views and suggestions with regard to the report of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

We regret that beyond its recommendation for the immediate admission of 100,000 European Jews into Palestine, the said committe has served no purpose other than to delay the carrying out of President Truman's original recommendation of September 1945. It seems to us that the report has completely ignored the letter and spirit of the Palestine Mandate and the factors which brought it into being.

Just as the Churchill white paper of 1922, which disclaimed the intention of creating a Jewish state in Palestine and established the concept of economic absorptive capacity of the country as a limiting factor, led to the first failure (appendix IV, p. 88, report); and just as the Passfield white paper of 1930, which proposed further restrictions on immigration and more stringent limitations on land purchase rights, led to the second failure (appendix IV, p. 89), the inescapable conclusion to which the report of the Anglo-American Committee points, is, that the third major attempt to settle the Palestine problem is about to fail.

The evil was inherent in the terms of reference imposed upon the committee.

Examination of the terms of reference reveals that the underlying problem of carrying out the terms of the mandate, which required the mandatory power to facilitate Jewish immigration to Palestine and to encourage close settlement on the land therein, has been completely evaded. The recommendations sought for by the terms of reference as to immigration are only such as are limited by conditions which were not contained in the mandate, but which were sought to be imposed by successive white papers in open violation thereof, even though the Permanent Mandate Commission of the League of Nations in 1939 unanimously held them to be in conflict with the interpretation which the mandatory, in concurrence with the organs of the League, had itself put upon the mandate in the past (appendix IV, p. 93).

The committee regards the Palestine problem as a battle between the Jew and the Arab. In considering the problem from a local standpoint, it ignores the mandate.

The mandate's objective should have been the first consideration of the committee in its deliberations and in its permanent recommendations. That Palestine was conceived in the minds of all representative statesmen as the land where the Jews were to reconstitute their national home and that their national home was to be a Jewish state is beyond cavil. The committee ignores that the Palestine mandate, created by the League of Nations, specifically provided for a Jewish agency. (This does not constitute an endorsement by us of the leadership and political conduct of that agency.) No agency charged with equal responsibility and authority was provided for the Arab. No mention is made of an Arab agency. The Arab was to receive equal civil and religious rights as an integral part of a Jewish state. It was never intended that the Arab create a state within a state of equal and independent political significance. The introduction by the inquiry committee of a so-called test between Arab and Jew long plotted by the British Government and originally conceived by the late Lord Moyne is to recommend the virtual nullification of the Palestine mandate and the erasure of Jewish statehood and nationhood.

In line with the committee's disregard of the mandate, it speaks of the Arab being in the majority in Palestine. However, it does not speak about the unconscionable methods of Great Britain as the mandatory, in excluding 1,500,000 European Jews from the shores of Eretz Israel. Not alone white papers but sheer force has kept the Jew from being in the majority in Palestine. Remember the Struma! Remember the Patria! The present Arab majority in Palestine is not the decisive factor. The mandate placed Palestine in trust for the Jews wherever they may be. The 1,500,000 European Jews forcibly excluded from Palestine and their 600,000 brethren in Palestine constitute a true majority today. Therefore, the European Jews and the Palestinian Jews must be looked upon as an ethno-political entity with Palestine as its national territory.

In view of Great Britain's policy of exclusion, the committee's bland declaration that the mandatory's regulations as to immigration must be obeyed and that every immigrant who enters otherwise must be considered an illegal immigrant, and this, despite the specific injunction of the mandate that Jewish immigration is to be facilitated and that no immigrant is to be barred because of his religious belief (arts. 6, 15), is inconceivable.

It becomes clear that by its very terms of reference, the inquiry was foredoomed to failure.

The haste with which the committee was required to deal with the subject further gravitated toward a superficial and inconclusive set of recommendations. Further, the fact that the committee spent from January 4 to February 5 in Washington and London; and from February 5 to 25 in Europe where the committee was partitioned into subcommittees; and arrived in Palestine on March 6, whence it left on March 28, and while in Palestine, subcommittees visited Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Saudi-Arabia, and Trans-Jordan, it should be noted that only a fraction of the 120 days allowed the committee was spent at the scenes (Europe and Palestine) where the real problems exist.

A careful reading of the report and its appendices illuminates certain inescapable conclusions. These are that at least 1,500,000 Jewish survivors left in Europe after the murder of 6,000,000 Jews (and not 5,000,000, as stated by the committee), are impelled and desire to go to Palestine for the most cogent reasons from Europe, "the cemetery of European Jewry"; that their continued presence in Europe, without means of livelihood, is corrosive of their morale since they feel trapped with all doors shut to them and no exit; that opposed are the effendis, a small number of self-styled leaders of a semi-feudal society, who were guilty of stirring up bloody revolt from 1923 to 1939, and who shun any democratic process, such as elections for the Arab Higher Committee or the formation of popularly based political parties; that the Arab masses in Palestine have a much better standard of living than their fellows in the six Arab states by reason of Jewish industry, agriculture, and the introduction of western culture; and that the only opposition to unrestricted Jewish immigration are a handful of Arab rebels and the reinforcements which they may receive from Syria and other members of the Pan-Arab League.

Without belaboring the point, we quote from the report itself:

"We know of no country to which the great majority can go in the immediate future other than Palestine. Furthermore, that is where almost all of them want to go. There they are sure that they will receive a welcome denied them elsewhere. There they hope to enjoy peace and rebuild their lives" (p. 15).

The findings of the committee itself, as indicated by the above quotation, leaves little choice as to where the Jew is to go. We differ, however, with the committee for limiting its observation to the "immediate future." It is universally known that a raging anti-Semitism has seized Europe. This vicious and wicked spirit is deep-rooted. In view of the shattered economy of Europe, every attempt will be made to keep the Jew a subhuman second-class citizen to prevent him from being integrated into the national economy and to withhold from him the property from which he has been expropriated. Therefore, not alone will the Jew be excluded from a normal life in Europe during the "immediate future," but also for a full generation at least. This is the realistic view that dissolves any Utopian hopes expressed by the committee.

The suggestion of the committee that a portion of European Jewry might also be admitted in lands other than Palestine carries little weight in view of world conditions. At best, it would depend upon the largess of these other lands, whereas Palestine is the Jews' historically and by international covenant.

The report is also remarkable for the large number of manifest breaches of the mandate by the mandatory power which are recorded in the text. Thus, the denial by the land regulations of 1940 to the Jews of the right to settle 95 percent of Palestine in direct violation of the express terms of the mandate as to close settlement; the slowing up by the mandatory power of the development of the Jewish national home since the white paper of 1930, to placate opposition; the announcement that the obligation to foster the creation of the Jewish national home had been fulfilled, and limiting Jewish immigration to 75,000 during 5 years, in direct contravention of the mandate; the maintenance of British officials exclusively in the central administration and districts, in disregard of the mandate provisions calling for the institution of self-government; the autocratic regime suppressing all civil liberties and aping totalitarian methods with death penalties after a drumhead court martial.

All this as the bitter reward for the Jews who built a healthy community by tilling the soil and turning desert and swamp into a land flowing with milk and honey, relying on the promises of protection from the mandatory, which purportedly yielded to "force" and by all the foregoing breaches of trust, aided and abetted the death of hundreds of thousands of Jews in the gas chambers of Europe, who might have escaped if the homeland had not been closed to them, in violation of the letter and spirit of the mandate; nay, in violation of the elementary principles of humanity.

After setting forth this sordid story of betrayal and treachery, the report, at chapter X, coolly assumes that the British Government will in the near future prepare a draft trusteeship agreement for eventual submission to the United Nations.

It is submitted that no municipal tribunal would reappoint any trustee guilty of these breaches of fiduciary duty openly perpetrated by the mandatory power. Great Britain must not be permitted to benefit from her own breach of trust by continuing its policy of dividing the inhabitants of Palestine against each other; by her perfidious policies in an attempt to justify the maintenance there, instead of in Egypt as heretofore, of a military force for the ulterior motive of protecting her lines of empire.

In compliance with your request, we are privileged to make the following suggestion:

(a) It should be the unalterable policy of this country, through its representatives to the Council of the United Nations, that under no circumstances should Great Britain continue to be the trustee or even one of the trustees of Palestine, and that no force other than the security force of the United Nations should set foot on Palestinian soil.

(b) This country, in all justice, should recognize European and Palestinian Jewry, as an ethno-political entity with Palestine as its national territory and, as the Jewish state, be granted a seat in the United Nations.

(c) In keeping with American tradition, this country should insist within the scope of her influence and through her accredited representatives in the United Nations that the British Government withdraw the large army, navy, and air force units, as well as police and civilian officials reminiscent of the Black and Tan era in Ireland, from Palestine and replace those alien forces with Palestinian defense militia now underground.

(d) This Nation should, through the medium of the United Nations, insist that there be no interference by the six Arab States in the political situation of Palestine and take all necessary measures to combat outside Arab interference.

Time has presented the Department of State with an opportunity to restore an ancient nation and mend the wounds of a constantly depleting people, and thereby eliminate the plague of statelessness—a contagious disease hovering about throughout Europe—wherever Jews are situated. This in effect is a challenge to humanity. It is our belief that your Department is fully equipped to meet this challenge.

Without these, and all of these, aforementioned recommendations being carried into effect forthwith, there can be foreseen one of the worst conflagrations in the form of civil war which the Middle East has yet seen, with consequent danger of its spreading abroad to form the spark of a third world war, with the responsibility for it resting solely and squarely on the shoulders of the United States and Great Britain.

Sincerely yours,

For the executive board:

Rabbi BARUCH KORFF.
Representative THOMAS J. LANE.
Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK.

For the congressional advisory board:

Senator JAMES M. MEAD.
Senator DAVID I. WALSH.
Senator MILTON R. YOUNG.

The following members of the executive board concur with the views and principles as set forth above: Michael Potter, Representative Augustus W. Bennet, Senator Arthur Capper, Maj. Nathan Ruby, Rabbi Aaron Dym, Murray K. Josephson, Joseph E. Davies, Senator Sheridan Downey, Senator Homer E. Capehart, Senator Leverett Saltonstall, Senator William Langer, Joshua Manischewitz, Dr. Samuel Friedman, Dr. Wladyslaw Dworecki, Capt. H. L. Gordon, Abraham H. Roseman, Major Sydney H. Shapiro, Abraham Sprintz, Gov. Lester C. Hunt, Wyoming; Arthur Szyk, Russell G. Carter, Marcus M. Sperber, Dr. Wallace W. Atwood, Assemblyman Robert J. Crews, Charles S. Aldrich.

Citizens' Juvenile Council Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 26 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Citizens' Juvenile Council Plan," delivered by Cecil L. Whitehead, of Los Angeles, Calif., to the Uptown Washington Lions Club on June 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President and members of the Uptown Washington Lions Club, the great American humorist Mark Twain said that everybody talks about the weather but nobody does anything about it. The same thing might be said of juvenile delinquency, except that citizens' juvenile councils are doing something very definite about it and are getting excellent results.

In the 50 cities, communities, and neighborhoods in this country and Canada where these councils are now operating they are effectively preventing juvenile delinquency, rehabilitating erring youth, and educating incompetent and delinquent parents toward higher standards of parenthood.

By incompetent parents I refer to those who, through lack of ability, training, or experience, are unabale to cope with the problem of controlling their children.

By delinquent parents I refer to those who, through bad example or pattern for their youngsters, or through carelessness, neglect, or overindulgence, have reared children with antisocial tendencies who are classified as delinquent.

The citizens' juvenile council plan, which I am about to describe, in operation is a simple, practical, and economical means of combining and utilizing the constructive resources now available in the law—State, city, and community—to combat the problem of juvenile delinquency. All members of the council are volunteers. The average cost per year of operating a council should not exceed $15, which sum includes stamps and stationery. The cost to taxpayers is nothing, and yet the average council will reduce the case load for courts, probation officers, juvenile halls and shelters by 20 cases per year. Fifty thousand councils operating in this country at 20 cases per council would reduce the juvenile delinquency case load by 1,000,000 cases per year.

Think what this would do to the problem of juvenile delinquency. Billions would be saved taxpayers. But far more important, think of the wonderful idea of salvaging the lives of 1,000,000 unfortunate youngsters each year. Youths, boys and girls who have become delinquent in almost every case because of the home or community contribution to their downfall. The same youngsters reared in satisfactory homes and communities would in all likelihood become good citizens.

With the exception of certain mental cases no child is born delinquent. He comes into the world without his asking and here is conditioned by his home and community to be a good junior citizen or a delinquent—an outcast. Eventually, in most cases (71 percent), he becomes a convict and an incorrigible criminal to do bodily harm to fellow citizens, or steal their valuable property and live on taxpayers' funds as an inmate of an institution.

Society, who, with the parents, are jointly responsible for our children's future, owe the maladjusted child the obligation of using all the constructive resources of the community to aid in his rehabilitation. Communities which have no more than one delinquent child per year should have a citizens' juvenile council, so that all of its constructive resources may be combined and utilized to help that child.

The school and police will do their part to make amends to these youngsters by recommending to the parents of these youths that they, with their child, meet with the citizens' juvenile council. On such a recommendation the parents and children will appear at the time and place indicated to participate with the council of fellow citizens to learn the cause of the delinquency, and the steps to be taken to prevent a recurrence of the antisocial act.

In the council proceedings, the youngsters will be given every benefit of citizens' counseling and vocational guidance. When necessary, citizens will be selected as their advisers. These good citizens will supply the patterns of behavior and inspiration to lead the youngsters toward a happy and useful citizenship.

Every neighborhood and community has within itself untapped resources of fine and capable citizens to staff citizens' juvenile councils to perform the functions which I have described.

And further, professionals such as psychiatrically trained workers, capable social-service workers, and probation officers in their unofficial capacities and as good citizens should volunteer or be invited to serve as members and as experts on the councils. There to contribute their academic knowledge and training to aid in determining the cause of the delinquency and its cure in the particular case. Also, these public-spirited professionals can make a fine donation to this cause by acting as consultants to citizens appointed as advisers to youngsters, and in aiding unfortunate parents to a better understanding of their problems of parenthood.

The knowledge of the professional; the prestige of the law, with police officials, judges, and district attorneys serving on councils in their unofficial capacities; plus the practical information on child and home welfare of the good citizens and schoolmates; plus the social influences and pressures in community and school directed toward good citizenship; plus the citizens' political influence to correct community and school "black" spots disclosed in council sessions; these all will go a long way toward solving the juvenile delinquency problem of the community in which the council operates. And the child as an individual with a citizen adviser and friend will be well on the way toward rehabilitation.

Fifty thousand councils yearly preventing delinquency, rehabilitating 1,000,000 youths per year, educating parents, establishing community moral standards to inhibit crime and juvenile delinquency is no impractical dream.

This will occur when the public comes to the realization that the problem of juvenile delinquency is the citizens' problem, and that the citizens' juvenile council is their council.

There are in this country today more than 50,000 service organizations who have as their objectives boys' and girls' work and underprivileged children. For illustration: There are over 5,000 Lions Clubs, 5,000 Rotary, 2,400 Kiwanis; Civitan, Optimists, United States Junior Chambers of Commerce and Elks Lodges have thousands of clubs among them. The American Legion, Amvets and other veterans' organizations have thousands of posts or chapters.

It is our recommendation that each unit of each of these national organizations sponsor a council. In very small communities where the case load is low, several of these organizations could sponsor the same council. No council should handle over three cases per week.

In any event, to provide stability and continuity, and, to avoid division of responsibility only one well-established nonsectarian service organization should, generally speaking, sponsor a council.

An important reason why a single service organization should sponsor a council is, that, when it becomes necessary to select a citizen adviser for the youngster, the members of the council who make the selection should be personally acquainted with the membership of the organization from which the adviser is to be selected. Only such a citizen is selected as an adviser whose personality matches the personality of the youngster who needs the adviser.

As we see it, the citizens' juvenile council plan is a challenge to all well-established nonsectarian service organizations, which have as objectives boys' and girls' work and underprivileged children or similar objectives.

It lies within their power to solve the juvenile delinquency problem of the Nation. The time has come to stop talking about juvenile delinquency and start doing something about it.

They must realize that as well-established nonsectarian organizations it is their job as fine representative citizens to take action without delay and solve the critical problem.

Children and their parents meet with citizens' juvenile councils on the recommendation of the police and school authorities. Only youths who admit their offenses appear before councils. They are not courts and do not pass on the guilt or innocence of any one.

Regardless of the criminal record of the juvenile he should meet with the council; even though he must go to jail. The council may learn of conditions which are preparing a brother or sister or other child in the community for a life of crime. It will take steps to correct these undermining influences. As to youths who go to prison, citizen advisers are appointed to build their morals while in prison, and to aid in their readjustment to the community upon their return. As to youths under probation or on parole, citizen advisers, with the approval of the court and parole authorities, can work in cooperation with and under the direction of the professional. All children in trouble with the police or school authorities should meet with councils—except mental cases. The latter should be placed in institutions.

PERSONNEL OF COUNCIL—BEST ELEMENTS OF COMMUNITY

The personnel of the council should consist of:

(a) One chairman (prominent businessman with executive experience and member of sponsoring organization).

(b) One vice chairman (same as chairman).

(c) One secretary (all details handled by secretary—volunteer or employed on hourly basis).

(d) Two or more members of sponsoring organization (a rotation plan may provide for all members of organization to eventually serve; this is advisable as then all members will maintain an interest in the council and readily serve as members or advisers).

(e) One officer of the law (as member and as bailiff of the council).

(f) One minister, priest, or rabbi (to serve alternately).

(g) One child psychologist or psychiatrically-trained worker or citizen experienced in child psychology (school principal, teacher, counselor, probation officer, or social worker).

(h) One or more of these honored citizens of the community; a superior court judge, district attorney (or a deputy), and judges of justice and police courts. These citizens serve in their unofficial capacity and there can be no objections to their serving as no youths meet with councils unless they have already admitted their offenses and their parents consent to the council appearance. If more than one council operates in a community these citizens may serve the councils alternately—attending one council one week and another the following week, etc.

(i) A family welfare counselor to consult with parents and to cooperate with adviser appointed for the youth (an experienced volunteer citizen or professional social service worker).

(j) One local doctor (doctors in community can serve alternately).

(k) One local lawyer (to alternate with other lawyers).

(l) One or more representatives of minority groups. (They select advisers from their group for youngsters of the same race.)

(m) Two children, a boy and a girl, who have been elected by their schoolmates to serve on council.

(n) Any other person or persons of the community who can add strength and prestige to the council (outstanding leaders in youth work).

(o) A newspaper reporter or press representative who writes up the cases, gives the names of the council members, but does not mention the names of the juvenile or his parents; but stresses the facts in the cases where the parents have failed to do their duty. This publicity effectively educates potentially delinquent parents who do not relish the thought of meeting with fellow citizens to discuss the shortcomings of their youngsters. Over a period of time this publicity and word-of-mouth advertising will establish community moral standards which will go a long way toward inhibiting crime and juvenile delinquency.

ADVISERS IN GIRL CASES

To provide advisers in girl cases a carefully selected group of women are made available as a panel for this purpose. Two members of this panel, who most likely fit the needs of the particular girl serve on the council during her case. One of them is selected as adviser.

Dr. William Healy, M. D., nationally known authority on child psychiatry in relation to juvenile delinquency states that the Citizens' Juvenile Council Plan is on "thoroughly sound ground." Before World War II the plan was used most effectively in Denmark, "where delinquents were handled by groups or committees of citizens rather than by strictly judicial measures, and the whole atmosphere was particularly wholesome and effective."

Is it not possible that the citizens of our country are as capable as they are in Denmark?

In the eyes of the law the class of citizens who serve on these 50 citizens' juvenile councils in this country are sufficiently trained and capable enough to serve on grand juries and indict their fellow citizens and become members of petit juries where they may send their fellow citizens to the electric chair. Also many of the members of the councils have reared families of fine children and are personally experienced in practical methods of dealing with youngsters.

Can it not be said that such citizens are sufficiently trained to the extent that they are capable of sitting in an informal conference in order to make recommendations to a peace officer or a court.

From a practical standpoint the 50 councils now operating are doing a magnificent job. These councils are located in many States of the Union and Canada.

In Los Angeles County, Calif., where a number of these councils have been operating for several years, the juvenile court judge, district attorney, and sheriff not only recommend the councils, but have participated in directing the attention of all service organizations to the Citizens' Juvenile Council plan.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is sufficiently interested in making the plan known to police officers that a description of the plan appeared in the July 1945 issue of the Federal Bureau of Investigation Law Enforcement Bulletin. This publication is read by more than 100,000 police officers. Also, all officers attending the Federal Bureau of Investigation Police Academy in Washington are informed of the plan.

The California-Nevada District of Kiwanis International recommended the plan for adoption as an objective of Kiwanis International.

The service clubs and patriotic organizations have in this plan an opportunity to place into practical application many of the objectives for which they stand.

It is their chance to prove to the citizens that they are truly service organizations, and not "knife and fork" clubs or "conversation organizations." Their opportunity is here now to solve the Nation's greatest and most critical problem. It is their opportunity to help salvage the lives of thousands of children who might otherwise become hardened criminals.

You may be interested to know that I am donating my time to this cause and have paid my own expenses so I could be with you in Washington today. From here I go to Milwaukee, Wis., where I am to give a talk on June 28 to the National Convention of the United States Junior Chambers of Commerce. This organization is very much interested in our plan. A Citizens' Juvenile Council sponsored by the Pasadena, Calif., Club of Junior Chamber of Commerce is doing a fine job. The Lions Club at El Monte, Calif., reduced delinquency with its council by over 90 percent in 24 months. This is our outstanding example.

A council is operating in Corpus Christi, Tex., under the sponsorship of several clubs. A number of other councils are under way in Texas at this time.

I have prepared a manual for Citizens' Juvenile Councils which tells in detail how to organize and operate a council. It contains instructions to council members and citizens appointed as advisers. Also I prepared forms for use in every important step of the council plan. I copyrighted the manual and forms to prevent commercialization and then donated the use of the copyrights to our nonprofit institute of which I am director.

This is my contribution to the cause of these unfortunate boys and girls of this country, who so badly need your help, and the aid of all the fine citizens in the service organizations of our country.

If you desire further information write to our institute. If your club is interested I suggest you mail a copy of your club roster. We find that where all members of a club get the literature it is much easier to start a council.

The House of Congress Is Not Falling Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have just been advised that I am one of the many Members of this House who have been honored by being placed on the blacklist of the CIO. I have not seen such a list, but I am reliably informed that all Members who have voted to curb the activities of the handful of racketeering labor leaders who are doing such a disservice to labor, are not only blacklisted but that the CIO has called for the defeat of those Members of Congress who have had the intestinal fortitude to vote as their consciences dictate.

Inasmuch as a vast majority of the Members of the House have voted repeatedly to make such dictators and would-be dictators as John L. Lewis and Petrillo obey the law, and only last week passed, by an overwhelming vote the Hobbs antiracketeering bill, an insidious campaign has been instituted against the Congress in general and especially Members of the House who have shown their displeasure, if not contempt, for such dictators. A whispering campaign to discredit Congress is being carried on, not only in Washington but throughout the country. It will be noted that a special effort is being made to discredit the House. A favorite topic of those who are now and who for weeks and months have been lambasting the Congress is, "The House of Congress is falling down."

Only twice during my extended service in Congress have I seen the lights go out that shine on the dome of the Nation's Capitol. Once when the cowardly Japs made their dastardly attack at Pearl Harbor and then again when John L. Lewis ordered his men out of the mines. As one who came up the hard way on a short grass Oklahoma farm and who is deeply sympathetic with the working man, organized and unorganized, I have equal contempt for those responsible for putting out the lights on the Nation's Capitol.

This morning, riding on a crowded streetcar from my little stuffy two-room apartment to the Capitol, my eyes fell on the headlines of an Oklahoma newspaper, quoting a self-admitted statesman who I am sure unknowingly has taken up the cry of the communistic radical labor leaders with the charge that "the House of Congress is falling down." After reading this I penned a little rhyme that is not much for rhythm, but it tells the story of the insidious propaganda against the greatest legislative body in the world.

Come all you people who want to know
The latest propaganda of the CIO.
Hear, all ye people, far and around,
The House of Congress is falling down.
It gave our racketeering leaders a kick in the pants.
Now we'll make those Congressmen dance!
We have millions and millions—that's a lot of dough—
To beat all on the black list of the CIO.
So hear ye voters the world around,
The House of Congress is falling down!

Conference Report on Peacetime Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in voting against the conference report on the bill to extend the Selective Training and Service Act I fully appreciate the fact that the report would be adopted and the bill would be sent to the President in that form.

I could not, however, bring myself to vote for this legislation. It is the first time, in America, that we have ever voted for a huge peacetime standing Army, and the first time we have ever considered a peacetime draft.

We have assumed global obligations, it is true; and it is my desire that the United States should discharge those obligations to the people of the world. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I have received many letters from men in service complaining that they have been kept in nonessential service in places of no strategic importance and with no duties except to wait on officers.

With a more rigorous effort on the part of the military to utilize every man and every officer to the best possible advantage, and with proper inducements in the way of pay and treatment and benefits after discharge, I believe that we could obtain the necessary voluntary enlistments to relieve those who already have served 2 years or more. There is no doubt in my mind that that would have been the better way.

Fifty Years of RFD

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL BROWN OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial entitled "Fifty Years of RFD," which appeared in the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal on June 5, 1946, eulogizing the late Senator Thomas E. Watson as the father of rural free delivery of mails.

I also wish to include a list of reforms advocated first by Senator Watson, this list having been prepared and issued by the First National Bank, of Cornelia, Ga.

Senator Watson was an outstanding statesman of the Nation, and certainly his untiring efforts for the establishment of rural free delivery service should be recognized.

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal of June 5, 1946]

FIFTY YEARS OF RFD

One of the most significant contributions to progressive legislation ever made by a Georgian may be credited to Thomas E. Watson in his championship of the rural free delivery branch of the postal service, which this year is celebrating its golden jubilee.

It is somewhat astonishing, now that rural free delivery has proven itself a boon to the Nation, to recall that Representative Watson encountered the fiercest kind of opposition when he asked Congress in the nineties to set aside a mere $10,000 of the Post Office appropriations for "* * * experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages." The idea was termed a "craze" by President Cleveland, who in 1894 said that the estimated cost of delivering mail to persons off the rail routes would be prohibitive.

When the Georgian finally got his measure through, the Postmaster General tried the system first in Maryland. It proved such a success that appropriations were steadily increased from year to year until free delivery was universal throughout the United States. There are today over 30,000 rural carriers, delivering mail 6 days a week to 30,000,000 Americans.

The history, traditions and esprit of the rural mail carriers are worthy of a nation which boasts the most efficient postal service in the world. The effect of their work in terms of education and enlightenment, not to mention the improvement of rural routes of communication, is beyond estimate. Georgians may justly be proud of the part this State has played in the development of rural free delivery.

A LIST OF REFORMS ADVOCATED FIRST BY THOMAS E. WATSON

THE RECORD OF THE FACTS OF HISTORY SHOULD BE THE BEST THERE IS IN THE HUMAN RACE

All of the following listed reforms, advocated first by Watson, have been written into law by States or by the law-making bodies of the National Government:

1. Rural free delivery of mails. Enactment secured by Watson himself.
2. Automatic couplers on railroad cars, thus ushering in the adoption of safety devices by railroads. Enactment secured by Watson himself.
3. A graduated income tax.
4. An inheritance tax.
5. A system of parcels post.
6. A system of postal savings banks.
7. National and State control and regulation of public communications and transportation.
8. Protection to the price of farm products by means of governmental regulation of commodity exchanges.
9. Regulation and supervision of stock exchanges.
10. A warehousing system licensed and regulated by the Federal Government.
11. Establishment of land banks by the Federal Government for making long-term loans to farmers at low rates of interest with their farms up as security.
12. A subsidy for agriculture, to equalize farm income with the profits of commerce and industry enjoying the benefits of a protective tariff.
13. Rehabilitation of ruined and helpless farmers by the Federal Government.
14. Lending money direct to farmers by the Government at low rates of interest with their crops, livestock, and farm equipment up as security.
15. Prevention of alien ownership of lands in the United States.
16. Recognition in law of the right of labor to organize for its protection.
17. An 8-hour work day.
18. Abolition of child labor in factories and on public works.
19. Initiative, referendum, and recall.
20. Resumption by the Congress of its constitutional powers to create and coin money and to regulate the value and volume thereof.
21. Abolition of the issuance and control of the currency by private banking institutions.
22. Control of the gold reserves of the Nation by the Federal Government.
23. Laws to prevent banks from taking the funds of their depositors and using them in great speculative campaigns conducted against the general welfare.
24. Opposed the original set-up of the Federal Reserve System and its control by private banking interests. The System has been nationalized.
25. Protection of the purchasers of Government securities against a market manipulated by Wall Street gamblers.
26. Opposed the issuance of tax-free bonds, by the purchase of which the wealthy escaped their just share of supporting the Government.
27. Advocated the taking away from private individuals and corporations, valuable public franchises out of which immense private fortunes were being created.
28. Government ownership of public utilities.
29. A law against the issuance of free passes by the railroads to the general public, legislators and other public officials, in return for votes and political influence.
30. The Australian, or secret, ballot system.
31. A white Democratic primary as a means of purifying elections in the South.
32. Creation by law of a county unit system of nominating candidates for public office.
33. Abolition of the convict lease system in Georgia.
34. Free schoolbooks for the common school grades.
35. Election of the United States Senators by a popular vote of the people.
36 Election of justices of the supreme courts by a popular vote of the people.

37. Election of judges of the superior courts by a popular vote of the people.

38. Election of the attorney general of Georgia, public service commissioners, and all other public officials, by a popular vote of the people.

OPA—What Is Back of It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, there are many people who have no confidence in the propaganda that OPA is being maintained to prevent inflation. We all know that we have inflation now, and that the longer OPA continues to operate the worse the inflation is likely to become. As soon as the people know what they can depend upon a short time in advance, production will move forward if bureaucratic stranglehoids do not prevail.

The following letter is characteristic of many letters which I have received from my constituents, and characteristic of the thinking of perhaps a vast majority of the people of the great Middle West. The author of this letter is not a constituent of mine, but one of my colleagues. His views are so tersely and well expressed that I quote the entire letter:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., May 8, 1946.

Hon. GEO. SCHWABE,
Representative, First District Oklahoma, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It must be apparent to you at this time—if not, it will be in the near future—that the continued regimentation by Washington bureaus of our every act of life or the conduct of our different means of earning a living must sooner or later cease. Since 1932 one emergency after another has arisen and the futile efforts to cure same by the establishment of bureaus has dismally failed. It isn't the law itself, as created by the members of the Congress, that has caused the trouble, for I fully believe they were passed in good faith, but the rules, regulations, directives, etc. as issued by these "bureaus", which are equal to laws, have brought about confusion almost to the point of chaos. The present "fight" for the OPA is camouflaged by the propaganda that it is to control inflation and prices. That propaganda is silly and malicious. The real issue involved is to continue regimentation, which is only another name for socialism or communism. This grand country of ours was not built that way—neither can it continue that way. "Democracy", "free enterprise", and the "American way of life" will become meaningless words if the OPA, and like bureaus, are continued.

We ask that you, as a Member of the Congress, think for yourself in this vital matter and vote accordingly. The propaganda that is being showered on you in favor of the OPA is from an organized source who on one hand, by their leadership and strikes, have set back for years the possibility of our economic recovery. Are you going to follow this clique? Are you going to support the Socialist theory of regimentation, as advocated by the "half-baked bureaucrats now in power in Washington"? Are we going to set up a "WPA" for the entire world? Since 1941 we cheerfully gave everything to fight a vicious, unnecessary, and cruel war. What have we gained? Which is the worse—to be able to buy at a slightly increased price something one urgently needs, or be unable to buy at all? On one hand we are urged to produce more—then on the other hand some "bureaucrat" in Washington issues a regulation which prohibits us from carrying out said increased production. How is the farm or a business to carry on without a profit incentive? Perhaps Chester Bowles, Walter Winchell, Drew Pearson, and the "Little Flower" knows—I certainly don't. Do you? What about the promises made by President Truman after VE-day? He told us in a radio address that wartime controls would be lifted—that wartime bureaus would be abolished—that the Government would decrease its wartime employees to peacetime levels. Has this been done? Absolutely not. Whenever a bureau was "abolished", it was simply transferred to another department; and as a result today, we have more employees on the Federal pay roll than at any time in the past.

Of course, all I know is what I read in the newspapers (I am not swayed by irresponsible radio commentators), or when I try to buy feed for my chickens, turkeys, hogs, and stock; or when I try to buy a 17½ shirt with 35 sleeves; or a pair of khaki pants 44 by 33; or a little lumber or a window sash to make repairs on my place. I have the money—I have quite a chunk of bonds. I am one of perhaps millions in this same fix or thought in mind. I paid over $1,600 last year in income taxes. Did it cheerfully—was glad to do it. But when I want said shirt, pants, feed, lumber, cash, etc., the OPA has me and others tied down with a stranglehold. Much of this worry about inflation is silly and absurd. We have it now in countless items to 100 percent to 150 percent increase over 1932. What would another increase hurt? Not even close to the dire predictions of Bowles, Winchell, Pearson, et al. They have evidently forgotten about the law of supply and demand, and unless you, the Congress, our elected Senators and Representatives, take back the powers you abdicated to Bowles, et al., and other "New Deal fanatics in Washington, we are going to continue in the mess we now have. You also evidently have forgotten that the "law of self-preservation" is the oldest law of both man and beast, and the OPA, with its absurd administration, silly rules and regulations, has made criminals of the occupants of every home in this glorious country of ours.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS MARSHALL.

Is Uncle Sam Entering the Construction Business?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of the following resolution from one of its authors, and the resolution will speak for itself. The question is, Is a policy being formed and established which will mean that the Federal Government is now entering competition with private business and embarking upon construction work in the construction of public buildings?

The resolution follows:

In a combined meeting of the Oklahoma chapter, builders' division, the Associated General Contractors of America, Inc., Oklahoma chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, the Oklahoma City Master Plumbers Association, and the Oklahoma City Building and Construction Trades Council, June 20, 1946, resolved that:

"Whereas representatives of the Veterans' Administration have requested members of the Oklahoma City Building Trades Council to furnish skilled craft for their employ; and

"Whereas it is the stated intention of the Veterans' Administration to do certain major repairs and new construction in the conversion of certain buildings at Will Rogers Airport into a veterans hospital; and

"Whereas no bids for contracts on this work have been requested and it is the expressed intention of such representatives to hire all labor direct and to furnish all supervision to complete such new construction, in violation of all precedents and the rights of legitimate private contractors in the construction industry; and

"Whereas workmen are expected to work without the protection of social security and unemployment insurance furnished by private contracting employers; and

"Whereas there is no available supply of labor other than that assigned to regular crews of legitimate contracting employers, and that such contracting employers can and will supply necessary labor by contract, fixed fee, or cost plus basis, for this work; and

"Whereas the undersigned being in full accord that every effort should be put forth to expedite this work for the veterans, offer their joint services, and point to the record of the past four years which proves conclusively this work can be completed by private industry in less time than by any other means: And be it therefore

"Resolved, That the undersigned representatives of the Oklahoma City Building Trades and Construction Contractors of Oklahoma City and vicinity, do by these resolutions register their protest of a Government agency engaging in competition with private business of the construction industry, and setting a precedent for other Government agencies, the result of which may endanger the investments of private contractors and interfere with the steady employment of labor; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be mailed to Omar S. Bradley, Administrator, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.; Hon. ELMER THOMAS, United States Senator; Hon. E. H. MOORE, United States Senator; Hon. GEORGE SCHWABE; Hon. WILLIAM STIGLER; Hon. PAUL STEWART; Hon. LYLE H. BOREN; Hon. JED JOHNSON; Hon. A. S. MONRONEY; Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM; Hon. The Hobbs Antiracketeering Bill Should Be Vetoed

OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, when the Hobbs bill was originally considered in the House I called attention to its unreasonably harsh provisions, pointing out that it was aimed, not just at the few teamsters who actually had stopped the farmers' trucks on their way to the New York markets, but at all of labor.

Even before that, when application was made to the Committee on Rules for a rule, I made an investigation of some of the alleged charges. The evidence was so scant and the instances in which any fees were paid to union members so few that I withheld granting of a rule for nearly a year. The proponents of the bill gave it a carefully worded and deceptive popular title, "the antiracketeering bill," which disguised its real purpose.

The abuses that actually existed were eliminated by the president of the teamsters' union, Daniel J. Tobin, who threatened to suspend any union local or any union member found guilty of extorting a $6 fee from a farmer to be permitted to drive his truck into New York.

In that connection I desire to insert a part of an editorial from the Chicago Sun entitled "The Hobbs Bill—Another Monstrosity," which more fully explains the extraordinary provisions of the bill, its harsh and severe penalties, and how it could be used to stop legitimate and long-accepted union practices.

It is my intention to forward a copy of these remarks to the President in the hope that he will veto the bill because, as passed by the Congress, it is clearly intended by the enemies of labor to prevent peaceful picketing and not merely to prevent highway extortion. It is an oppressive weapon aimed at all organized labor.

Partial text of the editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Sun]

THE HOBBS BILL—ANOTHER MONSTROSITY

This newspaper believes that labor, along with other powerful groups, is subject to proper regulation in the public interest. Even though most unions publish full financial reports, Congress should make such publication compulsory for all. Congress should prohibit racial discrimination in union membership and require democratic election of officers. Congress should expand the conciliation machinery of the Government and authorize full exploration of the merits of fact-finding techniques in handling labor disputes.

But none of these ends is served by the Hobbs bill which, to meet an isolated evil, would impose brutal penalties applicable to conduct which often represents legitimate trade-union activity.

The Hobbs antiracketeering measure was embodied in one section of the Case bill. In vetoing the Case bill, Mr. Truman stated that he favored the objectives of the section. But he pointed out that the existing antiracketeering law contained a clause protecting peaceful picketing and other legal union activities. Congress had stricken out this clause in the Case bill; it remains stricken out in the Hobbs bill.

The Hobbs measure, therefore, would make it robbery and extortion to obstruct or delay interstate commerce in any way or degree. Let a mass picket line form for 20 minutes, which could easily be handled by local police, and union members would be liable to 20 years in Federal prison as racketeers. Even peaceful picketing, if any incident occurred which someone could claim caused fear of injury, would expose union members to antiracketeer prosecution.

This is not legislation designed merely to prohibit a few local unions from bullying farmers who drive their own trucks to city markets. It is a bill which treats 13,000,000 union members as if they were criminals of desperate character. As long as Congress continues to pass such bills, it reveals its own prejudice and its tragic lack of understanding of the country's real needs in labor laws.

How Much Is Pie?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, while the Office of Price Administration has been carrying on its activities with lip service of keeping prices down, it carries on with numerous and many abuses. The utter lack of common sense seems to be the most outstanding feature of the Office of Price Administration, with the small and little person, who is least able to defend, always the victim, while the Office of Price Administration permits favored groups to openly violate price control and does nothing about it.

Up in my district in Ohio the OPA unceremoniously hauled in and fined a very small restaurant operator, the OPA saying that he cut a pie in four pieces and sold it for 15 cents a cut, rather than cutting the pie in six pieces and selling it for 10 cents a cut.

Can anyone make rhyme or reason out of such procedure, and by what right does the OPA persecute persons for such nonsense.

Just how much is a pie under OPA?

It is time that definite controls against abuses be voted in, or that the Office of Price Administration be abolished.

Article on a Vocation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, I have a very dear friend who was a fellow student of mine in high school. His son, now attending high school, chose for an article on a vocation the subject Public Servant—Congressman. For his work, he received an excellent grade.

It is a most interesting expression of a young man's understanding of the duties of a Member of the Congress and the service of the National Legislature.

I think it is worthy of an additional recognition by printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

I. (Public servant) My inspiration: A couple of years ago my father and I took a trip through the eastern cities. The one city that was interesting to me was Washington, D. C. We spent about 4 days in Washington. Most of the time was spent in the Capitol observing how the Congress of the United States operates. I sat in the Halls of Congress listening to many debates between different Congressmen. I saw the young page boys bringing messages to the Congressmen. While in Washington my father and I went to visit a Congressman whom we know very well. His name is WALTER C. PLOESER—he represents this district. We went to his office in the House Office Building, where we saw his three secretaries reading his hundreds of letters for special favors. I also went into the Congressional Library, the Supreme Court, and the Senate. A Congressman has to do many things for people of his district; many things are demanded of him. All the foregoing inspired me to be a public servant to aid my fellow men in their needs and troubles.

II. Qualifications for Congressman: These qualifications were taken from the Constitution of the United States of America. They are as follows:

(1) The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

(2) No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years and been 7 years a citizen of the United States and who shall when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

(3) The number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least 1 Representative.

(4) When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

III. Primary election—How to be elected: In the State of Missouri a candidate for the House of Representatives must file for office and pay a filing fee. Each State is divided into congressional districts. Districts into counties, counties into wards, wards into precincts or townships (if living in counties). Each ward or county has a committeeman which belongs to a certain political party. The committeeman holds meetings within his own ward or county and the candidates are invited to attend the meeting and express his or her views; this is also called a candidate's platform. A platform is the views of the candidate and what he will do for the people in his district, if elected. The candidate for Congress speaks on national and international issues that are before the public at the time and expresses his views on these. The candidate is called upon to address other social groups, religious groups, and civic organizations. In this way, he is able to see the people's impression of him. Many demands are made upon the candidate for many favors. The candidate must raise funds to support his election. Many dollars are needed to put a candidate over the top. Also demands are made upon the candidate for money.

After campaigning, the day of election is here.

General election—When I am elected

The general election is 3 to 4 months away from the primary. The only opponent I will have is the candidate from the other party. Another campaign is made just like was made in the primary election. I am successful and I am elected to the Congress of the United States by a majority of the people who live in my district. I am notified of my election by Secretary of State of Missouri. I go to Washington, D. C., on the second day of January following my election and upon arriving I take an oath given by the Speaker of the House. Now I am a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

IV. My duties: The Congress of the United States on the opening day meets as a committee whole. Then a Speaker of the House is elected from one of the Members. The Speaker then appoints the clerks and pages.

Congress is arranged in this way. The House is divided by a center aisle. On one side sit the Members belonging to one party, and on the other side of the aisle the Members of the opposite party sit.

Each party elects a floor leader. The leader must be a quick thinker and know what to say at the right time. He also must stand up for what his party wants to get.

Introduction of a bill

The Speaker appoints all committees and chooses a chairman for each committee. The bill must pass through a committee before being voted on in the House. I will now give you an example of a bill.

Jim Smith living in my district says that his mother was struck and killed by an Army truck and Smith wants some money from the Government for the death of his mother. I must prepare a bill to get money for the death of his mother. The bill is put into a printed form and then given a number. It is then referred by the Speaker to the proper committee who makes an investigation as to whether or not the bill is thrown away. If the bill is good it is sent out to the floor and reported favorable. Then it is voted on by the House, if passed it is sent to the President who signs it making it a law. I write back to Smith telling him the good news and the money he will receive. Other demands are made upon me, such as to introduce bills for the building of new post offices, banks, for the construction of new roadways in my district. I also may be asked to help raise money for relief. I may have to get a permit, so the Army can parade in my district.

The majority of my work is done in committee hearings. In these hearings many important things are brought up, such as what to do about the coal situation and many other major problems of our country. And maybe if I am lucky I may get to travel around the world on an inspection committee of some kind.

V. Work conditions: The work conditions in any public office are of the very best. A Congressman must make speeches, introduce bills, do favors for people and many other services. The work conditions are very good. Each Member is furnished with an office and secretary which are of no cost to the Member. The Government pays for all of this.

VI. Pay: Each Member of the House of Representatives receives $10,000 a year.

VII. Educational requirements: A public servant must have the knowledge of at least a grade school and high-school education. A public servant must have a fine character and must know how to get along with people.

VIII. Organization and procedure of Congress:

Senate: In the Senate the Vice President of the United States presides over all meetings. He is referred to in the Senate as "Mr. President" because his title is President of the Senate. In absence of the Vice President the Senate elects a President pro tempore who holds the office of President of the Senate during the absence of the President.

House: The Speaker of the House presides over the House. The duties of the Speaker of the House shall be to appoint all special or select committees and appoints a chairman to preside over the different committees. The Speaker may vote in case of tie.

Officers of the House: (1) Speaker, (2) Parliamentarian, (3) Chaplain, (4) Majority floor leader, (5) Minority floor leader, (6) Clerk, (7) Sergeant at Arms, (8) Doorkeeper, (9) Postmaster.

IX. Oath of office taken by the Members of Congress: I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office which I am about to enter, so help me God.

X. Committees: 40 House committees listed; also chairman of each.

XI. Summary:

1. Advantages:

One thing everyone who enters Congress is able to gain is a strong foundation of public speaking because some of the best speakers in the United States are Members of Congress.

While in Congress a person should meet many fine people and learn how this Government of ours operates.

A public office gives a person a chance to serve his fellow men and at the same time earn a living. After all, service to one's country is the best way to show one's interest to his Nation and Government.

2. Disadvantages:

A public servant has to do things which sometimes in his mind are not the right things, but he has to do them for the good of the people, for, after all, the people put him into office and he has to do the things that the people want.

A public servant makes many enemies while in office even if he is doing a good job. People want jobs working for the Government. Of course, the public servant would like to give everyone a job, but that is impossible. The people who do not get jobs become angry and don't vote for him in the next election. In this job of public servant, your time is not your own. You may have to make speeches or talks at different meetings.

A Congressman does not make much money; of course, he gets $10,000 yearly, but that has to go a long way.

These are just a few of the disadvantages of being a public servant.

Resolution Adopted by Military Order of the Purple Heart

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a resolution adopted by the Military Order of the Purple Heart, department of Massachusetts, at their department convention, held in Bedford, Mass., June 11–12, 1944:

THE MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART,
DEPARTMENT OF MASSACHUSETTS,
April 30, 1946.

The Massachusetts Department of the Military Order of the Purple Heart heartily endorses the enacting into law of several bills now before the Congress which would accord the members, of especially offshore merchant marine, all the benefits and privileges now enjoyed by the personnel of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

The vast majority of those who have seen active service with the colors, as well as many other patriotic and fair-minded citizens, would like to see the valiant heroes of the merchant marine given the right to affiliate with one or more of the veteran organizations at the termination of the war.

The contemplated change in the law would include, as veterans, those who have served in the merchant marine in both World Wars. It would serve to encourage many to continue in the service instead of being forced to resign.

The merchant marine has earned the right to be recognized as a fifth armed service. No other group has done more in the prosecution of the war and with more personal physical and mental risks.

The Military Order of the Purple Heart voted at its 1944 department convention, held in New Bedford, Mass., June 11–12, 1944, to write to the various representatives in Congress to recognize the fine efforts of American merchant marine by allowing its personnel every benefit and privilege now enjoyed by the other armed services.

For the department:

JOHN T. SULLIVAN,
Past Department Commander,
Military Order of the Purple Heart.

P. S.—The foregoing is a true copy of resolution passed at New Bedford, Mass.

Living Costs Boom Under OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the following is an editorial from the Tulsa Daily World, of Tulsa, Okla., to the effect that living costs are now booming under the supervision and orders issued by the OPA. The editorial follows:

LIVING COSTS BOOM

An economist turned alarmist is reported as saying the rapid rate of allowance of price increases is bringing an orgy of higher prices.

On the other hand, the OPA, which has lately been in severe tussles, issues soothing-sirup statements, showing that food costs are not high as expected and are about one-third as great as the increases in the period just after the First World War—when there was no OPA. These statements—from the economists and the big bureau—represent the extremes of the situation. The majority of us still try to find the middle ground, try to find out if controls can safely be omitted and if the controls are really the cause of the steady increase in food costs and the rise of black markets.

The showing is that 52 increases in prices were allowed by the authorities in 2 weeks. Let it be noticed that this was not direct abandonment of control, but rather assertion of control. These increases are bound to still further raise the cost of living. Two big items are on this list—coal and butter; they alone could cause a general increase of the stiff sort. The economist who went into the alarmist business had something real to start with—1 percent increase per month. Figuring that the stringency will last another year, we face the possibility of a known rise of 24 percent in 2 years. There are many attendant evils; too much money goes into black markets; there is too much favoritism.

Above all, the continuous controls and either price repressions or price increases may not bring the vital element of production into due activity. That is something which the economists and bureaucrats alike ignore. There is not going to be readjustment downward until production rises and valid competition sets in.

Most of the people definitely suspect that a great deal of their trouble is due to the Federal passion for regulation. Trade is distorted; chicanery and black marketing are encouraged; the poor people are outdistanced in the race for standard goods. The price increases allowed are probably just, under the circumstances—but how long can the process go on? Dismantling of the whole price-control set-up is probably the only way to free production and to competition—and these are the only real avenues of escape from a truly alarming period of inflation.

Address by National Chairman of the American Veterans' Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 26 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by Charles G. Bolté, national chairman of the American Veterans' Committee—AVC—at the first convention of that organization at Des Moines, Iowa, June 14–16.

The American Veterans' Committee—AVC—is an organization of World War II veterans with more than 60,000 members in some 550 chapters from coast to coast.

Charles Bolté has proved himself a brilliant leader in the 3 years that he has served as national chairman of AVC. The appreciation of the membership for this leadership was expressed at the AVC's recent convention when he was elected national chairman with only one dissenting vote. Mr. Bolté is a young man, only 26 years old; but all of AVC is young and imbued with all the energy and enthusiasm which go with youth.

Mr. Bolté, who represents the finest type of young America, is a resident of my State. After his graduation from Dartmouth in 1941 he enlisted in the British Army, but his excellent military career was cut short at El Alamein where he lost a leg. He has worked day and night for AVC. In addition, he has also been a brilliant spokesman for all veterans. His recent book, The New Veteran, is called by many critics the best book on the veteran to come out of this war.

I believe that this vigorous new veterans' organization, which has just launched a campaign for 1,000,000 members, will play a vital role in American life. As a firm believer in democratic expression, I wish to extend my congratulations to the AVC for its recent convention, and wish it success in its future activities.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL CHAIRMAN

This meeting is the culmination of so many hopes and dreams of so many thousands of Americans that it is impossible for me to express my emotions as I stand before you today. This is the time we've all waited for: when we should come together face to face and on the temporary foundations of the American Veterans' Committee build the durable structure of a great new veterans' organization. When we joined AVC we pledged ourselves to two things—belief in the statement of intentions and determination to attend a postwar meeting. We have fulfilled so faithfully the first pledge that our ranks have swollen far beyond the point where all of us could fulfill the second pledge. Yet, through the democratic process which governs AVC, we have gathered here a goodly company, representing 60,000 fellow members from 500 chapters in 44 States and many overseas areas. Indeed, a hope has been fulfilled; a dream has come to pass.

Yet, this convention is but the symbol of our hopes. It is a beginning, not an ending. I think it is well for us to emphasize this, for it is peculiar to the dream of AVC that it will never be completely realized. What is this dream to which we have devoted ourselves? It is simply this: that out of the horror and the boredom of the greatest war there should come a new comradeship, transcending all the barriers that separate us from one another, working for the speedy transformation of all veterans into productive members of society, and striving to achieve a more democratic and prosperous America and a more stable world. Obviously there can be no standing still in AVC as we go toward the realization of this dream. Over every ridge will be another ridge, and another beyond. This will be the dynamic future of our brotherhood, as it has been its dynamic past.

What has been that past? We are all more interested in the future, but I am bound—by the terms of my original assignment and by the corporation laws of the State of New York—to give you an accounting of the progress of the dream. I cannot do that without recalling most personal memories. I remember my first talks in early 1944 with Gilbert Harrison and Samuel Spencer, who with Wadsworth Likely, Clifford Dancer, and Edward Ladd outlined the dream, and to whose vision we owe the present reality; they asked me to gather together other veterans, to keep in touch with the overseas members of the group, and to lay the foundations for a new organization that could do a job for all of us. I remember the correspondence and the first meeting with Adaline Guenther, who had been center for the group in Los Angeles, and constant inspiration for us early members. I remember the hot summer of '44, when men died in Normandy, and my wife and I from our apartment answered the 200 letters which came from Italy (the week Rome fell) in response to the first story on AVC in the Stars and Stripes.

By the fall of '44 there were too many letters to answer from the apartment so we moved into a one-room office. Some of us got together, gave the group its name, and called ourselves the national planning committee. We began making speeches and reporters began asking us for our views on veterans' affairs. By spring of '45 there were half a dozen chapters around the country, sprung up spontaneously, and about 2,000 members. We told the State Department we thought the fighters of this war should be represented at the San Francisco Conference; nobody was more surprised than we when we were invited to send consultants to the United States delegation.

Thus the foundations were laid. I said earlier that they were temporary. I hope you will agree with me when I say they feel firm. We have made them firm together—and by "we" I mean everyone who has felt the magic of the AVC dream, from Edward McHale, who directed the field organization, through the men who signed up members in Berlin and the secretaries who worked overtime without pay, to the latest recruit in Cincinnati, Ohio. We learned as we went, playing by ear for most of the way. AVC has attracted many thousands of men and women who never had belonged to any organization before, and that has meant the working out of organizational problems from scratch. At every point, from the chapter subcommittee to—God knows—the national chairman's office, we have had inexperience. Yet, apparently, enthusiasm and hard work have been effective counterbalances.

The record shows a slow and steady growth through 1945, while we hammered out policy in many long discussions, studies, meetings, and exchanges of correspondence. During the period from August to November 1945, financial limitations prevented our doing much more than establishing chapters through the mail, where interest in the aims of AVC was expressed by individuals as a result of national publicity. Membership applications came in from individuals at home and overseas, and were acknowledged individually by a necessarily expensive interim process. The transient nature of our membership—most of it in service in those days—prevented the establishment of a more economical and speedy system such as addressograph. Until October 1945, operational expenses were met largely by dues. As the operation expanded and costs rose, it became necessary to seek contributions from interested friends of AVC. These efforts were initially successful; to such a point that last November the planning committee authorized the chairman and staff to take immediate steps to expand our organization.

It was at this point that the planning committee made a decision of the most far-reaching consequence. There were two courses of action open. One was to concentrate solely on membership. The other was to build membership through a vigorous, many-sided campaign based on our statement of intentions. The NPC chose the second course. As a result, at a time when every effort was being made to aid the membership in techniques of expansion, the energies of every member were taxed in a continuing series of intensive public-action campaigns—reorganization of the Veterans' Administration, revision of the GI bill of rights, passage of the FEPC and anti-poll-tax bills, the Wyatt housing program, seamen's bill of rights, extension of the OPA, extension of the draft, passage of the British loan, the enlisted men's terminal-leave-pay bill, the Wagner-Murray-Dingell health bill, and vigorous opposition to the President's proposal for a labor draft.

This program was carried out swiftly under the direction of the NPC at great expense. Had AVC been in existence on its present basis a year ago, a highly coordinated plan, mounted sufficiently in advance of the time when it had to be put into action, could have been carried out more effectively at a fraction of the cost. Great demands were made, both on the chapters by the NPC and on the national organization by the chapters. The chapters and general membership responded splendidly to every call for action from the NPC. Their efforts took the form of public rallies and mass meetings, telephone campaigns, letter and postcard barrages, motorcades, and radio programs. These efforts were reflected in publicity and prestige which contributed directly to AVC's rapid growth in membership. The NPC reflected the will of the membership in public statements made to congressional committees, public bodies, and in the public press. The ingenuity of the chapters was expressed in the great variety of ways in which they attracted attention to the AVC program. These ranged from the passage of resolutions on national and world affairs to focusing attention on community problems such as the establishment of community service centers, playgrounds for children, and even delinquencies on the part of municipal garbage collectors.

What have been the results in organizational terms?

On January 1, 1946, the membership of AVC consisted of 12,000 in 61 chapters. At the present time the membership is 60,000 in 526 chapters. During the same 5-month period the national staff has gone from 20 to 86 people in order to handle the greatly increased work load. A few months before the end of '45 the staff had consisted of 5 people. Membership has been vastly on the increase: 300 a week in early December, 600 in January, 1,000 in February, 2,000 or more since March. There has been an enormous increase in the number of chapters and in the amount and variety of both incoming and outgoing mail. All of this expansion has been accomplished without our going into debt; the planning committee turns over to you a solvent concern.

AVC turned from a correspondence circle into a lusty world-wide organization almost overnight. The transformation was exciting, complicated, and expensive. It was made difficult by the necessity of dividing the national office into two locations when the old quarters became too cramped, of finding and training new personnel, of experimenting with several methods of office procedure in an effort—finally successful—to establish a reasonably efficient business-machine system, and of starting 14 regional offices from scratch.

The establishment of these offices was made in every instance with the cooperation and understanding of local AVC people in the areas concerned. By March the financial outlook of AVC was such that the planning committee felt free to offer three kinds of help to State organizations:

1. Limited financial assistance.
2. Literature in quantity.
3. Prominent speakers.

The NPC was able to fulfill two of these requests. Financial assistance in the form of maintaining offices adequately staffed was carried out. One million two hundred thousand pieces of literature were distributed throughout the country. Obtaining national speakers was difficult, and we were not able to fulfill adequately our promise to supply such people on demand. This necessarily followed, since the speakers were also returning to civilian life, and were—like the rest of us—taking up civilian commitments suspended during the war.

On the national level the public-relations staff was expanded, and AVC's story went more and more frequently into the press and radio under the direction of Richard Krolik. The AVC Bulletin was changed from a newsletter to an eight-page tabloid newspaper, under Michael de Sherbinin's editorship, to give adequate coverage to the activities and interests of the organization. To add to the soundness and variety of those activities, a program and research department was established under Louis Harris, which has provided source material on current issues to chapters and informed them of the activities of other chapters. To express the convictions of its members who make AVC's policy, a legislative office was opened in Washington, where the country's policy is made. It is directed by Chat Paterson, who has represented us with the continuing aid of the Washington chapter.

Thus, through trial and error, through the efforts of men and women working long hours, through dreams and sweat, our organizational structure has been erected. I need add only two items to bring this organizational report up to date. First is the enormous and complicated task of the planning and arrangement of this convention, which has been directed by Adam Yarmolinsky, with the help of many workers. Second is the planning and execution of our great campaign to raise $1,000,000 to get 1,000,000 members, which is under the direction of Leo Casey. Through his efforts we have supporting us a distinguished national finance committee, under the splendid chairmanship of Newbold Morris. Veterans and nonveterans have joined together on the finance committee. The nonveteran members have told us that they wanted to help so that this generation would not make the mistakes of theirs; and it is one of the surest signs of our organization's strength that it has this support from outside its ranks. The campaign has begun auspiciously, and there is every prospect that under the new leadership and administration of AVC we shall meet our goal so that, after this one effort to secure outside contributions we may swell our membership to the point where we will become self-sustaining through dues.

These new members will not be buying a pig in a poke when they join AVC. The coordinated campaign of field organization, public relations, and direct mail which will be offered to your new planning committee for approval is based on the existence of AVC as a going organization, with a definite point of view. That point of view is spelled out in terms of the measures for which you have campaigned in the past. It is the point of view expressed by our founder, Gilbert Harrison, in his editorial in the AVC Bulletin, when he said:

"The important task (for AVC) is the building and maintaining of a strong alliance which embraces all veterans willing to use our American freedom to create greater economic opportunity for our citizens, and a world united for peace."

AVC has lived and grown through this policy. It is known—and will be more widely known—as the forward-looking organization which supported Gen. Omar Bradley in his efforts to modernize the Veterans' Administration, which fought for low-cost housing and the maintenance of price control, which worked nationally and locally not only for veterans' job opportunities but for full employment for all Americans at a decent minimum wage. It is known—and will be more widely known—as the organization which fought for a sensible surplus-property program, and fought against legislation designed to curtail the rights of free-born American workers. It is known—and will be more widely known—as the organization which recognized that America belongs to the world, and campaigned for full United States participation in the United Nations, for full United States aid in world reconstruction, for United Nations control of atomic energy abroad and civilian control at home, for development of the United Nations into a world government with limited but adequate powers to prevent atomic warfare.

Because of this, great hopes are bound up with the dream of AVC. Your hopes are obviously here; yours, and the hopes of tens of thousands with faith in the idea of a new organization going clean into the future. The faith has been persistent despite the unanswered letter to the national office, the disagreement with a policy, the impatience with occasional administrative inefficiency.

What you may not realize is the hope in the dream of AVC which exists outside our ranks: the hope which has humbled me so often as I have gone up and down the country, the hope shared by men and women of a wide variety of political affiliation, social background and economic status, unable to qualify for AVC membership but wishing us well, seeing in our program and our vigor the promise that boom and bust, depression and war, will be this time averted.

The hope in AVC thus becomes a responsibility. That responsibility is now yours, as the elected representatives of 60,000 AVC members, as the potential guides to the first million and to the millions who will follow as you meet that responsibility. The period of trusteeship is now over. The Planning Committee which has been responsible for laying the foundations is now dissolved; the interim administration has resigned. You are to devise a constitution, a platform, a program for action in the coming year; and to elect officers and a new Planning Committee to serve you.

All the future is in your hands. My assignment is completed. For myself, you will know that I seek nothing. Yet I cannot take my leave until I tell you what is in my heart. Guard this work well. Build strongly and build with an eye to the future. Remember the comradeship of the war, and the expanding comradeship of the peace.

Our alliance will be broad. It will not include all veterans, but it will include many; so many and so strong that the views of our organization will help determine policy and practice on the community, State, National, and world levels. Our organization will help determine policy decisively because it will adopt no narrow factionalism which would limit its appeal and therefore its effectiveness. It will attract more and more veterans because it will concentrate in this time of pressing veterans' problems on the immediate solutions—rehabilitation, housing, jobs, price control—which will enable veterans to become normal and productive members of the community. Then, as citizens, our members can go on to the mortal problems facing us all, as Americans and as members of the human race; the problems of providing economic security within the framework of freedom, and of establishing a democratic world order based on law.

I have a deep faith that those problems will be met, and proposals for their solution agreed upon, because I know you here will not allow yourselves to be divided. I know you will close ranks, and move forward to the perfection of a democratic organization which will grow vastly and become a great force for good in our country and in our world. This is your assignment, given you by the tens of thousands of those who are now members of our organization, by the millions who will soon join us as we reveal to them by our actions that we hold our convictions dearly, but the other tens of millions the world over who long for a clear voice in the wilderness of our deeply troubled times; above all, by those who died in combat, and thus gave us our opportunity to meet here and help determine the shape of the future. In the name of the courageous dead, in the faith of the hopeful living, let us go forward together.

New England Air Mail Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago a jet-propelled plane sped from New York to Washington in less than 30 minutes. Each day jet planes roar from city to city within our land and their peculiar explosive sound is throbbing in the consciousness of our people. Their speed is so great that they strain our measure of comprehension. But America has always shown a readiness to adjust itself to new impacts on life which almost matches its ability to invent, to create the causes of such impacts.

Here is proof proper. New England Air Mail Week is to be observed from July 1 to July 6. The former date marks the twentieth anniversary of air-mail service in New England. The New England area during that week will not merely celebrate the winged advances made in this 20-year period. It will send a record amount of air mail through its post office. But further, it will inform the residents of New England of the speed and efficiency of air-mail service, and finally will effect a permanent increase in the volume of mail sent by plane.

My native city of Lawrence, Mass., presents a striking but characteristic example of the ready adaptation of communities to the age of flight and the progressive leadership required to stimulate such alertness.

Previews of this progressive spirit were manifest in 1938 during National Air Mail Week. During that week, alerted by an active publicity campaign and by remarkable cooperation of local leaders, the city of Lawrence with a population of about 85,000 people sent out 18,000 pieces of mail in special cachet form. A cachet is a seal, a peculiar stamp, or a distinctive mark, placed on the envelope, either printed or rubber-stamped, carrying the official title of the week, the dates and the sponsor's name, or some fact symbolic of industry or locality. The use of this special cachet finds special favor in such a modern industrial city with its total of 166 diversified industries.

Lawrence set a remarkable record in that former week. But as the speed of flight has far exceeded that attained in 1938, so too has the community accelerated its participation in and use of such flights. For Lawrence not only has its own airport, but it has a regular air service connecting it with Portland, Maine, and Newark, N. J.

It is this service which gives heightened impetus to the city's participation in Air Mail Week. And it is this service which promises an unprecedented increase in the volume of air-mail traffic through the Lawrence post office not only during the coming week but in the weeks that follow.

Four planes leave Lawrence three times daily for Newark and the same number arrive from Newark each day. Air mail can reach Worcester in 25 minutes, Newark in 95 minutes, and California is only an overnight flight away. Air-mail service is literally that for Lawrencians, for five daily shipments speed their mail and packages with a promptness that knows no delay and with a capacity to handle a great volume.

The plane requires a pilot and a crew to speed it to new records, to set goals for the future. Even so is the community served by a crew that pilots a course and sets the way. And an active drive is now under way in Lawrence to remind its citizens of the uses of the airways for mails and of the service provided. A committee from the post office has joined with merchants, industrial leaders, and representatives of the air lines to ready a publicity, a public alerting, campaign for full flight.

Community enthusiasm is one of the marks of modern America. There is always the suggestion of the Old World celebrations in community drives such as this, but the mode is modern. From the committee the center and source of enthusiasm spreads the spirit by colorful, ingenious, and stimulating window displays in the appropriate motif. The press features the motif of the week with detail and fanfare. The radio adds its characteristic and persuasive appeal. And soon the entire city and its environs are imbued with the spirit and participate wholeheartedly.

Great impetus will be given to New England Air-Mail Week with its purpose of increasing the use of air-mail service if the Senate follows the lead of this House and votes to reduce the air-mail rate to 5 cents per ounce. We cannot fail to note that as the speed of air-mail delivery has increased through the years, the cost for such service has progressively declined. It was not until 1919 that the first regular air service was begun. It was not until July 1, 1924, that the first transcontinental flight involving night-flying on a regular run was begun. That flight, which began on the 7th of September, ended on the west coast on the 9th, almost 2 full days later. And this less than 25 years ago. The air-mail rate at that time was 8 cents per ounce per zone and there were three zones. Now air-mail goes from Lawrence, Mass., to California overnight for one-third of that price. Soon it will be less.

The ones who look ahead see a day coming when all mail will be carried by air. We who have seen such tremendous strides in less than half a lifetime are ready to accept that. But meanwhile those who know, those who handle and expedite our mail, take it on their own to show all of us the advantage of air mail. They prove this advantage first with an efficient and rapid system. This should be sufficient for us. But then our men cite facts, compare times and rates, and chart the practical advantage to us of air-mail service.

Not content with this, they stimulate the enthusiasm of the city, concentrate their proofs in 1 week of demonstrations, as well as observance, and challenge us with every means of public invitation to test the air-mail service for ourselves. They know that such service for all of us is not far off. So they work to close the gap caused by their advances and our tardy response, and do this by their own efforts and own enthusiasm.

The Post Office Department, Mr. Speaker, stays modern, and because of its contact with everyone in this Nation, it is a great force for alerting the people of our Nation to the modern mode.

That is one reason that makes it safe to predict that the celebration in Lawrence, Lynn, Boston, and in all New England, of New England Air Mail Week will be not only an outburst of fine enthusiasm, but the beginning of a new and ever-growing period in the use of air-mail service. I do not know if we will ever have clerks sorting mail in the sky, as one of the popular mechanical magazines is currently promising. But I know that if it is feasible, the postal service will do it.

OPA's Chief Desire Is Perpetuation of Jobs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the following article from the Tulsa Tribune, of Tulsa, Okla., of June 14, 1946, by the oil editor, Mr. Rowley, expresses very clearly the sentiments of the oilmen in my section, with reference to the refusal of OPA to release crude petroleum and its products from price controls:

OPA'S CHIEF DESIRE IS PERPETUATION OF JOBS

Never before in the history of the United States has any Government agency waged such a campaign of misrepresentation, hillbilly appeal to the unthinking, ballyhoo, and asinine claims as that being conducted by the Office of Price Administration in its efforts to perpetuate jobs and its control over American business.

Facts have no place in this campaign directed by Chester Bowles, Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization and former head of the OPA, who in private life was an advertising agency official. As Russell Brown, counsel of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, says, "In his selling of OPA, Bowles has not concerned himself with the merit of his product merely with the invention of sales arguments and slogans, with speeches and spectacles calculated to influence the signing of form postcards and petitions."

As an example, the New York Times published a picture taken at an OPA rally in New York which showed little children, apparently only 2 or 3 years old, who just recently learned to walk, carrying placards of "Save the OPA" variety.

OPA has utilized sky writing, has had associations formed to further the appeal to "save the OPA," has taken up considerable radio time, all centered on an appeal to save the jobs for the bull-headed, inexperienced, power-drunk nincompoops whose asinine rulings and price-control regulations have prevented American business from getting into full-time production so badly needed, and which have created shortages in necessities, thereby fostering black markets.

Senator E. H. MOORE, of Oklahoma, deserves credit from the entire petroleum industry and all other businesses for introducing the amendment to the OPA extension bill which would eliminate price control from petroleum and its products. That amendment was adopted by the Senate and is contained in the bill passed by the Senate and sent to the House.

The only reason that can be assigned for price control over an industry in which supply and demand for products are in balance, as is the case in the oil business, is perpetuation of jobs for OPA officials and employees, and continuation of that autocratic power and authority over American business.

Every oil man should immediately contact Congressmen and demand that this provision of the OPA extension bill be maintained intact and that the bill when finally passed state clearly that OPA price controls over all oils—crude and refined products—be abolished and not suspended.

The industry is violently opposed to any suspension of OPA price controls over oils. Experience has shown that OPA cannot be trusted, that promises and statements made by OPA officials mean nothing and are not kept. OPA officials and other Government heads, including President Truman, have stated price controls would be abolished quickly for any industry when supply of and demand for products came into balance. That condition has obtained in the petroleum industry for months, yet OPA makes one excuse after another—none of them valid—for further continuance of price control over oils.

The coal strike was given as an excuse for keeping price controls on oils. The fallacy of that reason shows clearly the lengths OPA will go to try to perpetuate itself in office. Any shortage of coal, resulting from the coal strike, actually results in a lessening of demand for fuel oils. Big industries are chief users of fuel oil. Steel mills are big consumers, but when there is a shortage of coal and steel mills curtail operations, they curtail use of fuel oil and this petroleum product piles up in storage as it has been doing.

We urge every oil man to contact Congressmen at once demanding that price control over petroleum—crude oil and products—be abolished, not suspended, and in such a way they cannot again be made effective without specific congressional action.

Address by Hon. William A. Stanfill, of Kentucky, at Rotary International Convention, Newport, Ky.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. STANFILL
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 27 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. STANFILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address which I delivered at a Rotary International convention held at Newport, Ky., recently.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The greeting which I have received here is enough to warm the cockles of one's heart, and to make me glad I am a Kentuckian, proud of the fact that I am an American, and happy that I am a member of the great world-wide organization of Rotary International. I am a charter member of the Hazard Rotary Club, organized, as I now recall, in 1922, and I continued with that club, having been president one year, up to the time I had the honor to go to the United States Senate as the representative of this great Commonwealth in the most important legislative body in the whole world.

One of the very great satisfactions of life has come to me by reason of my membership and participation in the affairs of Rotary. I know of no organization on the face of the globe which has a more glorious opportunty in this perplexing age to serve the people of the whole world than the Rotary clubs of the world. The fourth object of the Rotary stands out as a beacon and a star of hope to all peoples everywhere. This objective is: "The advancement of international understanding, good will, and peace through a world fellowship of business and professional men united in the ideal of service."

Can you think of anything which is more needed or which can be more helpful in the present chaotic condition of the world today than the literal carrying out of this fourth object of Rotary International. Of course our clubs in many countries have been forced by war conditions to cease to function, but we all hope this condition is only temporary, and as these war-torn nations regain their economic life it is hoped that Rotary will again begin to function in all of the countries of the globe.

It is only by the precepts set out in this fourth object that we can ever attain dependable peace and good will on this earth. Understanding of each other and of each nation's problems and aspirations by other nations will make us feel much nearer and more friendly to those people. Human nature, basically, is the same the world over: this has always been true and always will be true.

In these basic desires and hopes and aspirations the Russian is not unlike other people. The trouble is he does not understand us: he doesn't know us. We look upon him as an uneducated, half-savage human being. Perhaps he is; but if we can get him to know that we of America understand him and his aims and his ambitions and his aspirations, this cannot but promote international good will and understanding. The history of these people shows us that they have been held under the heel of their own rulers, they have only been allowed to learn what their rulers wanted them to know, and as a result their ignorance concerning the other nations of the world is appalling. A reporter for the Stars and Stripes just recently interviewed many Russian soldiers, and not one of them knew who Churchill or Roosevelt was; some thought Churchill was an American. But, on the other hand, how many of the rulers of Russia do we, the enlightened people of America, know aside from Stalin or Molotov or Vishinski? How many names of prominent Russians can we recognize? So that education, understanding, good will, as exemplified by the fourth object of Rotary, is needed by us as well as by other people of this world.

Northern Kentucky has been the least-known part of our grand and glorious State to most Kentuckians. Just why this should be so is hard to understand; it should not be. With its twin cities of Newport and Covington situated on either side of the mouth of the Licking River, it has a historical background with which all Kentuckians should be familiar. The confluence of the Licking and Ohio Rivers was a well-known point to the early explorers and settlers of Kentucky. Christopher Gist, the pioneer surveyor, came here as early as 1751; Simon Kenton first visited this section in 1771 and was often here thereafter. Other famous pioneers who were in this section included Gen. George Rogers Clark, Col. John Floyd, and Col. Benjamin Logan.

This section of Kentucky has in the past suffered from what might be called the handicap of its location, and your cities likewise have suffered in the minds and attitude of other parts of the State in that you were looked upon as a sort of satellite to the larger community of Cincinnati across the river. Then, too, I feel that you have not always been politically recognized by the powers at Frankfort and government that has its seat there. Perhaps, also, to be entirely frank and honest with yourselves, you might admit that you have not always in the past shown yourselves to be as vitally interested in other sections of the State as you might have been. But I certainly am not going to argue that point with you.

Just by way of personal illustration, I have come to Cincinnati many, many times in the years gone by, but my only recollection of ever having visited in Newport, except in passing through, was when you so hospitably entertained Rotary at the district conference. I was here and attended that conference as a delegate from the Hazard Rotary Club.

But regardless of what may have been the past or the cause or causes of that condition, I have seen within the past few years a definite change of attitude on the part of the State as a whole toward the people of northern Kentucky and on the part of northern Kentucky people themselves. The forces in your community which are progressive are seeking improvement in many ways; a new spirit is manifesting itself in the people; there is a growing demand for better representation, better living conditions, better social conditions, better participation in the affairs of your own community and in the State government.

The people of the whole State are awakening to the tremendous potentialities of this northern Kentucky area. Of course, I am delighted with this display of community interest and my enthusiasm is shared by all who share my belief that you are now about to take your rightful place as the second most important section of this Commonwealth.

Northern Kentucky, my friends is on the move, and it is moving forward. The foundations upon which is built a lasting, and sound and enduring economy are here in your midst and from what I have learned of its people you are talking full advantage of them. Your organization can be of great assistance in working out your own problems, which are of vast magnitude and which are at your door awaiting solution. We all know that changes are inevitable, and that we must keep abreast of the times; the people must be made to feel and know their own responsibility. They must raise their voices and make known their hopes and desires to their lawmakers and in this way help to preserve the advantages of living under our American system.

Your local problems are many and varied. I have had some hand in helping you in your fight to have Fort Thomas retained as the site for the new veterans' hospital; but you have many other problems in which I covet the privilege of helping you. There is your flood-wall problem and the protection of all the work of your hands and hearts and minds as well as your lives and your safety from the ravages of a flood from this Old Man River. Then there is your sanitary district, and the master plan of good roads, better communications, better labor relations, better markets, and better living conditions.

You know the answer. It is up to you and to all of you citizens. It can only be achieved by keeping your chin up, your face to the front, a smile on your face and a song in your heart.

And I pledge you now, as your junior Senator from Kentucky, that it will be my purpose and aim to assist in promoting your interests; for when your interests are promoted, it redounds to the benefit of all Kentucky. I hope I shall be able to prove to you by my actions, which always speak louder than any words, that I have your interest at heart and I trust I shall earn and merit your confidence in me to do this. I sincerely and earnestly covet your friendship and good will to the end that I may assist in serving you as a public servant should serve, when I have learned your problems; and I do assure you that I have a profound feeling of responsibilty to serve all Kentucky in the United States Senate. You have some peculiar local problems which are of the greatest importance to you: Tell me about them, write to me and give me your views so that I may intelligently approach them and to the best of my ability I will serve you.

I read a book not long ago which gave some serious thought to Congressmen and their problems. The author gave four points of advice to constituents of Members of Congress.

1. Learn to know your Congressman; inquire about him, check up on his record and honestly appraise him as to whether he ought to be kept in office or not.

2. If you decide he is above the average, do a little plugging for him, because he surely needs it under the many trying circumstances.

3. If you decide he ought to be replaced, do some serious thinking and work to find a more capable man who would be definitely better.

4. Think of him as a human, and not as a superman. Meet him halfway in your appraisal of him.

The Atlantic seaboard section of our country has the jitters today; it has had them for some years, and it really is a bad case they now have. Let me portray to you, if I can, some of the conditions in the larger cities of the East. There is frenzy, fear, doubt, suspicion, feeding upon itself and chasing its own tail. It is evident in most of the larger cities in the East, but Washington, which should be most representative of the national mood, is the cauldron of this state of mind.

Little things: Not a hotel room available; not an apartment or house available from Washington to Bridgeport, Maine, either for rent or sale. But you hear it whispered that if you slip the manager something he will put your name high up on the waiting list.

Restaurants are jammed and are pleading for cooks, busboys, waiters. Bars and night clubs full of standees. Long queues at the movies for $1.50 per person. Advertisements in the newspapers like this: "He is coming back and expects you to look glamorous." Stores and shops crowded with customers demanding something better or at least something more expensive.

Everywhere you hear the discussion about the atomic bomb. "Fifteen years," says one man, "and this is going to bust wide open and blow the world to hell." "No," says another, "just 5 years. I don't see how you can stop it." A man across the table says, "We'll be inflated sky high within a year. But I'll beat that—I am going to spend every cent I've got by Easter."

And then it is the Russian situation. One says that Russia is trying to conquer the world and impose communism on all its inhabitants; another says her word is not to be trusted; another says this, and then still another that. There is a nervous tension in the air.

One woman came home after being at a shop where the nylons were on sale, presenting a very bedraggled appearance, and said to her husband, "My hat was ruined and my dress almost torn off and my ankle is sprained. I will have to buy a new hat and a new dress and call the doctor to treat my ankle, but I got my nylons."

But, my fellow citizens, that is not America. Where is the real America? It is back home in States like Kentucky and the other Middle and Western States. The real Americans, the people of Newport, of northern Kentucky, of the whole State of Kentucky, want comfort for their families, want health, want the opportunity to build their own security, want the leisure to relax, want friends to enjoy, want time to live. They are not afraid of any future which they have a hand and a voice in shaping, and they are willing to take a hand and do their part.

While these men in Washington are sitting around the table discussing the atomic bomb, about which they know next to nothing, I picture in my mind a marine returned from Okinawa to a little town, perhaps here in Campbell County, crying unabashedly as he kisses his wife, and then stepping back to take a good look at her plainly dressed figure and saying "Hot damn!—but you're pretty." Then there is the sailor returned from the four corners of the world who has bought a filling station in the country village. "Bought it with money I saved in the Navy. I don't aim to make a fortune here, but I figure there is a good living in it, and I'll get time to go fishing now and then."

In the strange metropolitan frenzy there is the same mass psychology which spread unfounded rumors of air raids during the early part of the last war; there is the contagious fear of the unknown, the half expected, and contagion is always most dangerous in crowded areas.

But the great bulk of the people of America live west of the Alleghenies and when you cross that chain of mountains coming westward, you begin to feel a wholly different pulse, and when you get back into Kentucky you can then feel the pulse of the American people as a whole.

It is good to be in Kentucky and to be from Kentucky and to be able to say you are a Kentuckian. Here we feel and know that the heart of America is sound, its body is strong; it is not decadent; it is not afraid. It is eager to work and make its own security. It rises to each new day with hope and it watches the sun set with belief in tomorrow. And, as Hal Borland, writing in the Saturday Evening Post, has said, "Stand on a hilltop with America around you and you can look out over this whole land, feel its slow, steady pulse of faith in itself and in all its tomorrows. And on the skyline there is only the flicker of metropolitan jitters, like heat waves dancing in the sun."

Let me say now that I hope nothing I shall say here will be construed in any political manner or as having any political angle. But I am deeply concerned over the fate of the United Nations organization, and about our relations with other countries of the world. Every person who has tried and hoped and worked to keep out of the last world war was branded as an isolationist. If by my own feeble efforts I can contribute anything towards keeping us out of another war, I am willing to be called an isolationist. This war has cost more than $200,000,000,000, it has cost us untold misery and suffering, it has cost us unnumbered thousands of our very best youth and young manhood, in death, in lifelong physical injuries, in changed mental attitudes, and no one knows and probably no one will ever know what it has cost our Nation in the lowering and breaking down of our moral and spiritual forces and ideals not only among our soldiers and men in our armed forces, but also in the very fiber of our Nation and in the warp and woof of our national life and well being. This is something that cannot be accounted for by statistics, but it is real, although it is intangible in the sense we cannot reach out and physically touch it.

Our only hope of avoiding another war is in making the United Nations strong and effective and powerful. I have the unqualified belief that the more complex or ominous the world's international relations may become, in that same degree the greater becomes the critical need that the peace-loving peoples of the earth shall strive to make this United Nations enterprise succeed. It is my firm belief that unless Russia and Great Britain and the United States, individually or collectively, cause it to fail, it will succeed.

We must have no illusions that peace will come automatically, or that the United Nations will work automatically, like pressing the switch and having the lights come on. It is going to take an infinite amount of work and patience and understanding and goodwill by us as well as by the other nations of the world to make it work. We are going to have to give up many things which we have heretofore thought we could not afford to forego, in order to make it work.

I repeat—because it is so desperately important—that the United Nations must be made to succeed if we are to avoid unspeakable catastrophe in this atomic age, when decisive war may be waged in minutes instead of years and when the first casualty list may be the last.

This Charter clearly has its imperfections. We must be constantly on watch for opportunities for its improvement, but we must first learn to live with what we have and not permit it to die of pernicious anemia. It is clear that our first challenge is to make it work.

To those who are already suggesting substitutes and are saying that it has no teeth in it, I would call to their attention some of the things utterly impossible of achievement a few years ago, which has already been accomplished, as stated by Senator VANDENBERG, and some other things I shall point out have been taken from his address on the floor of the Senate. In 37 days in the meeting at London the United Nations turned what was merely a blueprint into a going concern; it turned what had theretofore been only an ideal in the minds of men into a reality; until this meeting it had been only a pious dream, but when this Council adjourned on February 16 it had organized in working detail the complete machinery for the General Assembly, for the Security Council, for the Court of International Justice, for the Social and Economic Council, and for the functioning of every instrument of peace provided for by the Charter. On January 10 it was only a scrap of paper; 37 days later life had been breathed into it and all of the various parts had been set up ready to function. Never before in the history of the world had so much been accomplished.

Let all of us see to it in the name of flesh and blood and human hearts and hopes that it shall never again return to a mere scrap of paper.

This London meeting demonstrated also that nations can sit down together and talk plainly. Four or five major issues were discussed and settled at this London meeting, whereas in the past it would have taken years through diplomatic channels to have reached the same result, if, indeed, these results or settlements could ever have been reached that way. In both our world wars we have had secret agreements, and the serial postscripts of the last one still continue to appear. This new brotherhood of nations may lay claim to high values at least in its emphasis on daylight diplomacy.

In each of these four or five issues the matter was finally sent back by the Council to direct negotiations between the parties, but they were all fully heard and considered. In some quarters there are complaints about this action from people who are impatient and whose attitude seems to be that they would like a god of peace just as militant and relentless as a god of war. But the United Nations Charter does not contemplate the techniques of a force; it is not for the purpose of hastening the sanctions and the use of force but to prevent, if possible, the use of these; it is built to prevent war, not to make war; it requires by its very terms the exhaustion of all possibilities of negotiation and conciliation and judicial settlement before we resort to the use of arms or sanctions.

Our new Ambassador to Russia, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, has said, "It is imperative that our national temperatures remain at normal," and further with regard to Russia that both Russia and ourselves want nothing so much as peace. Probably what still bothers Russia is a resurgent fear against aggression; she is fearful of her own security; she may feel that we of America and the English speaking people have designs which she cannot fathom. Fear is really the breeder of trouble. Fear comes when we do not know or understand each other. We admit we do not know or understand the Russian mentality; certainly, we should know they do not know or understand us; they cannot realize that we have free speech, or free press, or such a feeling that we do not want their territory and that we are not and never will be an aggressor Nation.

There is a line however beyond which we cannot go with Russia or anyone else; we can concede so much, compromise so much, but we cannot go beyond it. But how can we expect Russia or any of our other alien friends to know where that line is unless we establish it; most of us ourselves do not know. What we must do through our State Department is to draw that line and then to say that "This is the line" and to mean it when we say it. We have vacillated so much that not only do our alien friends and allies not know when we mean what we say, but we ourselves do not even know it. We should say only what we mean, and we should mean every word we say. Like Senators VANDENBERG and CONNALLY, I have the deep and abiding conviction that this way is the way to permanent peace between us and the other nations making up the United Nations. I believe it is the best and possibly the only way to win Soviet respect, and trust.

To all nations we can speak with power inherent in our own unselfishness, and when the peoples of the earth understand that we have no ulterior designs against any other nation, we can lead the nations through this United Nations organization to real peace. In any event we are now on notice that we and the other peoples of the earth must never cease to evangelize this struggle for peace if it shall reach its full fruition.

In this age there can be no security which is not collective; we can never go back to isolationism. The atomic bomb has changed that, if indeed, it was not already outmoded in the minds of all of our thinking people.

With unwavering fidelity and hope we must carry on this great adventure. If there be any failure let us in America be able to say that the blame for the blood is not upon our hands nor the tragedy upon our souls.

The Pure Ministry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH H. DAUGHTON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. DAUGHTON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Chaplain Julius J. Nodel at a banquet in his honor given by the Jewish community of Norfolk, Va., on May 15, 1946, at the Hague Club. The title of this address is "The Pure Ministry."

The fact that so many chaplains are now asking for retention on duty and so many are shipping over to the Regular Navy is evidence of a new realization by rabbis, ministers, and priests that they can find a real ministry of peace among those who will have to guarantee the peace of the world, God be willing. It was easy enough to hop on the bandwagon of war, with all of its fanfare and excitement. However, the real function of the religious man is to work for peace among those who will have to maintain the peace. No military organization can ever become brutalized, as were the Nazis, if men of God's word walk among them—teaching them, praying for them and with them, inspiring them, guiding them, and restraining them.

What precisely is a chaplain supposed to do?

Nothing precisely, but a great deal extensively. I would like to summarize it by saying that a chaplain must, first of all, be a consecrated rabbi, minister, or priest. Thus consecrated, he can only be moved to serve God, country, and humanity. To serve one without the others is impossible. Without God, there can be no true service for the best and highest interests of the land in which we live. Without service to country, there can be no service to God. I think that the rabbis in ancient Talmudic times captured the essence of this truth when they said, "The law of the land is the law." And there can be no service to country alone, unless all of humanity is bettered thereby. It is one of the most important lessons I hope we learned from the war recently ended. * * *

That is why in the Army and Navy there is no such thing as a GI religion—unless by GI you mean "God inspired"; an inspiration which makes men who are facing suffering, hardship, and death understand that by their sacrifice they are serving God, country and humanity. * * * It is never the function of a chaplain to inspire his men to fight. He is only by their side to teach them why they must fight. * * *

I feel fortunate that the opportunity was mine to serve during World War II and that out of 1,045 rabbis who applied for the chaplaincy (50 percent of all the rabbis in the United States) I was one of the 311 who met the physical, mental, and moral requirements, thereby enabling me to don the uniform of the country which overthrew the evil which had been riding rough-shod upon the earth since 1933. * * *

This is the country which gave me its uniform of honor to wear; rather than the striped suit of a concentration camp victim.

This is the country which gave me the service number 402-355 on its official records; rather than a number for execution in a gas chamber or crematory.

This is the country which made the Ten Commandments and the Star of David part of its official military insignia and allowed me to wear it as a badge of honor; rather than make me wear it as a yellow badge of disgrace.

This is the country which built chapels for Jews in the armed forces; rather than destroy and desecrate synagogues and temples built for the worship of God.

This is the country that is giving my people equal opportunity and representation in defense of its institutions.

This is the country, which for the first time in history is establishing a regular Jewish Navy Chaplain's Corps.

For all this, in humble gratitude, in devotion and duty to my God, my country, and my people Israel, I have accepted the invitation to join the Regular Chaplain's Corps of the United States Navy.

I do not mention this for the purpose of accruing credit to myself, but rather to all of my colleagues, the Jewish chaplains of World War II, who have shown the need and the good work of a Jewish chaplain's ministry. Both the Army and the Navy have discovered that where a Jew is permitted to live in peace and security and equality, there is his home; where his home is, there is his heart; where his heart is there is his devotion and loyalty. They have also learned that material strength and effort is not enough—that the all-important, the supreme thing, without which all else is to no avail, is the religious spirit and character of a people. They have discovered that it may be wrong to sing "Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition," but it might be more important to sing, "Praise the Lord, That's Our Ammunition."

One of the most beautiful stories in the Bible, I believe, is the story of Elijah. Sick at heart and discouraged by his failure to influence Ahab and Jezebel to worship the Lord God of Hosts instead of the pagan Baal, Elijah escapes into the wilderness, and there came to him an amazing experience as he stood upon the mount of Horeb. First, there came a great and strong wind which rent the mountains and shattered the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake, a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire came a "still small voice." When Elijah heard the "still small voice," he wrapped his mantle about him and listened to the Voice of God.

During the past hellish decade we were unable to find God in the winds or the earthquakes or the fires which almost destroyed the world and all of mankind with them. It was only when men sought the sanctuary of synagogue, church, and cathedral; it was only when men prayed in the quietness of their souls that they were able to hear the "still small voice"—the voice of God urging them to go back into the wilderness, and if needs be, to wade through the flood of blood, sweat, and tears in order to bring the peace of the Lord's ways again upon the earth.

How many of you heard and remembered the verses of a poem quoted by the King of England to his subjects in a New Year's Day message during the most awful days of England's history in 1940? "I said to a man who stood at the gate of the year: 'Give me a light that I may go safely into the unknown' and he said: 'Go out into the darkness and put your hand in the hand of God. That shall be better to you than a light and safer than a known way.' "

What a poetic way of describing faith in its extreme. Faith is tested only in extremes. I know full well that we are sometimes distrustful of poets. We sometimes think of poets as people who have long hair and doubtful ambitions. It may be true about some, but those whom the world claims as its poets have pronounced some of the greatest truths, deepest insights, and most lasting values man has ever achieved or discovered. Religion has always been a matter of insight—getting beneath the surface. It is concerned with the small things of the world and the great things of the spirit. Not with the shallow things we can only see and hear and smell and taste and feel. Religion is the courage that wills; the idealism that inspires; the purpose that impels; the love that sacrifices; the conscience that makes of the good things of life the all-important aim of life.

As Will Durant says in his book, Mansions of Philosophy: "Men make war, men sometimes hate and steal and murder and pillage. But sometimes men give their lives for their country; sometimes they sacrifice all for children and family; sometimes they build Parthenons and Sistine Chapels; sometimes they produce a Beethoven, a Mendelsohn; sometimes they write a Fifth Symphony or Leaves of Grass."

It is in the little things that we find religious inspiration. It is in the everyday, commonplace events and experiences that we find God.

I, along with many of my colleagues, forsook enviable opportunities in civilian pulpits both before and after the war. As for myself, I decided that rather than be limited to one community or one congregation, I would accept the greater responsibility of representing, by my service, every Jewish community and congregation in America. Some of my colleagues could not resist the temptation of returning to the status quo. Others could not resist the obligation of accepting the sine qua non. The indispensability of a Jewish Chaplain's Corps is proven by the invitation of the armed forces to the Jews of America for permanent representation. It is with gratitude that the Jewish community and its leaders understand and accept the responsibility of this great moment in the history of the Jews in America; great and important insofar as the status of the Jew is recognized throughout the world.

I have decided to devote my ministry to carrying the message of Israel to Israel's sons and daughters wherever they may be scattered—on some distant island, or lonely military outpost; in some small chapel hut or on the crowded deck or quarters of a ship. The strength of the Jewish people did not always flourish in large synagogues or elaborate temples. Our synagogues were not always built on the highways of a city or at important places. More often, they were in out-of-the-way places; humble buildings, simple and crude, but oh, what a world of ardent glories dwelt within those walls—glories which only our history can tell; glories which only the eternity of our people can attest.

"You wish to know", cried the great Hebrew poet Bialik, "whence your brethren drew that strength to combat the armed forces of their enemies? Go to some little synagogue, in some out of the way place, and there in the twilight of the vanishing day, you will find three or four men chanting over an ancient tome; chanting in that old, old chant from their sacred law. There you will stand before the miracle of my peoples' eternal life and you will see the glory of an undying race."

As a contemporary poet exclaimed:

"No stained glass windows
Nor chimes that ring,
But a place to go
Where a man can sing.
No rich, thick carpets
On which to trod.
But a quiet place
To talk with God."

That will be my ministry. To hear more often the "kol d'momo dako" the still small voice of pure religious service, rather than lose sight of my true ministry in the earthquakes and winds and fires of clubs and socials and meetings and dissipating demands of superpowered, high-compression religious institutional life.

As I assume my new duties in the responsible position which will be mine, I can only pray: "Take my two hands in Thine, O Lord, and hold them fast the long, long day that I may not forget. Hold my two hands in Thine, O Lord; that those who take my hands, may find Thee there."

Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZEBULON WEAVER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a short statement recently appearing in the Washington Star of April 23, 1946:

THE POLITICAL MILL
(By Gould Lincoln)

NEW YORK.—James A. Farley—"Big Jim"—holds a unique position in the Democratic Party, both State and national, today. Famous as the man who conducted a Nation-wide campaign in 1932 to nominate the late Franklin D. Roosevelt for President, who served in the Roosevelt Cabinet for nearly 8 years, and at the same time was chairman of the Democratic National Committee and of the New York State Democratic Committee, his words and advice carry weight. He is back from Europe, where he went on a business trip, and his views on the New York political situation are eagerly sought.

He has been mentioned many times as a possible nominee for governor—sometimes for Senator. The latter job does not interest him in the slightest. There is a strong feeling, however, he would like to be governor, particularly as a stepping stone to a Vice Presidential nomination in 1948.

Despite his wide participation in politics, Mr. Farley has never been a candidate for high elective office except once. That was after he broke with the late President Roosevelt on the third-term issue and allowed his name to go before the Democratic National Convention in 1940 for the Presidential nomination. His split with Mr. Roosevelt, after years of close association, is as much a part of political history as was the break between the late President Theodore Roosevelt and the late President and Chief Justice Taft.

Mr. Farley, however, has always retained his Democratic Party regularity. He did not, like the late Gov. Alfred E. Smith, abandon the Democratic national ticket in the campaign of 1940, or in that of 1944. In a serious clash with Mr. Roosevelt in 1942, however, Mr. Farley nominated his candidate for Governor over Senator MEAD, who had the all-out backing of Mr. Roosevelt, in a turbulent Democratic State convention. This has its bearing on today's situation—for Senator MEAD is apparently the Democratic high command's choice for the gubernatorial nomination against Governor Dewey next fall. Before that convention Mr. Farley delivered a bitter diatribe against Mr. MEAD.

What Mr. Farley said then will undoubtedly be used by the Republicans in the coming campaign, should Mr. MEAD be the nominee for Governor. Further, Mr. Farley will not, it is believed, raise a finger to help elect Mr. MEAD be the nominee for Governor. Whether he would feel impelled to denounce Mr. MEAD again, however, is another question. The probabilities are he would content himself with saying nothing publicly, which might have considerable effect.

It is not unlikely that before the Democratic nominations for governor and Senator are made Mr. Farley's advice may be sought in Washington, as well as here. The New York campaign this year has its full significance for the Democrats nationally. As a warming-up gallop for the 1948 Presidential campaign that would be greatly satisfied if they could win the gubernatorial race—and at the same time knock off Governor Dewey, the titular leader of the Republican Party as its standard bearer in 1944. Mr. Farley has been a friend in the past of the Democratic National Chairman Hannegan, as well as of President Truman. It is natural they would be glad to have the Democrats present a solid front in the New York campaign.

While Mr. Farley was in Europe he talked over the New York political situation with Associate Justice Jackson of the United States Supreme Court, now prosecutor of war criminals in Germany. Justice Jackson has been considered a potential nominee for governor. Undoubtedly Mr. Farley would find it easy to go to work for him in the campaign, should the party nominate him. There is no feud between the two as exists between Messrs. Farley and MEAD. Justice Jackson, however, was entirely noncommital on the subject of running for Governor. At present Justice Jackson has the support of none of the Democratic leaders in New York, who are out beating the tom-toms for Senator MEAD. However, the State conventions are 5 months in the future and a lot could happen in that period.

Mr. Farley right now is not talking politics publicly. That eventually he will have a good deal to say about the New York situation seems inevitable. No Democrat in the country, and certainly in New York, has more friends. And no Democrat has a greater reputation for political sagacity and for integrity.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT K. HENRY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Daily Jefferson County Union, Fort Atkinson, Wis., under date of June 25, 1946:

Those were serious charges Judge Joe McCarthy, candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator, made against the British loan last week. The judge charged that loans from this country are being used to build a British trade supremacy over us with our own money.

Mr. J. B. Polo, of the Fort, believes that the judge has not exaggerated the situation. A long-time resident of Spain, Mr. Polo has more than a speaking acquaintance with South American industrialists who are in the market for various equipment we produce in this country. In recent communications Mr. Polo has observed a greater and greater disposition on the part of South American buyers to favor English sources of supply because of savings in price. One of the most recent items was an order for cylinders, on the price of which the South Americans could save 20 percent by purchasing from England instead of the United States.

Mr. Polo points out that this is not a particularly distressing situation at the moment, when most manufacturers have more orders than capacity, but these favorable conditions will not prevail forever. The day may not be far distant when we will regret whatever factors are leading to our loss of prestige in foreign trade markets. Loss of those markets will mean less jobs and lower wages in the Nation and in Fort Atkinson.

All of us are aware that England was hard-hit in the earlier phases of the war. As many as every fifth home was partially or totally demolished in certain areas. Her industry and her agriculture suffered severe maladjustments. If we had the credit to spare, which we haven't with our own debt of such staggering proportions that we ourselves face bankruptcy, few would question a loan to England, even if we knew the loan would never be returned.

But if England proposes to use that money to win our foreign trade markets from us, the project becomes all the more dubious. And if England proposes to use the money we lend to her to undersell us on the international markets, she puts herself in the position of a merchant who has the insufferable effrontery to ask a competitor for a loan so he can run him out of business.

LAW LIBRARY
FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

We have, apparently, bungled the whole issue of international relief anyway. We are sending butter to foreign areas while the oleo interests seize the butterless opportunity to assure us that their product is as good as anything that comes from a cow; if it's that good, why not ship it to England and leave the butter here?

We are shipping tenderloin steaks while Wisconsin carp go without a market. As the State conservation department officials suggested yesterday, why not ship carp to Europe? They're good food. They will fill empty tummies just as effectively as beef tenderloin.

Here in America we have an unfortunate habit of doing everything the hard way. We either get so saturated with prejudice that we do nothing about a situation that merits action, or we go completely overboard and give away our sustenance when no such sacrifice is necessary.

Air Service to the San Francisco Bay Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to direct the attention of the Members of the House to the following editorial which was published recently in the San Francisco Call-Bulletin:

BLOW TO CITY—CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD SHOULD APPROVE REHEARING FOR ADDITIONAL AIR LINES

The Civil Aeronautics Board but recently rejected a number of long-submitted applications for air service of great importance to the San Francisco Bay area. It did so largely on its own omniscient say-so that the area did not need the services applied for. In its words there was no showing of public necessity or convenience.

To which the only possible answer is "Hooey."

San Francisco, by reason of its location and also its financial and business importance, inevitably must become a huge center of air traffic, as it now is of seaborne traffic. To that end, this city is enlarging its great airport, and other bay-area communities are taking similar steps.

But the Civil Aeronautics Board, in its greatest wisdom, refuses the community the services it requires.

It turned down one line seeking through routes and feeder service to Portland and Seattle, but permitted several smaller companies to put on the feeder services without any provision for more main-line traffic between the two northern cities and San Francisco. Thus, the present main-line company, which cannot now handle all the traffic offered between here and Portland and Seattle, must soon bear the additional burden of new feeders into its main line.

The Board also refused several other applications, including one of a very large company, to improve its service between here and Los Angeles and to the East via the Southwest.

This newspaper believes that in aviation, as in steamship and rail transportation, we should have competition and the improved service competition renders over monopoly operation. We believe that the present main-line operator between here and the Northwest will benefit in the long run by a competitive situation and most certainly the community will benefit.

The air situation between here and Seattle is impossible. One can make better time by car. What is the use of the speedy airplane if one must wait weeks for a reservation? Between here and Los Angeles, where there is competition, one can find a plane seat at almost any time of the day, any day. To Seattle, you just wait or take the train or your own car.

The companies whose applications were rejected plan to ask for a rehearing. The community, including our civic organizations, should support that request. We need the service.

The fact that the Board's rulings were based on 3-year-old data is only a partial excuse. In discussing finances of the companies it used current figures.

This newspaper is not favoring any company. All we suggest to the community is that we see to it that the Civil Aeronautics Board not deprive us of competition in this highly important and potentially greatest form of transportation.

The OPA Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Washington News of June 26 seems to me a fair appraisal of the OPA bill which, though a small jump from Chester Bowles' frying pan, avoided a large jump into the fires of inflation:

TIME FOR SELF-RESTRAINT

The compromise bill to extend the OPA's life for a year is a better measure than either House or Senate passed originally.

It won't be a perfect price-control law if President Truman signs it, as Senate Democratic Leader BARKLEY advises, rather than risk having no price-control law at all after June 30. That is, it won't satisfy those who demand rigid Government restraint of prices.

But rigid restraint of prices has been made impossible by unwise administration policies, including encouragement to a sharp and sudden rise of wages. And, we believe, Chester Bowles and others promote a dangerous delusion when they tell the people that their escape from inflationary calamity depends on how much power the OPA gets from Congress.

No amount of OPA power can insure the volume of production which is the only real protection against the kind of inflation now menacing this country. But arbitrary, blundering use of OPA power can impede production, and in countless cases has.

We disagree with those who want price controls scrapped immediately. Essential during the war, such controls will be necessary in lessening degree until the country is further along the road to normal balance between supply and demand. However, as Mr. Truman and Mr. Bowles often have said, industry, business, and agriculture as well as labor should be allowed and helped to return to a free-market basis as quickly as safety will permit.

If the OPA had shown more desire to speed that return—and less of the inevitable bureaucratic tendency to perpetuate itself—we believe Congress would have extended most of its powers along with its lease on life. If that master propagandist, Mr. Bowles, had been as zealous in helping Congress as he was in accusing it of evil motives, the country probably could have had a much better price-control law.

The law it is likely to get does not necessarily mean runaway prices. It does mean that the OPA will have considerably less discretion to refuse or delay relief sought by producers and to impose its own notions as to what are proper profits. But we believe most industrialists, businessmen, and farmers are just as eager as the wage earners and consumers to avoid uncontrolled inflation. And the weakening of OPA protection should mean a strengthening of efforts by the American people to protect themselves.

The need is for much more self-restraint than most of us have been showing.

Business, industry, and agriculture can restrain the temptation to grab for more than fair prices and reasonable profits. Labor can restrain the temptation to strike and stop production. Consumers can restrain the impulse to pay almost any price for almost anything. Purchasing power can be saved profitably in war bonds instead of wasted in a scramble for scarce goods.

And, if the Government will only restrain its spending, its deficit-financing, bank-borrowing, monetary and credit policies which pump up inflationary pressures, the powers retained by OPA can be enough.

Bill Hart

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, as one of the million of grown-up girls "shading into their forties" who fondly remembers Bill Hart, and for whom he "embodied romance and gallantry," I note his passing with a nostalgic sigh.

The following editorial from the New York Times of June 26 echoes the sentiments of this Bill Hart fan:

WILLIAM S. HART

Most people have trouble recalling the title of a single one of the old Hart westerns, but millions of grown-up boys and girls shading into their forties fondly remember Bill Hart. More than any other rider of the screen, from Broncho Billy to Tom Mix, he stereotyped for a whole generation the tradition of our last frontier, where men were men and women were angels.

It wasn't really like that and neither was Bill. He was no reformed bad man, as he was sometimes pictured, but a reformed postal clerk and Shakespearean actor who had once even dared the balcony scene as Romeo. As a visiting youth Hart had savored the heady flavor of the still wild Dakotas. That shaped his destiny, though it was only on the stage that he learned to be a cowboy. Yet he felt he was made for the movies, sought an opening there, and the movies made him. The stories through which he flickered were always the same, and so was Bill. He was no horse-opera ballad crooner, however. He tried hard to reflect the dangerous life he had sentimentalized. He insisted on authentic western detail, knew how to handle a horse, and never used a double. Nobody could look down an empty gun barrel with more sangfroid and nobody could bring two pearl-handled revolvers into quicker action for a triumph of justice. Nothing scared him, nothing even perturbed him; his every posture was noble. Oddly enough, his long, impassive, bony face seemed to resemble that of his almost equally famous pinto pony, Paint. But he embodied romance in countless feminine hearts and inspired instant hero worship in the masculine breast. There will never be another Bill Hart. The background is faded and the type is dated, but the memory is still green and fresh.

Observations on OPA and Our Present-Day Food Problems

REMARKS
OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

THE ABC'S OF INFLATION

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, when the purchasing power of the people exceeds the stock of available goods on hand, we get inflation. To prevent inflation—or to cure it when it already exists—we must either reduce the people's purchasing power or increase the supply of available goods. The two factors in inflation, purchasing power and available goods, must be kept in balance to insure stabilized prices.

Today we are not threatened with inflation: we have inflation. To cure it we must speed up production. We must produce, produce, and then produce—in factory, mine, mill, and on the farm. Purchasing power has been piling up rapidly over the past several years, until we now have a reservoir of over $100,000,000,000 in the shape of Government bonds and cash balances. The only possible way to satisfy the present-day cash demand for goods—and hold prices steady—is to produce enough goods to meet this excessive demand, and do it almost immediately. Every handicap upon production today contributes to the inflationary trend and accelerates the same. That is one reason why the present wave of strikes is so serious. A firm hand at the helm of the ship of state is needed today if we are to speed up production and head off inflation.

THE RIGHT WAY

Mr. Speaker, many persons in high Government positions do not realize the extent that Government policies are retarding the reconversion program and preventing production. Mr. Bowles of OPA is an outstanding example of this fact. He denies that OPA has retarded or is retarding production. No one questions Mr. Bowles' sincerity, but most people question his conclusions. Mr. Bowles has closed his eyes to facts that are widely known in industry, and prefers to base his decisions upon general statistics that are meaningless when applied to present-day conditions. Thousands of specific instances can be given where OPA policies have retarded or blocked badly needed production. Mr. Bowles would do well to forget his peeve against the National Association of Manufacturers and personally travel the highways and byways of the Nation, visiting with our small manufacturers, and seeing with his own eyes the havoc OPA has brought about. If he would do this we feel sure he would reverse his attitude and would do everything he could to encourage production instead of hindering it. Increased production is the only way to hold down prices.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Mr. Speaker, there is unlimited demand for the commodities our manufacturers produce, and unlimited money with which to pay for this merchandise. The chief excuse for the OPA is inflation. Inflation is held up as a terrible bugaboo, the monster that would destroy us all. It is true that if OPA restrictions were taken off we would have some advance in prices for a short period of time, but we would have production almost immediately; and competition, production, and the law of supply and demand would very speedily solve all of our troubles. The law of supply and demand cannot be set aside by man any more than he can stop the sun from shining or the tide from ebbing and flowing. The sooner we get down to common sense and get rid of the OPA, the sooner we will have peace and prosperity in the Nation.

OUR PRESENT FOOD SHORTAGE

Mr. Speaker, errors in judgment, bungling, miscalculations, and conflicting policies on the part of armchair planners in Washington are the principal causes of our present-day food shortages. The explanation is about as follows:

First: The demand for food in 1946 was underestimated by our armchair planners because they overestimated the number that would be unemployed this spring. They said our unemployed would total 8 to 10 million. It is actually less than one-third of that number. The more wages paid out the greater the consumption of food; therefore our food consumption was underestimated.

Second. This being an election year, food rationing was discontinued; but food subsidies totaling $2,000,000,000 per year were continued. These two ill-advised Government policies resulted in greater food consumption.

Third. An unusually cool growing season coupled with early frosts caused our corn crop in 1945—although normal in amount—to be high in moisture content and low in feed value. This resulted in an acute feed situation that reflects itself today in the quantity of meat, poultry, milk, and milk products that are available for the market. It also resulted in the substitution of large quantities of wheat for corn as feed for livestock, thereby further reducing the amount of wheat available for human consumption. During the last 6 months 145,000,000 bushels more of wheat than usual was fed to livestock on the farms. This excess feeding of wheat was the result of distorted and ill-advised Government price ceilings on corn and wheat which forced farmers to give priority to hogs over human beings in wheat consumption. Six times the amount of wheat we are supposed to ship to the starving peoples of Europe was used for animal feed on our farms during the past 6 months. This situation was neither foreseen nor anticipated by the armchair planners in Washington.

FOOD RATIONING AGAIN?

Mr. Speaker, if we are forced to return to the rationing of foods, as Chester Bowles suggested, it will be because the administration has failed to bring about the food production which would have made rationing unnecessary. The threat of rationing will remain as long as there is government interference with food production. When housewives cannot buy meat, butter, and other staple foods, some kind of rationing may be necessary. But rationing will not add one pound to the world's food supply. Only increased production will alleviate hunger. Rationing merely distributes scarcity.

It is significant that the commodities Mr. Bowles wanted to start rationing again—meat, butter, and fats—are the very commodities in which shortages have been created by OPA policies. The man who created the shortages now wants the power to ration them again. The Republican Congressional Food Study Committee warned months ago that this Nation's reserves of many basic food commodities were at an all-time low. It urged that steps be taken to assure abundant crops. Those steps were not taken. Before the American people return to food rationing, they should have the answers to the following questions:

First. Why has nothing been done to bring about a desperately needed increase in production of farm machinery?

Second. Why, in the face of a critical world shortage of fertilizer, have Government-owned nitrate plants been permitted to stand idle since last summer?

Third. Why is OPA permitted to maintain a price structure that discourages the production of milk, sugar, butter, meat, and other basic foods?

Production, not propaganda for the continuation of Government mismanagement, is the answer to food shortages and hunger.

NO MEAT, NO BUTTER, NO BREAD, AND NO SENSE

Mr. Speaker, bread lines are here again—not the bread lines of 1933 that the New Dealers said they would eliminate if given a chance. Today's bread lines are the result of 14 years of New Deal planning based upon an economy of scarcity. After 14 years we have been managed out of meat; we have been managed out of butter; we have been managed out of bread; we have been managed out of a long list of everyday household necessities. Flour mills have been closing every day for many months because the mills could not get wheat at OPA ceilings. They were unable to buy wheat because the Government purchased all available wheat from farmers and are holding it for export. While flour mills all over the Nation were closing, Chester Bowles kept telling the farmers they should not hold their wheat because price ceilings would not be raised. In the end, not only were ceilings on grain raised twice, but the Government created its own black market by offering a 30-cent bonus for wheat and corn. The American public has been paying dearly for its OPA price control in nylon lines, butter lines, meat lines, shirt lines, and finally—in bread lines.

ARE YOU SELF-SUPPORTING?

Mr. Speaker, do you realize that you did not pay in full for your dinner yesterday, whether you ate it at home or in a restaurant? No one in America paid in full for his dinner yesterday, neither millionaire nor pauper. You did not pay in full for your sugar, your butter, your meat, your coffee, or your bread. Part of your dinner bill was charged to Uncle Sam and added to the public debt. So, whether you like it or not, whether you realize it or not, you are living partly off the Government. You are not paying your own way.

Uncle Sam has been paying out some $2,000,000,000 in food subsidies each year and adding it to the public debt.

OPA wants to continue food subsidies. Should we continue to saddle our children with part of our present-day food bill?

The Democrats' Platform

OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Indianapolis Times of June 24, 1946:

THE DEMOCRATS' PLATFORM

Indiana Democrats, obviously, are realists, well able to identify a millstone when it's tied around their necks.

That's the only explanation for their reported decision to leave out of their State platform the customary eulogy of the incumbent head of their party, and to get as far away as possible from the Democratic national administration and all its works. There is apparent a strong feeling among Democrats themselves that association with their President, their Supreme Court, their OPA, even with their PAC, can only cost them votes in Indiana this fall.

It isn't a new feeling, although it may be a growing trend. Two years ago there was sharp criticism by left-wing New Deal elements of the party's two excellent nominees for Senator and Governor because they shied away from President Roosevelt and didn't include him in their campaign posters. Even so it was pretty evident that their link with the New Deal alone was enough to defeat them. There seems to be no doubt left in either party today that Hoosier voters have turned definitely away from the Federal Government's policies of the last 14 years, and that they are likely to lay the whole New Deal mess on President Truman's doorstep, even though he only inherited, and did not create it.

Rather wisely, we think, the State organization is concentrating on State, rather than national issues in this convention. They have, in that field, a generally good program to offer the voters. Such items as direct primaries for nomination of senatorial and State-office candidates, nonpartisan selection of judges, and some of the others they may propose, are reforms that cry aloud for action. There is a pretty strong platform in the making. Given equally strong candidates, and a few more Republican blunders, the Democratic Party's prospects in Indiana, even in this year of evident Republican swing, are by no means hopeless.

At least they recognize the errors of their national-party policy, if their national party, split as it is among leftists and reactionaries, may indeed be said to have a policy, and are ready to formulate a sound policy of their own, on a local and State level. That is all to the good, for Indiana. Absolute one-party control isn't likely to work any better in Republican hands than it has in Democratic hands. We hope they go through with their proposal to build a powerful progressive platform in their convention, and that they put into the campaign a slate of nominees strong enough to present a real challenge to the overconfident Indiana Republican machine.

The Price-Control Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under permission previously granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following statement by the Committee To Protect the Consumers, which is composed of a group of Members of the House. The statement follows:

Each of the undersigned Members of Congress who are members of the informal Committee for the Protection of the Consumer were and are in favor of a strong price-control law. In the vote this week we were faced with a Hobson's choice—to vote for a weakened bill or to eliminate price control completely.

For all practical purposes OPA was scuttled several weeks ago when the House and Senate adopted emasculating amendments. That was when the damage was done. The conference committee could only act on what was in front of it, amendments forged by special interest groups which would have an inflationary effect.

The conference bill did save rent control and kept some controls on food, particularly meat. The rest of the bill is bad and will release inflationary forces.

Reluctantly we voted for the conference report. That report represents the maximum of price control upon which a majority of the Members of Congress would agree.

There is one chance left for continuous effective price control. That would come about only through a Presidential veto of the present bill, the sustaining of that veto by Congress, and the subsequent passing of a simple resolution by both Houses, continuing the present Price Control Act. In such event we would certainly support such action.

Portrait of a Lady

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky from the Washington Times-Herald of June 22, 1946:

THESE DAYS
(By George E. Sokolsky)
PORTRAIT OF A LADY

It seems to me altogether wrong that CLARE LUCE should be permitted to retire from public life. True, she said that she would not be a candidate again, but that statement was made under circumstances so emotionally tense as to require reconsideration—certainly by her constituents.

Of the ladies of the Congress, CLARE LUCE continues to excite the most interest and attention. I once worked for this lady in the relationship of a free-lance writer to an assistant editor. She was then not as popular or unpopular, depending upon how one approaches the subject. I admired her then for her fine intellect, her ability to get at the heart of a story, her keen and precise mind that grasped ideas, even when actions and events confused them.

CLARE LUCE is unusual, not because she is an interesting woman but because she is a brilliant person. Like Anne O'Hare McCormick and Dorothy Thompson, her power of expression is generated by knowledge and conviction. If women find her repartee ungenteel and overwhelming, they are correct in their judgment, because she thinks sharply and precisely and finds the hypocrisies of gentility vulgar. She speaks with sureness of purpose, because when she speaks she has a purpose. It is never the idle chatter of one who either dines to be seen or sings for her dinner. These women, Clare and Anne and Dorothy, influence American opinion as few men do because they are incapable of that masculine compromise which goes by the phrase, being a good fellow. They speak with the positiveness of a mother fighting for the character of her own child.

There have been tragedies in CLARE LUCE'S life which have aroused in her dormant spiritual powers and have altered her outlook, making it difficult for her to play the game of politics for personal glory and profit and power. She seeks rather to arouse a flaccid public to the tragedy of their own lives; to the broken families; to prejudices which reject those whom God created for no other reason than that they were made to look different from others; to the heartless betrayal of civilization in the rush for a promised but false security.

It is unpopular and even unprofitable to swim against the tide, as anyone knows who during these last 10 years or more has spoken and written and preached the error of discarding centuries of wisdom for a decade of wisecracks. To such a woman as CLARE LUCE, unpopularity can mean nothing except a stimulant to a greater activity and a swifter and surer battle for what she believes to be right.

It is as futile as it is impossible to advise such a woman to be practical for practicality can mean little more than time serving, than making the best of a bad bargain—the sort of thing that Senator ALBEN BARKLEY does in public and Senator ROBERT WAGNER in private. And it has been their practicality that has left us without principles or ideals, while such a person as CLARE LUCE cuts through the fog of confused thinking and finding the error, hits it down with a sarcasm so deadly and an aim so sure that the hypocrites flee like shamed creatures.

Yet, were she nothing but a sarcastic, satirical person, she would be a shrew like Harold Ickes, who soured on life and his own fate, finds no redeeming grace in anything upon earth or in heaven or I presume in hell, except those who happen, for a rare moment, to accept his biliousness as philosophy.

CLARE LUCE is different; forever she holds high the deep idealism and abiding faith of a traditional Americanism as embodied in the philosophy of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. It may appear that she sometimes quarrels over details that seem to mean nothing; yet, they are parts of a mosaic of the permanent; put all together they belong to the eternal and objective truth that man is his brother's keeper not only to support him materially but to guide him spiritually aright.

It is not likely that she will be permitted to retire from politics as she has announced. It should not be permitted.

Taxicab Strike in the District of Columbia

REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, we see today those who would paralyze the taxicab service in the District of Columbia. These individuals call this action a vacation. I call it a strike. I call it a strike against the Congress; I call it a strike against the government of the District of Columbia; I call it a strike against the people of the District of Columbia—yea—I even call it a strike against the United States itself.

They are striking against the constituted authority of the District of Columbia, whose powers were delegated by the Congress of the United States. Those responsible for this act of violence—and it is violence, Mr. Speaker, because we read in the public news columns where many vandals of this crew have damaged and wrecked the cabs of those who are attempting to fulfill their obligations to serve the people.

I favor—and I hope it will not be long in forthcoming—the rescinding or revoking of all licenses of the parties responsible for this condition. I have talked this matter over with the chairman of the District Committee, my distinguished colleague the Honorable JOHN L. MCMILLAN from South Carolina, who has been maligned by these people along with Mr. Flanagan, of the PUC, because they have not bowed down to the demands of certain ones of this group.

The Congress should give Mr. Flanagan concrete authority to revoke licenses in cases of this nature. These cab drivers know well that a ceiling, the like of which they demand, cannot be granted. They know their demands are impossible. Their demands are in violation of the good faith which they are supposed to evidence in obtaining licenses to operate cabs in the District of Columbia. The PUC, therefore, and not the Commissioners should have authority in this particular.

Let us teach these boys a lesson. Revoke their licenses. There are many veterans in the District who would like an opportunity to make some of the money these boys have been making. There will be plenty of service to the people if the heroes who won the war could be permitted to carry on where these drivers leave off.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial on this matter from the Washington Post of this morning, June 27:

TAXI DRIVERS

Reports are in conflict as to the effectiveness of the taxi drivers' strike, euphemistically called a vacation. At the date of writing, however, a good many drivers are still on the job, while the riding public appears to be rather indifferent spectators of the controversy. It is our guess, therefore, that the present strike, like the AFL demonstration of last January, will fizzle out for lack of adequate support from the drivers themselves.

The chief grievance of the drivers and the cab-owning companies that are aiding and abetting the strike grows out of the failure of Congress promptly to enact legislation limiting the number of licensed cabs in the District. Chairman MCMILLAN, of the House District Committee, and Chairman Flanagan, of the Public Utilities Commission, are the principal targets of attack. The former is under fire because his committee has shelved various bills imposing limitations on the number of operating taxies; the latter, because he has resisted union efforts to coerce the PUC into taking hasty action on their behalf by strikes and threats of strikes.

Mr. Flanagan's reappointment to the PUC comes up for consideration this week, and strike leaders are said to be hopeful that their hostility to him will be regarded by Senators as a black mark against his record. It is our hope and belief, however, that Mr. Flanagan's refusal to yield to union pressure tactics will be counted to his credit and will strengthen his candidacy.

We have repeatedly stated that, in our opinion, Congress ought to give the PUC discretionary power to limit the number of taxicabs operating in the District. For the time may again come when the volume of business will not be sufficient to provide living wages for all the men who seek licenses. But there is no need for haste in anticipating this possibility. Certainly there is no warrant whatever for the immediate imposition of restrictions designed to give existing licensed drivers a monopoly of the District's taxicab business. And there is even less reason for putting owners of taxis in a position to charge exorbitant rentals based on such a monopoly. As a matter of fact, regulation of cab rentals is called for both as a protection to drivers of rented cabs and for the sake of the riding public. For rate schedules, even if adjusted to yield fair returns to drivers, will speedily become inadequate if rental charges are excessive.

Like many other organized groups, taxi drivers are feeling the adverse effects of a postwar let-down in the demand for their services. Consequently they clamor for protective legislation to insure a continuance of the abnormally large returns resulting from unavoidable limitation on the number of operating cabs. To yield to such importunities would mean to subject the people of Washington to the hardships resulting from inadequate cab service. During the war they endured such hardships with a minimum of grumbling, but they would not and should not be expected to tolerate them under peacetime conditions.

OPA

OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the following letters from constituents in my district, which are typical of numerous letters received continually, as well as the opinion expressed by hundreds upon personal contact, with respect to conditions prevailing as a result of OPA and other Government regulations.

If something is not done to correct the situation described and make it possible for these folks to continue to produce the foodstuffs we and other nations so desperately need, we are going to find ourselves facing increasing food shortages in this land of plenty:

I think OPA was a good thing during the war, but it has had its day. One just can't buy feed, it is so scarce, and we cannot raise any hogs or chickens to make any profit. One can't have but just a few chickens.

Mr. and Mrs. JAMES OWENS.

LA BELLE, MO.

From a turkey raiser:

The way I look at this, this should be a free country, we should be able to sell what we raise at a profit and at prices according to supply and demand. We've been raising 250 turkeys, sold stock because we can't buy feed at $4.50 to $5 a 100 pounds and get 30 cents for turkeys. The ceiling was 34 cents but we could get only 30 cents.

Mr. and Mrs. ERNEST WALKER.

LA BELLE, MO.

We should have free competition. I don't believe the Government should run the railroads. The law of supply and demand is the only law. You can't find 1,000 bushels of corn any place in this part of the country. This OPA is ruining the country.

EARL MOORE.
C. C. MCDANIEL.
JOHN D. NORTHCRAFT.

LA BELLE, MO.

It seems to me that what we need is a better relationship among nations and an established world market for our products. Our problems within 2 or 3 years will be to dispose of our surplus from our farms. At the present time our farmers are laboring under the handicap of a lack of balance between feed supplies and prices, and livestock prices. Fewer animals are being fed and bred, which fact will cause a great reduction in food supplies for the next year.

L. W. MADSEN.

KNOX COUNTY.

The farmer is underpaid. He can't make it with the present prices that OPA has on hogs, cattle, and feed; $14.35 is the most you can get for these hogs. You can't put $1 corn in these hogs and make anything because here's where they get you is on this trucking—the margin is too wide there somewhere. It should be on a mileage basis. The Government would have had plenty of meats, chickens, etc., if they'd equalized these prices so the farmer would have made a little profit.

ROY S. HAYDON.

LA BELLE, MO.

New Deal Shortages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, time and again I have raised my voice on the floor of this House with reference to the critical feed situation for livestock and poultry. The mills that handle feed for the dairy industry as well as for poultry and livestock on the farms, including feed for sheep and hogs, are desperately in need of feed to furnish the farmers in order to save the livestock and poultry from destruction. Were it not for the fact that livestock can be turned out to pasture it would be utterly impossible for the great majority of the farms to continue to keep dairy herds or other livestock. Farmers have been forced to sell tested herds for beef because of the action of the OPA in fixing ceiling prices far too low to cover the cost of production of milk and butter.

It is not grain alone that is needed for feed, but one of the most valuable sources of livestock feed is black-strap molasses. I was amazed to find that notwithstanding the inability of the feed mills and merchants to get black-strap molasses for the dairy farmers, vast shipments of black-strap molasses have been going abroad for some time and our exports are on the increase. I wish to call attention to the amount of molasses exported from this country in 1943, 1944, and 1945. The figures are as follows:

Nineteen hundred and forty-three, 234,114 gallons, or approximately 4,682 barrels, valued at $126,351.

Nineteen hundred and forty-four, 150,306 gallons, or approximately 3,006 barrels, valued at $71,683.

Nineteen hundred and forty-five, 1,620,793 gallons, or approximately 32,400 barrels, valued at $451,877.

Of the 1,620,793 gallons, or approximately 32,400 barrels exported in 1945, 1,012,882 gallons, or approximately 20,500 barrels were exported to the United Kingdom.

Inasmuch as the Government statistics do not separate molasses and black-strap molasses into two categories the amount of black-strap molasses in the exports can only be determined by an examination of the unit value, which, however, does disclose that the larger portion of the figures, which I have presented, in gallons and barrels refers to black-strap molasses.

It is becoming more evident every day that there are exporters in this country who are far more interested in supplying foreign governments with articles sorely needed at home than they are in trying to conserve our sources of food by supplying our home people. I could mention and disclose the figures showing the amount of farm machinery that is being sent abroad which the farmers here desperately need. I could show further that much of the farm machinery is not being used abroad; in fact in many instances cannot be used. Of course, it does not disturb the manufacturers of farm machinery or those who are running the black market for UNRRA and other New Deal spending agencies whether the machinery is used abroad or permitted to rust out, so long as it is paid for by the taxpayers of this country. If we are going to have food for the people here and for the starving people abroad it is about time that we made it possible for our farmers in this country to have the essentials with which to produce the food. Sufficient feed for livestock and poultry is essential if we are going to maintain the dairy farm and poultry industry. I believe that it is about time that the foreign governments reduce their armed forces and return the millions of men under arms over there to their homes, which would enable the farmers among them to return to their fields and begin to produce food. It is no wonder that Russia refuses to make any accounting of its distribution of the food sent there by UNRRA. Between the black market of some of the agencies which we have created and the use made of some of the food by the dictators of foreign countries to force people to yield to their demands, the food intended for legitimate purposes has been used otherwise, which acts cannot be explained except to charge it to New Deal bureaucratic stupidity. I want our country removed from the grip of OPA, from Government domination and regimentation so that this great country can go into maximum production.

Just how long the people can be sold on the idea of regimentation and the Hitler technique now being employed by Government functionaries, as a result of the vast propaganda army of 45,000 paid publicists with a budget of $74,000,000 taken from the taxpayers' pockets, is a question. I believe that thoughtful people now realize what a swindle these controls have been. The astounding and disconcerting problem is whether or not propaganda fabrications by Government bureaus can continue to dethrone reason and substitute for it mass hysteria and emotionalism, which has thus far kept bureaucrats and their minions in power. It is doubly alarming when the representatives of the people yield to this program of bureaucratic propaganda, and as representatives fail to remove root and branch the New Deal agencies which are not only heading the country toward insolvency but which are at the same time reducing the Nation's food supply and even the supply of essential medicines for the sick. It would seem to me that the doctrine of the redistribution of wealth, the restriction of production, and the regimentation of a free people have gone far enough. Unless there is an awakening by the people who believe in our form of government and a willingness to fight for its restoration then there will be a departure from the heretofore highest living standard in the world, the highest wages, the best working conditions, the greatest degree of racial and religious liberty and tolerance, and the finest educational system in the world. The very conditions that now prevail throughout the United States after all the ballyhoo of the bureaucrats ought to cause the people to think and act before they shall have lost all the pleasures and benefits under our free-enterprise system with its high living level, high wages, superior working conditions, fine educational system, and great degree of racial and religious freedom and tolerance, and political liberty. All these can be lost a little at a time until it is too late to regain this great heritage of economic freedom under free enterprise.

The shortage of essential goods which now exists in this great and once producing country is an indictment and conviction of the New Deal bureaucrats who now clamor for more power and more of the taxpayers' money to spend. By their rescripts, their edicts, their thousands upon thousands of insane regulations, this free enterprise country has been reduced to the lowest level of production in its history.

As pointed out by Lindsay and Crouse:

The country is short of meat, maple sirup, lemons, bread, butter, cheese, milk, barley, ice cream, candy, pie, cake, fruit sirups, onions, bacon, sugar, fats, doughnuts, molasses, coconut oil, olive oil, cottonseed oil. There is a shortage of salesmen, of train seats, of plane seats, of pharmacists, of hotel rooms, of veterinarians, carpenters, piano makers, gardeners, telephone linemen, painters, cooks, and parlor maids.

Nine months after the fourth consecutive biggest wheat crop on record was raised, a cold spring wind was blowing through hundreds of empty grain elevators throughout the Midwest. There are shortages of X-ray tubes, dental gold scrap, burlap bags, Pliofilm, manila cordage, bulldozers, quinidine, power cranes, laboratory and medical instruments, fractional-horsepower motors, circular saws, solder, natural resins, road rollers, electrocardiographs, roofing material, greenhouses, plumbing supplies. Paper is short. Artists cannot buy sable-hair paint brushes. There is a shortage of spare parts and of theaters.

The country is short of lumber, coal, steel, tin, lead, antimony, textile piece goods, shellac, glass, lead pipe, paint, copper, mercury scrap, platinum scrap. The country is short of men's suits, children's clothing, film, cameras, lenses, towels, sheets, pillowcases, automobiles, trucks, tractors, tires, chewing gum, soft drinks, white shirts, pianos, radios, washing machines, refrigerators, work clothing, maple for high heels, shoe tacks, telephones.

Contribution of Palestine to Allied War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I enclose an item which appeared recently in the Boston Post, and was sent to me by A. C. Webber, of Boston, Mass., containing valuable information that appeared in an article in the April issue of the U. P. A. Report, a magazine published by the United Palestine Appeal, showing the effective assistance given to the allied cause during the war by the Jewish industry and the Jewish people of Palestine:

PALESTINE GAVE MUCH TO WAR—EXTENT OF CONTRIBUTION OF JEWS GIVEN IN ARTICLE

An article appearing in the April issue of the UPA Report, a magazine published by the United Palestine Appeal, gives a striking account of the contribution to the allied war effort made by the Jews in Palestine, many of them refugees. The article, under a Jerusalem date line, is as follows:

"RAPID CONVERSION

"JERUSALEM.—Following the lifting of military censorship on information concerning industrial and agricultural war production, a special study issue recently by the trade and industry department of the Jewish agency, which is supported by funds provided by the United Palestine Appeal, reveals that between 1940 and VE-day in 1945 Jewish industry in Palestine supplied the Allied forces with goods valued at LP38,000,000, the bulk of which was in industrial products.

"This figure evidences not only the rapid conversion to war production which took place in Palestine, but also the enormously increased rates of production which Jewish workers were able to achieve.

"Metallurgy was the principal branch of Jewish industry geared to the economic war effort. It turned out vital war weapons and vehicles, such as millions of mines, batteries, petrol tins, and other parts, millions of yards of electric cable, barbed wire, water bottles, steam rollers, and furnaces. The British commercial agent in Palestine wrote that 'every one of the millions of land mines which conquered Rommel in the Libyan desert in Montgomery's glorious campaign was made in Palestine.'

"Variety of commodities

"Military orders placed with Jewish Palestinian industry from the beginning of 1940 until war's close called for a variety of commodities including food, metallurgical articles, textiles and clothing, wooden articles, pharmaceutical products, building materials, leather, paper and printing material.

"Jewish contractors also undertook large service projects for military purposes. Transport services did their share, as seen in the rise of passengers carried from 56,000,000 persons in 1939 to 130,000,000 in 1944 (including tens of thousands of military personnel). Shipyards turned out vessels for the royal navy, including two large minesweepers. Repairs to damaged ships were also completed in record time. One tanker, which the navy at Alexandria estimated would take nine months to repair, was back at sea after two months in a Jewish shipyard at Haifa. A refrigeration ship, which was believed to need repairs lasting several months, took six days to refloat in perfect condition after being put into the stocks at a Haifa Jewish shipyard.

"Set agricultural record

"Agricultural production too showed extraordinary increases during those years. For example: Jewish dairy production, increasing yearly, reached a record high of 68,500,000 litres in 1945, compared with 61,500,000 litres in 1944, and 35,000,000 litres in 1939. This includes a rise in milk output of 96 percent over the six years. Egg production rose from 58,800,000 units in 1939 to 83,500,000 in 1945. Similarly high rates of development were reported in all other agricultural efforts. A large proportion of these products were allotted for use by Allied military personnel stationed in North Africa and the Middle East.

"All of these phenomenal developments and the great contributions to the war effort were made possible by the assistance to Jewish immigrants and to industrial and agricultural establishments, of the Keren Hayesod (Palestine Foundation Fund) and the Jewish National Fund which receive their funds from the United States through the United Palestine Appeal."

Loan to Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under consent granted to extend my remarks, I include a copy of a letter to Secretary Vinson, copies of which were sent to other agencies and copy of replies thereto:

JUNE 1, 1946.

Hon. FRED M. VINSON,
The Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand the present Italian Government has filed an application for a loan through the Export-Import Bank in connection with the economic rehabilitation of the national economy of Italy and its people. In connection with this, may I make the observation that any steps taken toward the rehabilitation of Italy and its people would be a powerful contribution in strengthening the moral outlook of a nation such as Italy, which is undergoing intense economic distress.

Based upon information I have, it is my opinion that it would be for the national interest of our own country, as well as for the best interests of Italy and its people, if a loan, under satisfactory conditions, were made to the Government of Italy as soon as possible. In view of the existing world situation, if the policy of our Government in connection with such a loan is to be favorable, it seems to me expeditious action would be for the best interests of both the people of the United States and Italy.

In addition, the granting of this loan would be a great contribution toward building the foundations of future permanent peace by forward-looking nations.

My purpose in writing is to make inquiry of you as to whether or not such a loan is under consideration; and if so, the present status of the negotiations.

It is my strong belief that if a loan is under consideration, and if the bank is favorable to such a loan—which I think it should be—then negotiations should be consummated as quickly as possible, in order that the loan might be utilized toward strengthening, internally, the outlook of the people of Italy. The result, I believe, will be marked as a necessary contribution toward the strengthening of legitimate government in Italy.

Very sincerely yours.

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, June 21, 1946.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN McCORMACK: Thank you very much for sending me a copy of your letter to Secretary Vinson regarding the application of the Italian Government for a loan from the Export-Import Bank.

The staff committees of the National Advisory Council have been studying carefully the economic aspects of the proposed Italian loan, and I can tell you further that the political and related factors you mention are also considered quite pertinent.

I assume that Secretary Vinson, or now John Snyder, will keep you posted concerning progress in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 19, 1946.

The Honorable JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. McCORMACK: Thank you for sending Secretary Byrnes a copy of your letter to Secretary Vinson, urging a loan to Italy by the Export-Import Bank.

I have brought your letter to the attention of Assistant Secretary Clayton, who is the representative of this Department on the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank, which is now considering such a loan to Italy.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON,
Acting Secretary.

THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK,
June 10, 1946.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
Office of Majority Leader,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McCORMACK: Thank you for sending me a copy of your letter to the Treasury Department with respect to a loan to Italy. This matter has been before the bank for some time and I am very glad to have your views on the matter.

Sincerely yours,

WM. McC. MARTIN, Jr.,
Chairman.

Control of Atomic Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. KOPPLEMANN
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me, I wish to insert in the Appendix my speech of last evening in support of the provisions for civilian control of atomic energy development as recommended in the bill adopted by the Senate:

It was less than a year ago that the world greeted with awe and consternation the news that the atomic era had been launched. Nevertheless, despite the thanksgiving and the elation that the war's end brought, thinking people the world over began to worry over the monster that American science had produced. We had created a tremendous power for destruction. How were we going to apply it in the future? Fantastic predictions were made. The imaginations of the fairy-tale masters of old, the myth writers of ancient days, the creators of the supermen of today were beggared by the fantasy that spun out of atomic bombs that brought Japan to her knees.

Should we keep the know-how of the atom bomb secret; should we share it with the world, with our allies? Should we apply it only for military purposes; should we keep the control of the development of atomic energy in the hands of government or turn it over to private industry?

These were the immediate questions that followed in the wake of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. And then, as the Nation recovered from the joyous shock of victory, the scientists, who had labored long to discover the secret of splitting the atom, came down from their ivory towers and took their proper role as citizens, actively interested in the issues of the day. From the wealth of the contribution they had made to the unfolding of the atom's secrets they pleaded that the forces that could create such destruction, offered also the promise of tremendous advancement for mankind, and that the emphasis of future research should be placed on discovering how atomic energy could be applied to easing man's lot on earth. Medical scientists envisioned new cures for diseases. Industrial scientists envisioned new methods of production, new materials for production. Political scientists saw a sounder basis for international good will, a happier world where the interchange of new discoveries would improve the economic and social lot of the masses, and thus remove one of the irritating causes that lead to war.

People charged with the responsibility of working out the ways and means of making international cooperation effective, agreed that the control should be primarily civilian, and that furthermore an international system of controlling the development of atomic energy should be worked out. At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers held in Moscow last December the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission was formed. As a consequence, a group of distinguished consultants, named by the State Department, worked out a report on the international control of atomic energy, suggesting the control of the raw materials of atomic energy at the source, and supervision of the manufacture of atomic energy. This report is known as the Acheson-Lilienthal report. The recommendations offered to the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission some days ago by Bernard Baruch, the American member of that Commission, bears the chief provisions of the Acheson-Lilienthal report.

We do not pretend to know all the answers to the problems of working out the peace or international cooperation. In the main I heartily approve of the Baruch plan, but recognize that in dealing with 51 other nations, only 2 of whom share the atomic knowledge we have acquired, there will have to be a give-and-take to win the cooperation of all. But under no circumstances can we, or should we, weaken on our insistence that whatever knowledge we dispense be used primarily for peaceful purposes.

Obviously no country except ours, Great Britain, and Canada have sufficient knowledge to manufacture or use atomic energy. In the breathing space given us, until the scientists of other countries hit upon the secret, we must develop a plan which will have the active participation of all countries. The questions involved are of the greatest magnitude. Their solution will prove the supreme test of whether human beings can cooperate to save humanity.

Last November, the House Committee on Military Affairs, after brief consideration, hastily reported out a measure providing for military control. Opposition to the bill was intense among the Members of the Congress. Growing opposition to military control was in evidence on the part of the public. That bill never was brought up for a vote, for in the meantime the Senate Special Committee on Atomic Energy was set up, and that group began at once an exhaustive study of the question preparatory to drawing up suitable legislation. I must pause here to add my tribute to the extraordinary energy and determination with which Senator McMAHON pursued his credo that for a Nation dedicated to rebuilding a world for peace, it is imperative that further development of atomic energy be assigned to civilian control.

After prolonged hearings and discussion, the measure was unanimously reported out by the special Senate committee, and passed by the Senate. Numerous of its provisions represent compromise between varying opinions. The measure is important in setting forth the policy of this Government with respect to the application of atomic energy for domestic purposes, but full recognition is accorded the necessity of military application until such time as by international agreement uses of atomic energy for military purposes can be outlawed.

The bill satisfied the innate American abhorrence for military dominance on any permanent scale. The American people do not like military domination or control. Naturally we accept it during wartime. We accept it now in part insofar as the Nation's welfare and protection are at stake in a world which has not yet torn itself free of the chaos of war. But we look to atomic energy as ultimately revolutionizing our whole scale of peaceful living. We would have preferred that this amazing achievement had first been tested for constructive purposes rather than for destructive purposes, but historical necessity having dictated the latter, we now want to turn our knowledge toward the betterment of mankind.

Despite licensing and patent provisions, the measure still leaves unsettled questions as to how we can prevent the grasping of private interests which will seek methods of profiteering out of the discoveries yet to be made. But those are questions for later consideration. The immediate thing now is to win the battle for civilian control which unexpectedly has been reopened by the House Committee on Military Affairs, despite the Senate's approval, despite the emphatic support of the administration, despite the hope of the majority of the people everywhere.

The provisions of the Baruch recommendations calling for international control dovetail well with international agreements we are trying to work out in order to effectuate the United Nations Charter.

I might cite by way of comparison the negotiations now under way to set up an international police force for which Congress approved our participation last December. The international police force envisions the day when each nation will have contributed its share of troop and armament power in a joint effort to quell aggression and maintain the peace through the combined cooperation of all nations. An effective international police force will eventually mean the reduction of the individual armies of the several nations. How soon we will reach that happy state of affairs when through mutual trust we will depend on each other to maintain peace remains to be seen, but we have been and are working at it, and will continue to work at it.

The questions involving international control of atomic development are more delicate. The several nations know how to raise, maintain, and equip an army. We are all fairly well abreast of each other in the modern weapons of warfare—with the exception of the atom bomb, against which all known defenses are powerless. And because we alone hold the whip hand, all the more is it necessary that we allay the natural distrust and suspicion of others who will fear us so long as we have this horrendous advantage.

If the shortsighted—indeed, the purely nationalistic—attitude which is prompting some members of the House Committee on Military Affairs to nullify civilian control prevails, how can we appeal for the cooperation of other nations, how can we deny their charge that our professions for peace are dishonest? The determination of the House committee to continue to oppose civilian control was immediately evidenced in their amendment that the commission of five mandatorily include one representative of the military, and could include two. With the absence of a unification of our armed forces, a merger which has been urged for some time, it is inconceivable that with the Army and Navy vying for recognition, an Army man would be appointed without a Navy man, or vice versa. Therefore, should this House committee provision prevail, we would be confronted at the outset with two military representatives on a commission of five.

And yet, the McMahon bill sets up a military liaison committee composed of representatives of the Army and Navy, to advise and consult with the civilian commission on all atomic energy matters relating to military applications, including the development, manufacture, use, and storage of bombs, the allocation of fissionable material for military research, and the control of information relating to the manufacture or utilization of atomic weapons. Furthermore, there is provision wherein the President may require the commission to yield to the wishes of the military. In that way, everything of possible interest to military atomic development will be available to the military, but the American people—and the world for that matter—would be on the whole, protected against the improper encroachment of the military in fields of purley civilian endeavor. I would point out that only last week the House appropriated $375,000,000 for further atomic research and production for military purpose alone.

Despite these safeguards for the military, there is a group in the country, which has spokesmen on the House Military Affairs Committee, determined to give military rule over the development and application of this greatest discovery in history. We must watch out lest the voice of Jacob will speak to the world but the hand of Esau operate in the country.

The point was well put by a constituent the other day. "I hope you are concentrating on international lawlessness," she wrote. "I have three small sons and a small daughter. I figure I can get them grown up, but it's up to you to see that they stay alive after that."

Few of us will ever understand the "why" and the "how" of the atom any more than we understand the "why" and "how" of electricity, radar, or jet propulsion. But we do know what the atom can do. We do know that it can mean world rebirth or world suicide.

We must insist that legislation pertaining to a twentieth-century achievement be tuned to the thinking of the twentieth century. Anything less will mean that we set the calendar back, with eventual chaos answering the yearning of people who want no more of war.

Minnesota Lumberman Has Solution to Housing Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents has developed an invention and idea which, in my opinion, would be a great contribution to the solution of the housing shortage problem, if he could get the "green light" from the various bureaus and agencies controlling priorities on materials or their help and support.

The constituent of whom I speak is Mr. George Berger, of Erskine, Minn. For the past 10 years or more he has spent considerable time perfecting the technique and the equipment needed to build his special type houses with specially grooved and cut lumber.

I have tried and will continue to try to convince Mr. Paul Porter of the OPA and Mr. Wilson Wyatt of the Federal Housing Administration that cooperation from them would mean the building of a great many more homes in a very short space of time.

Both of these officials so far have turned down my plea on the grounds that no exceptions can be made to the regulations set up by their respective agencies.

So that Members of Congress and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may know something of the principles involved in this new building idea, I am reprinting an article which appeared in the Minneapolis Star-Journal on Tuesday, March 26.

It was written by the business editor of the Star-Journal, Mr. Herb Paul. The article follows:

"LOG CABINS" IN COMEBACK

(By Herb Paul)

A method of constructing houses on the principle used in building log cabins was brought to Minneapolis today by its inventor, George Berger, of Erskine, Minn., in an effort to help solve the housing shortage.

Instead of logs, Berger's method is to build the walls of 4 by 4 inch lumber, tongued and grooved to fit by special machines he designed and manufactured.

The lumber on the outside is shaped to resemble siding, while the inside is either plain or grooved for a plaster coat. Berger claims his machine will turn out all wall material for a 5-room house in 3 hours.

By using his lumber, he said, a house can be built for half the cost of an ordinary home, because the plan does away with studdings and lath. Berger claimed three men working on a 24 by 28 foot house can put up the walls, gables and joists in 11 hours, adding that carpenters can put up the walls faster than they can put on siding.

Berger said some 200 houses have been built with his lumber while hundreds of barns, cabins, garages, chicken houses and silos have been constructed. A 10-room house built at Fosston, Minn., 10 years ago of his lumber, he said, has been heated for $51 a winter with a coal furnace. The only insulation was shavings in the attic floor.

Berger said he got the idea for his grooved lumber while building bird houses.

He planned to sell the bird houses knocked down, but was so impressed with the lumber for home building he decided to construct a dwelling with it.

His first Berger-lumber house was erected at Gonvick, Minn., and another at Fosston.

Since then, he said, two Berger-Patent Lumber Co. plants have been organized, one at Erskine and the other, which is serving the Twin Cities area, at Lindstrom. He is building 10 more machines, expected to be ready by June 1, for 10 other mills.

He explained all lumber is cut at the mill, ready to nail down when it reaches the home. Carpenters have a small machine on the job, he said, which enables them to groove the lumber for fitting window and door frames.

Berger said he does not expect any difficulty with union labor handling his lumber, pointing out that it is not a prefabrication method of construction, but one which, he said, will help speed up construction of moderately priced homes.

A House Undivided

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as our Nation faces its many problems of today that are in many instances direct results of the recent war effort, it behooves each of us to give careful attention to the counsel of those Americans who actually implemented the victory on the field of battle.

These heroes who have given much to our people and to the people of the world, are able to look upon our problems through eyes that are made more perceiving because of self-sacrifice and suffering. Theirs is the full credit for the victory and theirs should be the leadership in the new world.

I commend the attention of each Member of the House to the following address given by Maj. Paul Douglas, USMCR, before the Catholic Labor Alliance in Chicago on June 13, 1946. Major Douglas, husband of the distinguished gentlewoman from Illinois, Mrs. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS, displays what I consider to be a rare insight into the difficulties that confront our great Nation in these troubled times.

Major Douglas' address follows:

A HOUSE UNDIVIDED

(By Paul H. Douglas, Major, USMCR)

(A homecoming address delivered before the Catholic Labor Alliance, Orchestra Hall, Chicago, June 13, 1946)

During the great war we Americans discovered afresh the joys of brotherhood and of service. Under the shadow of great national danger, men and women by the tens of millions gave themselves unselfishly and in the giving found true happiness.

The cynics are fond of saying that men are solely swayed by self-interest. After the experience of the last 5 years, we all know now this is not true. Those of us who had the good fortune to serve in combat, if we had ever doubted before, cannot doubt again. For there before our eyes, and by our sides, our brothers struggled, suffered, and died that we and the Nation might live. May I mention just a handful of these examples which prove the reality of unselfishness in man far better than any logical demonstration?

On September 15, 1944, when the First Marine Division stormed the beaches at Pelelieu, my regiment, the Fifth Marines, pushed its way through the blazing hell of pillboxes and jungle and came up to the border of the airfield which it was our immediate task to seize and hold. As we were trying to dig in, the Japanese launched a diagonal attack of tanks which were on our men before they knew what was coming. It would have been easy to have stepped aside and to let the tanks through and then content oneself with firing at them as they passed. But if the tanks once got through to the beach then untold damage would be done and the whole attack put in peril. Out in front of the tanks as they thundered up, stepped a young Marine, Pfc Albert Carter. With a BAR, he fired round after round trying to hit the driver behind one of the slits and stop the tank. There was no fear in his face, but instead a stern determination. The tank tore at him, but the boy did not give ground and the last his comrades saw of him he was still firing as the tank rolled over him and ground him forever into the sand and coral of Pelelieu.

GIVE THEIR LIFE FOR COMRADES

Not 10 minutes later from a pillbox which we thought had been cleared, out darted a Japanese who threw a hand grenade which landed squarely in the midst of a squad of riflemen. As it fell, Corp. L. K. Bausell dove at it from afar as one tries to recover a fumble in football and smothering it to his breast was blown to shreds, but in so doing saved the lives of all his comrades.

A quarter of an hour later almost the same scene was reenacted when another hand grenade was thrown into another squad, and this time a stubby second lieutenant, Carleton Rouh, already wounded in both legs and barely able to walk, straightened out like a ramrod and smothered the grenade with his body. He was apparently torn to pieces, but as he was carried to the rear there was a faint smile on his lips for he knew he had saved the comrades whom he loved.

I should like to tell you now of my young friend Capt. Julius Dusenberry, of Florence, S. C., who joined us a few weeks before Peleliu. He was extremely quiet and the boys who had been through Guadalcanal and Cape Gloucester wondered how he would do in combat. Early the next morning, September 16, his battalion, the First, together with the Second, was given the job of pushing east over the open airfield which was more than a mile in length. His company, A, was assigned the extreme northern end which was lined with Japanese pillboxes from which we knew would come a deadly flanking fire. The thermometer at 8 in the morning registered 100°. Out in front of his company stepped the quiet captain, and in a calm voice he said, "We are going over at a fast walk. None of us are going to stop, and I am going to be out in front." He led off, and at once all hell broke loose. The Japs fired everything they had, but the thin line moved on. Dusenberry was hit a number of times, two or three times he staggered, and once he fell, but he kept on. After what seemed an eternity, he got his company across the field down into the trenches at the far end, and occupying them, repulsed two heavy counterattacks. Then, bleeding from many wounds, the little captain was carried back to the beach on a stretcher, and we did not see him again for 5 months. Then, as we were about to take ship for Okinawa, Dusenberry reappeared. He had talked his way out of a hospital a thousand miles to the rear, and, although barely able to stand, insisted he was going to take his company into action again. He got his strength back on the long trip north, and when we went onto the line on May 1 of last year in the death grapple for the Naha-Suri-Yonabaru line, there was the same old Dusenberry.

For 53 days his company attacked with very little rest. During that time by a surprise attack staged before daybreak in a soaking rain, Dusenberry took Suri Castle which was the turning point of the whole operation. When our general hurried down to thank him, he found the flag flying over the castle, presumably having been hoisted by Julius, but he did not find Dusenberry. Julius had discovered another soft-spot in the Japanese positions and by another quick surprise attack had taken it and was busily machine-gunning the Japanese. Finally, when all that remained of his original 235 men and 75 replacements were 16 riflemen and a headquarters squad, when they could see the waters off the southern end of Okinawa, and victory was at hand, Captain Dusenberry was shot through the spine. Few expected him to live, but 2 months later a chair was wheeled into my room at Bethesda Hospital and in it was the same quiet, modest Julius. Now I am happy to report that because of his unconquerable courage, Julius is back in South Carolina. In a few months he will be back in college and I hope that in a few years he will be a beneficent leader of his State and people.

VALOR BEYOND WORDS

These are merely a few illustrations drawn from one battalion of one regiment. There were many more like them even within that battalion. Every other battalion, every other regiment, and every one of the hundred or more combat divisions in the Army as well as the Marines, could probably duplicate these experiences.

Is it any wonder then if those who have been in combat know that deep in the heart of man lies courage, unselfishness, and a valor that is beyond words? Even the cynic and the professional debunker might pause and keep silent for a moment in contemplation of those acts.

But we should not think that such courage and unselfishness was confined merely to those who were fortunate enough to wear the uniform of their country. We knew that in factory, mine, and mill, men and women by the millions were straining body and nerves to turn out the guns and ammunition, the airplanes, the tanks, the ships, and the hundreds of thousands of articles our Nation needed to survive. We knew that out on the prairies, farmers were working 12 to 15 hours a day to grow the food we and our country required. And in our homes our wives and mothers bore their heavy burdens of caring for our families. We overseas knew that it was not only matériel which was pouring toward us in a torrent but it was also the love and devotion of the United States of America. Yes, and those of us who, upon being wounded, had poured into us the life-restoring blood plasma felt that in a very literal sense we were blood brothers of those at home.

As the sun rose on D-day for Okinawa, we saw line upon line of the 1,200 ships which stretched 75 miles north toward Japan and as we realized that there were 150,000 men in the seven assault divisions, all perfectly equipped, then all of us knew that the whole country was in fact taking part in the invasion. We were not a few divisions thrown carelessly out into the Pacific but were merely the cutting edge of a united Nation whose strength reached back into every shop, farm, and home in the country. Then as the boys scrambled down the cargo nets and into the boats, we were proud to have the honor of representing this Nation in what was to be a decisive trial of strength.

FELT BLESSED BY F. D. R. LEADERSHIP

May I also say that we had deserved trust in our leaders. The plans for our operations were beautifully and precisely drawn and splendidly executed. The over-all strategy was bold and vigorous. Although we never saw Admiral King, General Marshall, or General Eisenhower, we knew, with the abnormal, uncanny prescience, which men in the ranks develop, that they were on the beam. And above all, there was the grand strategist, the President of the United States, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, who had been first to detect the Nazi danger, who had armed us in the face of great political risks, whose military decisions were better even than those of the General Staff, and whose heart was with the men who were being called upon to fight. We knew he was on our side and that we had an almost superhuman champion in him. As our Nation at the time of the Civil War had been blessed by the leadership of Abraham Lincoln, so we felt blessed by the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Surely God has been good to this Nation in giving us in our hours of trial men like Washington, Lincoln, and Roosevelt.

It is small wonder then that we won. With such a determined unity and in such a righteous cause, we could not lose.

Now why was there such an outpouring of brave unselfishness, from both those who were in and those who were out of uniform? Part of it was undoubtedly due to the fact that men realized that their own lives and fortunes were either directly or indirectly in danger and that, as Benjamin Franklin observed at the time of the Revolution, if we did not all hang together, we would all hang separately. It is also true that society, in self-protection at such times, emphasizes loyalty to the Nation, bravery, and self-sacrifice, and honors those who show these qualities while it deservedly damns forever those who selfishly sacrifice the common good for their own safety or profit.

But I cannot believe these virtues were merely dictated by man-made prudence. On the field of battle, we knew they were right—that bravery, honor, and unselfishness were far more important than life itself. I found these unselfish boys to be, on the whole, supremely happy men. Amongst the many men I have seen die, I never heard one pass away with a curse. If the wounded had strength, there was instead a quiet smile or a deep look in the eyes. Whatever might happen to their bodies their souls had found peace in the knowledge that they had worked and died for a cause worthier than themselves. As I saw these men fight and die I was reminded of William Morris' words: "Fellowship is life and the lack of fellowship is death. Fellowship is heaven and the lack of fellowship is hell. And the deeds that ye do on earth, it is for fellowship's sake that ye do them."

PURPOSE IN WORLD ABOUT US

But the materialists have, I suppose, a further reply to this which we should consider. They argue that bravery, loyalty, and unselfishness are purely biological variations like the color of one's eyes, or the thickness of our bones, but that curiously enough these happen to be qualities which in the struggle for life have survival value and enable their possessors to live and to reproduce their kind. Even if this were true, it would still mean that the structure of the universe was such that the crafty killers like the sharks, the crocodiles, the tigers, the cruel tyrants, and the blood-drenched Nazis are ultimately eliminated and that it is the cooperative animals and the men and women of love who survive. As the Quaker poet, Whittier, put it: "For every gate that's barred to hate, shall open wide to love." It would mean that the very structure of the world about us is fundamentally good and that in the long run the meek will in fact inherit the earth. And we might ask, How does it come about that this is so, and that goodness ultimately does triumph? It cannot be accidental. There must be a purpose in the world about us, which makes it not dead but alive. And are these creative acts of sacrifice of our mothers and our fallen comrades merely instinctive and material reactions devoid of a moral origin? For myself, I cannot believe any such empty and fantastic explanation. I can only believe that there is a Spirit outside of us from whom we draw love and unselfishness as one draws water from deep and everflowing reservoirs. and if we but seek that Spirit in sincerity and humility of heart, we will find strength in the living waters of the soul.

NEED FAITH AND INSPIRATION

The war was therefore no isolated experience. We merely found that in times of trouble we as a people and as a nation could do miracles and that when our cause is noble the Lord is indeed with us. We need that faith and inspiration for the difficulties of today.

For, instead of the unity and fellowship which characterized this Nation a year ago, today we find the country torn by bitter industrial strife with one basic industry after another shut down, trade disorganized, political hatreds sharper than ever, men greedy for power and wealth, and ugly racial and religious hatreds seething beneath the surface. With our record of devotion behind us and with the prospect of plenty before us, we seem to be spending our energies in fighting each other. Abroad, the victorious alliance which won the war seems to be breaking up, largely, although not wholly, because of Russian aggression and suspicion, and the shadow of an even more terrible Armageddon looms over us. There is an uneasy feeling of anxiety everywhere and a terrible fear that the worst is yet to come.

This is lamentable; it is unlovely; it is foolish; but it should not surprise us. The old Adam of selfishness which is repressed during a war tends to burst out after it is over. Men say, "We have been unselfish long enough. Now I am going to get mine." And since greed, as well as heroism, is contagious, others soon say, "Everyone else is feathering their nest, why shouldn't I? If I don't, I will get left out." The retreat of conscience, once started, tends to become a rout.

FEELINGS NOT EASILY SUBDUED

Then too, war, while it inspires unselfishness within a nation, excites anger against one's opponents. These feelings once aroused cannot be easily subdued. They tend, instead, to be turned against those within our Nation whose interests seem to conflict with ours. Thus it was that after the Civil War greed in business, corruption in politics, and hatred between sections of the country poisoned the life of our Nation. And after the First World War we can remember the sodden corruption of the Harding administration and the days when Big Bill Thompson, Al Capone, and Samuel Insull dominated the political life of our own city.

But those who love our country, our fellow men, and our God need to be alert and energized. We need warm hearts and cool heads. For these, as well as the dark days of late 1776 and early 1942, are times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot are tempted to quit. But those who love their country must pray and strive as never before.

First, our country is itself still in sufficient danger so that we cannot indulge in domestic hatreds or disunity. If, for example, we so weaken our military forces that we are forced to withdraw our occupation troops from Germany and Japan, then these countries will either revert to their previous militarism and in a few years seek our destruction or they may be organized against us by some third power. Moreover, up to date, Russia has not shown much evidence of desiring to cooperate internationally. We have shown our good faith by returning over 9,000,000 men to civilian life in 10 short months, by building up the United Nations to which we are ready to give the atomic bomb, by feeding the hungry without seeking the credit, by offering to help police Germany for 25 years and hence secure Russia against attack, and by making many reasonable concessions. But, to put it mildly, we have not met with any adequate response from Russia itself. We shall continue to seek peace and international security; we shall try to control our tempers; but we shall, I hope, be firm in defense of the right. If the experience of the thirties with fascism taught us anything it was that it is a mistake to make great sacrifices of principle in order to appease aggression. For that does not appease but merely strengthens the aggressor and makes him contemptuous of the weak. We need to be friendly, to work for peace and understanding between nations, but to be resolute in our defense of the right. No decent American desires to dominate other countries nor rattle either our sabers or the atomic bomb. On the contrary, we want all other nations to prosper, to be free from hunger, and to be our friends. We want a world society of law through the United Nations which will put down aggression and hence give security to the weak and which will also work to help all people as we desire our National Government to help us.

ALL NATIONS MUST COOPERATE

If we can get over these first difficult years perhaps in time we can talk to those who are now shut up behind the iron curtain and convince them that we mean only their good and make them our conscious friends. But international peace must be a two-way street and we cannot win it alone. Other nations must cooperate as well.

In this situation it would seem to be folly for us to put our heads in the sand and to dismember our armed forces. For this might well encourage aggressive nations to become more aggressive and in so doing to endanger the peace of the world and our own safety.

Our country needs our loyalty and our devotion. It needs our love not only in war but in those periods of nominal peace out of which wars grow. At the moment it needs strength, both for its own sake and to help it bring peace to the world. It can get this strength only from us, its children. Let the words of our lips and the meditations of our hearts be governed by this spirit. And as in war, let us refrain from acts which might give us as individuals a brief advantage over others, but which, if generalized, would weaken our country, sully its principles, and bring ultimate disaster to it and to us. And I urge all members of groups whether labor, employers, political, religious, or social to realize that with power should also go responsibility and restraint. We need the unity which comes not from force but fellowship. The differences between us Americans are far less important than the interests we have in common. The things which should bind us together in love and friendship are stronger than the forces which separate and divide. We cannot be good members of a world society or of the United Nations unless we are first of all devoted citizens of the United States.

EVIL FORCES AT WORK

I shall speak frankly. There are evil forces at work which would pit Catholics and Protestants against each other and both against the Jews while bitter feeling is being stirred up between whites and Negroes. If we fall for this we are lost because we, as a Nation, will disintegrate. We of all faiths and races fought unitedly for our country in time of war; we wish to live as friends in times of peace. When the Third Battalion of the Seventh Marines was struggling desperately through 20 days of driving rain and heavy losses to take hill 660 on Cape Gloucester in January 1944, the spearhead was a company led by Capt. James Shanley, a devout son of the Catholic Church and my dear friend. His gunnery sergeant was a Protestant minister from Tennessee who, believing in the righteousness of our cause, had resigned from his church to join the Marines and who was known throughout the battalion as the best shot and most skillful fighting man in the ranks. When the company stormed up the hill under heavy fire, it was Jim and the parson who were out in front. They drove the Japanese from the crest, repulsed a counterattack, and then when all was over, the minister came to Shanley and said, "Captain, it was God who gave this hill to us. Let us give our thanks to Him and pray that we may be worthy of it." And then the two soaked and muddy marines, Catholic and Protestant, knelt side by side and prayed silently to their common God. Jim now sleeps in the American Cemetery at Peleliu and I do not know where the minister is, but I do know that these two comrades would both want the rest of us who belong to the two great branches of the Christian fellowship to cooperate in matters of our common secular life, as they did on the slopes of hill 660.

During the months that I have been in the hospital, I have read of a revival and possible intensification of anti-Semitism. Well, I have walked through many of our military cemeteries in the South Pacific and I have seen the Star of David over many graves. The men who lie there were our true and loyal comrades even unto death. We would be false to the loyalties of a soldier if we permitted hatred for the Jewish race as such to flourish in this country. And when I think of how so many Jews are self-sacrificing in the charitable, scientific, and business life of this city, any wholesale denunciation of them as a race seems obscene and senseless.

And what about the Negro? On the first night at Peleliu, when the Jap mortars were pounding our lines, it was a company of Negro stretcher bearers who rushed through the fire to evacuate the wounded. They did not draw the color line and they carried many a southern boy to safety who, perhaps for the first time, realized that those of darker skin were his brothers to whom he owed in part his safety and his life. I hope that greater rather than less cooperation between the white and colored races will grow out of the war.

JUDGE MEN BY WHAT THEY DO

The truth of the matter is that soldiers soon come to judge a man by what he is and does and not by his religion, his race, or the color of his skin. That is a lesson which our communities would do well to learn. Every man should be given an equal chance and then be held responsible for his individual acts without either discrimination or favoritism. But there should also be a powerful incentive for each one of us to so live and act that we will reflect honor and not discredit upon those subdivisions of the human family to which we belong.

The other source of discord which looms threateningly at the moment is industrial strife. Here we are with a productive capacity which could give a decent standard of living to all, provide abundant savings for future growth, support a high standard of the arts and sciences, feed the starving abroad, and help to bind up the wounds of the world. It is to the interest of all Americans that this volume of production should roll forth. It is against everybody's interest to tie it up. To paralyze the country by shutting off essential materials and services is a sure way to hurt the great mass of citizens, stir up internal hatreds, and so weaken ourselves externally that we can neither feed the starving nor command the respect of the other powers which are eyeing us closely. Whatever may be the legitimate differences between workers and employers concerning the relative distribution of the national product, certainly their mutual interest to increase the total is far greater, and it is the height of folly by prolonged struggles to destroy the substance of what is being struggled for. Prior to entering military service I was for 17 years a national arbitrator in the newspaper industry. On the basis of that experience I want to say that given strong unions governed by a sense of restraint and responsibility and fair-minded employers there are few differences which cannot be settled around the conference or, if necessary, the arbitration table. Before the process of national disintegration goes any further, I want to appeal, as a humble citizen, to the decent sober men on both sides to stop, look, and listen. Above every group interest is the national interest, and group loyalty, however worthy in its place, should never be allowed to wreck the interest of the community as a whole.

Similarly, I should like to say that we are well aware of how some groups of employers have combined together to restrict production and so boost prices as to make excessive profits. There are many instances of this and they almost invariably hurt the general public by cutting down the national income and hence limiting employment and by still further concentrating economic power.

My comrades in the hospital for example have noted the recent Federal trials in which numerous manufacturers of artificial limbs were found guilty of combining to charge excessive prices for artificial hands and legs and of retarding the development of better limbs. Other defendants in this trial offered no defense. Such acts were direct blows at the happiness and self-respect of one of the most defenseless groups in our society. There are many similar combinations which enrich the individual group at the expense of the community. The more of us who are employers on the one hand and members of trade unions on the other can exercise internal restraint and put our country first, the more differences can be settled peacefully and the less legislation will be needed. But if we do not do this or if we permit our representatives in both camps to push their fighting zeal too far, the community will not only suffer but, in order to prevent being torn apart, it will have to try to integrate society by more stringent measures. So interdependent has modern society become that we are our brother's keeper and we should be mature enough to recognize that fact.

MAKE DEMOCRATIC SYSTEM WORK

I know that the Marxists declare that it is impossible to bridge over these economic conflicts and that this group believes they are destined to increase in scope and intensity until they finally result in one gigantic revolution. This will only occur if we come to accept it as inevitable. It need not be if we resolutely determine to make our democratic system work. That system has its faults of course and they should be removed as rapidly as possible but let us never forget that it has given us the highest national standard of living in the world and an average real hourly wage which during the last half-century has virtually doubled every 20 years. We have more personal and political freedom than the citizens of any other country. Let us not throw out the baby with the bath.

And now a word about the spirit in which men and women should work to help improve American life. Our democracy is still incomplete. Of course there are sections of our population which need better schooling, better medical care and better housing. There are still submerged sections which need a higher wage scale. The general upward trend of productivity and of real income will, if permitted to operate, remove some of these abuses. But this is a slow process and unselfish spirits will naturally wish to hasten the pace. But let us all be careful that the struggle to better America is carried out in such a manner as to strengthen rather than weaken the country. In particular, true liberals should not permit totalitarian hitch-hikers to take over the car and climb into the driver's seat. For these gate-crashers are not so much interested in these reforms themselves as they are in using them to discredit America and the principles of liberty.

TOTALITARIANS SUPPRESS FREEDOM

Of course the totalitarians say they favor liberty—until they get control. Of course they want freedom of speech and discussion in the United States. It permits them to spread their propaganda. But in the countries they control, they have suppressed all such freedom. There is every reason to believe they would do the same thing here if they were ever to come to power—which they won't. There is in fact nothing more immoral than for political totalitarians to pretend that they are believers in more and more democracy and then, when they have hoodwinked enough dupes, proceed to suppress all the principles of democracy and govern by propaganda and terror rather than by consent. True believers in America should not be fooled by the sheep's clothing in which some of these wolves are attired. The disguise is transparent and should not be tolerated. That is one of the reasons why the Catholic Labor Alliance is doing such excellent work. It is laboring seriously to improve American life but it is resolute in its determination that the cause of freedom shall not be entrusted to its enemies. It sees, as do all true liberals, that by removing or lessening social injustices, we decrease the festering spots which may breed totalitarianism and that instead we make it more possible for true democracy to flourish.

For the purpose to be sought is the good life and this for all and not merely for a favored few. What is this good life? It is one which on the material side is rooted in adequate food, clothing, and shelter with relative economic security. It is life functioning in a free community where the facilities of recreation, education, and beauty are available for all who can profit thereby. It is a life of productive activity and progress, where men find joy in work and in creation. Above all, it is a life of friendship between persons and classes within our country and between peoples and nations internationally. It is a life lived reverently in the spirit of humility. Some will smile at this and say, "That is the kingdom of heaven you are describing, not the earth as it can be made from faulty human beings." But let us not forget that our Lord told us to pray (and therefore to labor) that His kingdom might indeed come on earth. And if we but know the goal toward which we are striving, then we are stronger and more integrated, in our efforts and we approach it more closely.

UNIONS NEEDED TO PROTECT WORKERS

One of the ways we can get this good life is by diffusing power. It was a great Englishman, Lord Acton, who observed, "All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." That is true of both economic and political power. In the economic field we need, therefore, a breaking up of monopolistic combinations so that smaller competitive concerns may have a greater chance to flourish. Stockholders should have greater control over corporations, and home ownership should be encouraged. Farm tenants should be helped to become self-reliant farm owners, and cooperative associations can help to market farm products and make purchases for them. Unions are needed to protect workers from the great power wielded by giant corporations, but in turn these unions should be democratically controlled by their members. On the political side, vigorous State and local governments should, by performing vital functions, give to citizens the feeling that they belong and can control their own destinies. By active participation in the work of political parties, the citizens can make them agencies for an honest decision upon public policies and prevent them from being controlled by a few. Above all, if the press and radio be kept free, and in turn feel a responsibility for accurate reporting of the news, and if honest public discussion is protected and encouraged, then, indeed, men will have sufficient power to feel secure and to take pride in their activities, but not so much power as to tyrannize over others. Through all these institutions, integrity, fair dealing, tolerance, and mutual helpfulness should be insisted on, and under the white glare of publicity can largely be obtained. Men will be entrusted with power only to help others; and if this power is abused, it will be removed from them.

DISABLED VETERANS RESOLUTE

I believe that virtually all men in their inner hearts want such a life for themselves and for their fellows. They are frequently cynical and often dominated by individual and group selfishness. But as the experience of war has taught us, these qualities are not all of man. If men can see the need, they can rise to great heights. I have spent the better portion of this last year in a naval hospital to which many of the more seriously wounded servicemen have been brought. There are many there who will never again see the light of day, many who have lost a leg or an arm or sometimes two limbs, there are a number who have had their faces and bodies burned almost beyond recognition, and there are others who with their legs encased in steel are struggling desperately to walk. Up until recently, as I have lived and talked with these men, they have seemed to be resolute and determined without regrets for the sacrifices they made. But in these last few weeks as popular pressure has mounted to break up our Army, and as industrial confusion has spread, I have seen the shadows come over their faces and have heard much bitter and penetrating talk. I can tell you what many of them are thinking and saying. It is this: "Perhaps we made a mistake and were played for suckers. The people out in civilian life said we must defend our country and promised that they would also be true to it. So we went out and got shot up. But it begins to look as if we were baited with words and that now people think their bodies are safe, they are up to the old trick of gutting the country, if they can make a dollar out of it. If that is the sort of country we have and the kind of people who live in it, then I was a fool to be taken in. I should have tried to wriggle out of the draft and have made money in the black market. The civilians told me of the solemn duty we owed our country but all they talk about now is what their rights and privileges are while they never seem to think of their duties and responsibilities. Patriotism is apparently something for the other fellow to practise."

As I hear that talk expressed in salty four-letter words, it is hard to keep back both anger and tears. And I find myself thinking of the route my division took across the Pacific, of the battles on Guadalcanal, Cape Gloucester, Peleliu, and then down on the 5-yard line at Okinawa. And I think of all the other combat divisions, and of the fliers, and the men on the ships at sea. I think of the men who would volunteer for dangerous missions, who would never hang back but who would push onward. I think of those who gave their lives to gain a little piece of coral, valueless in itself, but at the time tremendously important to the future of this country. I think of the men who rest under the little white crosses, many of them my friends, whose eager spirit still seems somehow alive. Were these men wrong?

WHO IS RIGHT?

Or is it we, the living, who are desecrating the memory of our dead? Is it our selfish bodies who have forgotten so soon that we should live our lives for others? Is it we who by self-indulgence and hatred are making their anguish and obliteration an almost obscene jest?

Who is right? Is it we or they? Those who took part in the conflict know that it is they who were right, for as Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, that thrice-wounded soldier of the Civil War, once declared: "Out of heroism comes faith in the worth of heroism." If they were right, then it is we of today who are wrong. And if we are wrong, then we should mend our ways. The first requirement is always a humble heart. But then should come the resolution to sin no more. If ever a society needed to be purified, it is ours of today. Let the high devotion of the war return. The lines of Wordsworth written in 1802 apply sharply to us in 1946: "We are selfish men, O raise us up, return to us again, and give us manners, virtue, freedom, power."

In Washington, between the White House and the river, is the Lincoln Memorial, where, in a Doric temple of marble, is Daniel French's seated Lincoln. There is sadness and fatigue in his face, as there was during the Civil War, but there is also devotion and the faith that justice and mercy will ultimately triumph. As one watches the throngs come up the steps, they become quieter and as they step inside the memorial their hats are immediately taken off. The men and women peer up into the face of our folk hero and our Illinois prairie son. On the sides of the memorial they read the graven beauty of the Gettysburg Address and the Second Inaugural, and as they leave they are better men and women and in their hearts as well as in that temple the memory of Abraham Lincoln is enshrined forever. Many a hard-boiled politician has lingered there and has been a bit less selfish afterward. Just as the lungs clear the blood of its impurities so does such a civic shrine act as a spiritual cleanser. That is what the spirit of our Saviour has been doing through the centuries. And in this period of our need we cannot afford to neglect that resource nor to neglect His temples.

The reform must come first from the hearts of men. If we but catch the spirit for which our comrades fought and died and for which our great heroes have lived, then this Nation will cease to be a house divided by selfishness and will become instead a house undivided and a family united in fellowship. Laws will still be needed to restrain the selfish minority but the foundations of our country will stand foursquare on justice, mercy, love, and active good will.

Strikes Cause Farm Machinery Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAY LeFEVRE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mark Sullivan.

Mr. Speaker, what Mr. Sullivan found to be the situation in Pennsylvania is also true in my section of New York State. We cannot blame all the farm machinery shortage on labor, however. It is true that production has been at a very low ebb because of strikes, coal, and steel shortages. But a great deal of the trouble is due to OPA regulations. Farm machinery dealers have contacted me with reference to the deliberate reduction in discounts allowed them by orders issued by the OPA. The honest dealer refuses to sell, but the unscrupulous dealer takes a nice, fat, under-the-table cash bonus and the farmer with the most money gets the new machinery. The poor farmer with the greatest need for new machinery goes without. We hope that the OPA will learn some day that they have acted most unrealistically and we all hope that the President will sign the bill which was approved Tuesday in the House of Representatives, which should make this Office of Price Administration help production and distribution instead of strangling it.

STRIKES HIT THE SMALL FARMER IN ACUTE SHORTAGE OF MACHINERY—MARK SULLIVAN TELLS HOW FAILURE OF HAY BALERS TO REACH MARKET THIS SEASON, TOGETHER WITH RAINS, PLAGUE THE LONG-TOILING GROWERS

(By Mark Sullivan)

AVONDALE, CHESTER COUNTY, PA., June 25.—To the farmers hereabouts came the labor problem. It was not a matter of farm labor. Of employed workers there are few. On the family-sized farms that mainly compose this community, most of the work is done by the farmers and members of their families. Such employed workers as there are have had long-continued and happy relations. It was the national labor problem that descended upon the community. It came at the height of the haying season.

Hay is cut, left long enough to dry in the sun, then baled in the field and taken to the barn. Baling in the field has become increasingly the practice. The ancient custom of taking a hay wagon to the field, pitching the loose hay upon it, going to the barn, then pitching the hay from the wagon to mow has for several years been passing away. Persons who have old photographs of loaded hay wagons, especially ones drawn by horses, should preserve them, for they are becoming a record of the past, almost as remote from modern farm life as Currier and Ives prints of men mowing hay by hand, with scythes.

PITCHFORK DISCARDED

Almost equally obsolete are pictures of farmers pitching hay with a fork. Long ago the labor of getting loose hay from field to mow was shortened, at the barn, by a cumbersome mechanical device which could lift the hay in big bunches from the wagon and carry it to the mow by a kind of cumbersome trolley. Lately that, too, has become obsolete. To avoid handling loose hay has become a necessity enforced by cost. Baling the hay in the field and handling it in this compact form consumes perhaps less than a third of the labor entailed by the old way.

Hay balers are heavy machines. During the war they, like other farm machinery, became difficult to get, because of the diversion of factories to war work. This scarcity the farmers endured as an incident of war. There arose a neighborhood cooperation. A farmer who had a usable machine would use it to do his neighbors work. This took careful timing and prearrangement, and long and concentrated hours, for the seasons of farm work are short. It was not unusual to hear the hum of balers or other machines coming across the moonlit fields as late as 10 o'clock at night.

But a year ago, when the war ended, farmers looked forward to replenishing their worn machinery. Probably most farmers, during the summer of 1945, as they got along with worn machinery, or in some cases without machines at all, hopefully anticipated that by the harvest of 1946 they could get new machines and with them some amelioration of work and anxiety. But as the present haying season approached farmers were told that new balers were scarce or not to be had. The reasons they were told included prolonged strikes in factories making farm machinery.

RAINS ARE ADDED BLOW

To this detriment was added, during June, untimely rains. A farmer mowed his hay, and had the day or two of sunshine necessary to dry it. At that point, if he had a baler of his own, he could have got his hay to the barn. But while waiting for neighborhood balers, generously willing but hard pressed, rain fell for 2 to 3 days. That meant waiting for more sunshine to dry out the hay. Even so, much of the food value of the hay was lost by the wetting and second drying. In some cases, after the second drying, came yet more rain. This practically destroyed the food value of the hay; it was not worth salvaging.

What this will mean in the form of less milk for city consumers next winter or higher cost of milk due to buying hay that is scarce and likely to be high priced, every farmer knows—to calculate accurately the transmuting of hay and other form of stock feed into milk is part of a modern farmer's education. He knows, too, the practical grassroots phase of the national economic problems arising out of the labor situation, and out of prices and the Office of Price Administration.

So far as the farmer sees labor difficulties as a cause of food scarcity, he is likely to be unsympathetic. Reading in the papers or hearing by radio disputes about an 8-hour day and a 5-day week, the farmer reflects upon the length of his own workday which, in seasons of reaping and planting, begins at milking time, half past five or so in the morning, and continues into moonlight hours in the field.

Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. ELSAESSER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. ELSAESSER. Mr. Speaker, on September 1, 1939, Poland was invaded. Her cities were bombed and an undeclared war was thrust upon her by an aggressor nation.

On that eventful day the first of the vast number of orphans and half orphans of Poland were created, and the entire world became aware of Poland's will to remain a free and independent nation. The defense was magnificent but hopeless. City after city fell to the larger and better equipped enemy but Poland's sons and daughters fought on. They left their motherland behind them to serve in France, Norway, and other European nations, and finally left the Continent to fight with England and America.

In the year 1944, Polish soldiers of freedom again returned to the Continent with the invading armies of the Allies and fought in Italy for the cause of freedom. On every battlefield they shed their blood that Poland might live again.

Today the battle flags are partly furled. The shooting is over. The casualties can be counted. The cause they fought for has triumphed.

Poland should be a grateful happy land. Her people should be thankful and contented. Her sacrifices have been so great, her spirit so exalted, that the coming of peace and victory should have brought a sense of satisfaction and a feeling of security. Yet none of these conditions exists there today. In fact, the exact opposite is apparent.

An eminent American, our former President Herbert Hoover, calls it the land that has suffered most and is in direst need. He actually viewed the misery, the disease, and the suffering of some of the people of Poland. They have neither food nor freedom. The population is existing on about 1,500 calories—mostly starches. Her cities are destroyed and her orphans beg for food. Her infant mortality is 20 percent per year and tuberculosis runs rampant.

We have contributed somewhat to a program for temporary relief. Some wheat and canned foods have found their way to Poland, but even that relief is hampered by outside interference in the national, political, and economic life of Poland.

Unlike any of the victorious nations, Poland's frontiers are being changed and Poles are required to migrate from their homes to other areas because Russia has annexed the territory in which they lived and it is no longer a part of Poland. Under these conditions of migration and uncertainty, no progress can possibly be made by these people. They plant no crop and they reap no harvest. They are herded into freight trains and deposited like merchandise on strange soil to live or die. They have no voice in their destiny. They choose not and their cries fall on ears that hear not. Is this the fruit of victory?

Russia picks the government and the spokesman for the government. Russia issues the edicts and the Poles either obey or go to Siberia, where they are liquidated. Is this the freedom they fought for? Russia selects the representatives on the United Nations Councils and the puppets vote the will of Stalin and Molotov. The voice may be a Polish voice, speaking the ancient Polish language, but the action and the vote is as Russian as the Kremlin. We, the people of the United States, have a share in this misery. It is our responsibility too. The decision of an American President, made alone and without the knowledge of the American people, helped to determine the fate of Poland. The Yalta agreement entered into by the late President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the name of America, helped to seal the Polish destiny, create the misery and suffering, and deny to the gallant and faithful ally the freedom her sons and daughters earned.

Today vast numbers of brave Polish soldiers are roaming Europe, offering their services in exchange for a sense of security. They dared not go back to the land of their ancestors for they face death at the hands of the Russians, who dominate Poland. Is this freedom? Should people be required to fight, bleed, and die in order to obtain Russian domination?

The entire American Nation, not a handful of Americans of Polish extraction, must become aware of these conditions, and our State Department and our Chief Executive must express the true voice of America against persecution, misery, and oppression. Out of the watery grave of the Atlantic Ocean, where the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" were once so proudly proclaimed, these freedoms must be rescued and proclaimed anew—sincerely and honestly.

Freedom from fear and want, freedom from persecution and slavery, must be sought for the people of Poland. Their contribution to victory must be recognized and real constructive steps taken to insure for them a sense of security and dignity that is commensurate with Poland's sacrifices. This should be done in concert with other nations if possible; otherwise it should be advocated and persistently urged by America alone.

Exports and Imports of Beef and Pork

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the official table from the United States Tariff Commission, which I will include below, indicates that except during World War periods and in 1943, our beef imports have exceeded our beef exports. This table also shows that although the United States is the largest pork-producing nation, with the largest corn-producing area, pork imports in 1935 and 1937 exceeded the exports—even though a domestic scarcity program was being carried out.

The exports of pork from 1931 to 1940 were only 156,000,000 pounds more than the imports. This 156,000,000 pounds is a rather small export quantity in comparison to the 573,000,000-pound average net exports from 1921 to 1930; the 946,000,000-pound net exports of 1910 to 1920; and the 516,000,000 net exports from 1901 to 1910.

The 619,000,000-pound average net export of beef from 1901 to 1910 dwindled down to an average net export of only 50,000,000 pounds from 1911 to 1920 because of the Underwood tariff reduction. The amount of net exports was changed to a net import of 117,000,000 pounds during the 10-year period 1921 to 1930, and up to a 229,000,000-pound net import from 1931 to 1940. Although the United States is the greatest livestock-producing area in the world, it has depended upon beef of other lands for its domestic use and consumption.

The following table also indicates a large increase in the exports of pork in 1942 and 1943, but these exports about equal the exports following World War I:

Beef and pork: Estimated United States production, consumption, and the difference between production and consumption, 1901–43

[1] Estimated production, in dressed carcass weight, from total United States slaughter, plus the estimated dressed weight of domestic exports of live cattle.

[2] Apparent consumption calculated from production plus imports minus exports.

[3] Difference between actual reported exports and imports (minus sign indicates excess of imports) of live cattle and calves and of beef and veal in all forms. All data converted to dressed-weight basis.

[4] Estimated production of pork (excluding lard) from total United States slaughter; imports and exports of live hogs have always been unimportant and no adjustments were made on that account.

[5] Actual consumption as estimated by the Department of Agriculture. Since pork stocks and changes in them are large, possible inaccuracies in reporting stocks may affect somewhat the validity of these totals in certain years.

[6] The difference between the Department's estimated production and reported consumption. Actual exports and imports of animals and meats in the various forms have not been computed; possible inaccuracies in estimates of production and reported consumption affect the accuracy of this column.

Mr. Speaker, here is one more example of inviting imports of livestock products, the production of which products are associated with a system of agriculture which will conserve the fertility of the soil, while the exportation of soil-depleting crops, like cotton, are enjoying export subsidies.

Baccalaureate Sermon by Dr. James A. Reeves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a baccalaureate sermon by Dr. James A. Reeves, president of Seton Hill College, at Seton Hill College, Greensburg, Pa.

The reflections as outlined in this address by Dr. Reeves are well worthy of any intelligent person's perusal. For this reason I am impelled to have it published in the RECORD, in the hope that everyone who receives the RECORD will read it. It is deserving of wide dissemination.

"The double-minded man is inconstant in all his ways." (St. James 1: 8.)

Dear graduates, soon you will leave this college. Your classmates and the members of the faculty regret that 4 years have come to a close. You are reluctant to leave your friends. You have gained much from one another, even so much as from the classroom. The nature of friendship makes it so. You have exchanged thoughts, you have discussed personal and impersonal affairs, you have agreed and disagreed and most important you have learned that however friends may differ perforce varied gifts, motives, and aims. these need not dissolve the bonds that hold them together. The meeting of personalities has refined sentiment and tempered ambition. From that mutual consideration flows; while gentle suggestion and saintly praise have left you mutual debtors. The parting is inevitable. You will miss one another. We will miss you. But duty beckons. You leave to go on to greater responsibilities, and likely to higher accomplishments.

In a peculiar way the voice of duty reveals all earthly things, however vast, as mutable, passing, even sorrowful. But when we view the earthly in the divine light of Eternal things we gain strength and we are heartened. No task is too great, no surrender too heart-breaking, no sacrifice unsupportable. We are safe in God. He abides forever.

You leave Seton Hill at a critical time This is the age of paradox. You came here when men fought to conserve freedom. You leave when they lay down their arms and return from the wars. They succeeded only in part. They stopped military aggression. They did not win world peace. Men died that people might be happy in their homes, till their fields, raise their families, go to school, work their mills, trade in their markets, worship God, and live in peace. But death, wounds, pain, sacrifice, and depleted natural resources have not realized those aims. Tyranny prevails in many parts.

Big governments dislocate peoples, deny them food, wreck their industries, take their tools, force men into labor battalions to make compensation in kind; close their markets, schools, churches, allow no intercommunication, no relief, because disarmed and defeated armies may be a threat. Victorious armies, it is said, must secure frontiers for military purposes; in reality for the control of peoples and trade. Sickness, distress, starvation, and death follow. These are the blessings of the last crusade. Nothing since the invasions of Sargon and Nebuchadnezzar match the cruelty inflicted upon contemporary Europe. The Assyrian tyrants gave the pattern of uprooting and exiling and of a scorched-earth policy. They enslaved the Israelites, burnt their cities, laid waste Jerusalem and the Temple, and transported the political leaders, the elders, the artisans, the well-to-do and located them by the river of Gazon in the cities of the Medes. (IV Kings xvii: 6.)

The Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" were drawn up when you were in high school. To all of us those documents were beacons. They have been blotted out by a suffocating night. Idealism built the armies. A cold pragmatism leaves civilians in despair. No comfort comes from the suggestion that the oscillation of a providential law decrees this age of paradox. God does not cast misery upon men. God gave men intelligence. Men will not use it. God gave men freedom. Men exchange it for tyranny. God dowered men with the capacity to love one another. They stifle it in their hearts. They are double-minded men, inconstant in all their ways. Avarice and pride have split the unity of the mind and soul, sundered judgment, and vitiated sentiment. Love is impossible. Hate prevails. This is a paradox. It belies the nature of man.

Man has dignity and worth because he is a creature of God and a member of the human family, not because he is a member of a party or a state. The vast range of man's individual endowments in mind, heart, and body create a bond of dependence that leads even in nature to a society of love. His soul sanctified by the Holy Ghost has bonds that leads to a supernatural love as a basis for a supernatural society. Hence, whether as part of creation, the order of nature, or as part of the order of the redeemed in Christ, his society, his relations with his fellow men, should be those of love. Hate is unnatural. Hate is sin. Any condition save love, respect, reverence implies an imbalance, a distortion, a regress in human brotherhood. Today an atheistic philosophy generates hate and Europe's plight results from it. This atheism would undo Christianity. The lines are clearly drawn—Christianity or atheism, love or hate, freedom or tyranny, peace or war, life or death.

This is your paradoxical world. You must face the world as it is even though you did not make it. The present disunity and disintegration in economic, social, religious, and educational standards has a history. It set in with the break-up of Christendom and with the emergence of the modern state which swept away all absolute standards of judgment and value, and substituted relative and changeable standards. Pride effected that.

The machine age hastened disintegration. Peoples had lost the standards adequate to gage problems and to solve them. Competition made man a market commodity, set brother against brother, and nation against nation. Avarice effected that.

With the machine, men in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries devised a technology. This technology affected the economic world, but now it has political consequences as well. Some say that you must choose between an expanding freedom and responsibility for the individual or an expanding authority of the state wherein the individual must surrender freedom in the interest of security. The machine, they say, has conquered man. Only the state can control the machine and to do so society needs an iron discipline. Thus the new evangel emerges with its moloch, the all-powerful state, which tries to reduce all problems to mechanics and to the rule of force. As a postulate this dialectic knows nothing of the spiritual man or of the individual man. Its ethics of expediency dulls truth values, its sociology of force liquidates freedom, while in its psychology matter outlaws mind and man's eternal destiny becomes a myth. Hence the choice—Christianity or atheism, freedom or slavery, the gospel of love or the gospel of hate. This choice confronts the world. Unfortunately some signs indicate that a choice apparently has been made—unconditional surrender, the sell-out of weaker powers, the Carthaginian peace, the whole new and undemocratic diplomacy releasing statements and giving no reason for them, the double-talk propaganda with resulting confusion which the information offices employ. These symptoms we must heed.

Is there any hope? Is there time to choose? Are there any options? I would say "Yes." Hope resides in several facts. First your histories and the traditions of your people warrant that you accept freedom as a principle. You believe in the individual as a sacred personality with inalienable rights. These you regard as essential conditions for man's growth, progress, and happiness, along with his claims to education and to marriage. You are convinced that the growth of freedom conditions the prosperity of all, and without freedom there is no prosperity. You know that changes will come. Life is change. But the prospect of a newer atomic technology and the developments that must follow do not frighten you. You see in them no threat to society, no Frankenstein monster, but blessings God gives through human intelligence for well-being not for destruction. You regard these as instruments adaptable to happier ends provided men rely upon Christian philosophy and the gospel of Christ Jesus and not upon some political or economic scheme. These elements, Christian philosophy and the gospel, should enter into correct judgments. The double-minded man does not grasp them. For him only probabilities ensue. His mind is split. He cannot think straight, and to this double-minded man we may trace the plight of our world. The gospel gave us freedom. It will keep us safe. It humanizes. If on the contrary the myth of force prevail, if expediency dissipate reason, all is lost—our civilization, its art, its morality, its literatures, its sense of pity, its sense of sin, its religion, and its aspiration.

Further, you have the power of the ballot, at least so long as America keeps free elections. Pope Pius XII recently referred to the ballot. He charged the women of Italy to exercise their right of francise and to take interest in politics. He reaffirmed the truth that the sexes are equal and he enjoined women to penetrate public life, because women view problems in the light of the family and the home. He urged all Catholic women to participate in political and social life. "Public life needs you," he declared. "The fate of the family, of human relations are at stake. They are in your hands."

Finally Seton Hill invited you to a scale of values and afforded you perspective. The college introduced you to an integral humanism—reason and faith, man and society, the earthly and the divine. This humanism in education, we believe, integrates man's thinking and feeling. It leads to clear judgment for it focuses the Creator and His creature, time and eternity, and helps man to grasp unity, truthfulness, goodness, and beauty. What more can a mortal ask? This philosophy Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton taught when she wrote: "Never let the comparison of time and eternity slip one instant from your mind." Graduates, remember that. It will keep you safe.

We may pray as we did in the communion of this day's mass when Christ urged: "Father, while I was with them I kept them whom Thou gavest me, but now I come to Thee; I pray not that Thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldst keep them from evil." God prosper you.

Music in International Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Mr. John G. Paine, general manager of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, on the subject Music in International Propaganda which he delivered on April 1, 1946, before members of the Music Educators' National Conference in Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Paine is uniquely qualified to speak on the subject of music in international propaganda because of his wide experience in the field and his extended visits during the past year to leading European and South American countries. At the time this speech was delivered he had just flown back from Paris, where he attended a meeting of the International Confederation of Societies of Authors and Composers. It was at this meeting in Paris that Mr. Paine was elected president of the second federation, which protects the nondramatic rights of members.

Today, as never before, the hope that lies deep in the hearts of men everywhere is based on the belief that a common understanding among the peoples of the world is not a dream but a real possibility.

No lasting peace can ever be attained without that common understanding. The problem that confronts us therefore, the vital problem that presses in on us from all sides, is how to attain it. The problem is international in scope; but its immediacy here is national, and it must be studied and solved by our national mechanisms. These mechanisms will need all of our help and all of our support. Unfortunately for this problem, these mechanisms have been accustomed and habited to problems of protocol, problems of economics, problems of trade and commerce, problems of ideologies and their conflicts. But here is a problem that involves in its very essence spiritual values, esthetic values, and cultural values in their broadest aspects.

To better comprehend these aspects of the problem, a quick glance at the situation as it confronts us here in the United States might be of great help. It is common knowledge that throughout the world we as a Nation are recognized as the most powerful, the most efficient, and the most productive Nation in the world. But these concepts do not beget respect for us or admiration for us in other lands; they beget envy and fear, and eventually distrust and hate. That is too bad, for in reality we are nice people. Our basic impulses are those of generosity and friendship, and we have a deep sense of enjoyment in helpfulness. We are ready at all times to give freely of our wealth to aid people anywhere in the world, to sympathize with their sufferings and distress, and to open our hearts equally with our pocketbooks.

STRESS OUR EMOTIONALISM

Our problem here, then, is to project these characteristics in our international propaganda, so that we may be known in our full character. Added to the recognition of our wealth, our productivity, our efficiency, must be the great fact that we are a Nation of more than 130,000,000 human beings living our daily lives as human beings everywhere live their lives; that we have as people, as individuals, our strengths and our weaknesses; that emotions play as great a part in governing our thoughts and acts as they do in other nations; that we are a sensitive people, affected by love and hate, by beauty and ugliness, by all the forces that sensitize the emotions, in the same manner and to the same degree as people elsewhere in the world.

If we are to succeed in our efforts toward friendship with the rest of the world, these are the facets of American life and of the American people that must be presented to the world, and which are today thus far presented in only a very desultory fashion and without plan or program.

If we differ from the rest of the world as individuals, it is not in our basic characteristics as individuals, but only in our table of values—in the things that we consider important to daily life. Thus the problem is reduced to its simplest elements. We must make the world acquainted with our values. Often these values will amuse the peoples of other countries, often they will astound them, and often they will delight. But once they understand our table of values, they understand us.

RUSSIAN EXAMPLE

How can this type of understanding best be achieved? Well, let us see how it was achieved in Russia. The unification of that heterogeneous group of people into one nation presented the same type of problems that are involved here. Over the years, Russia experimented in various ways. They first attempted to bring about this unification through a uniformity of education; and while they succeeded in reducing illiteracy, they failed by this means to weld the people into one nation. They then sought to accomplish the end through economic means; for example, by extending Sovietized agricultural areas over several racial groups, thus seeking unification through the establishment of common economic interest and common economic need. Through this mechanism they succeeded in improving the living conditions of many of their people; but they failed again to create from these racial groups a common national feeling. Various other means were tried and failed; and finally an effort was made to establish a common national culture. For the first time since the birth of the Soviet concept in Russia, the word Russian became part of the vocabulary of statesmanship. And art forms were designated as Russian—whether they were Georgian or Muscovite, or sprang from any of the 154 racial groups which make up Russia. This succeeded.

The principal art form that was used by the Russian propagandists for this purpose was music. It was through the common acceptance of music as Russian music that the people of Georgia were able to gain an understanding and appreciation of the peoples of other sections. The popular music told in simple form the traditions, the background, the values of the racial group from which it sprang. The serious music—the ballets, the chamber music, the symphonies—expressed the emotional surges of the racial groups from which it sprang. And almost as if by magic, common understanding sprang up throughout the length and breadth of that great land. The USSR has emerged as a strong, solidified nation, and is today properly rated as one of the leading nations of the world.

RECOGNITION THROUGH MUSIC

The evidence created by this experiment leads us to believe that music offers the most potent propaganda device that we have in America, to carry to the rest of the world an understanding of what we as a nation really are. When the rest of the world, through our popular music, begins to understand our values—and through our serious music begins to understand our emotionalism—they will begin to understand us. They will lose their fear of us; and think of us not as a nation interested solely in commercialism—a nation of manufacturers and shopkeepers—but as a nation of people as real as any people in the world.

Fortunately, our State Department is fully aware of the need for this type of propaganda. During the period of the war the projection of the United States and its people to other countries associated with us in the recent conflict was admirably carried on under the direction of Elmer Davis in the Office of War Information. This organization, having as it did the complete confidence of Congress and ample funds at its disposal, was able to experiment in a great variety of propaganda forms and programs. A wealth of data has been gathered from which we can, with reasonable accuracy, determine the effectiveness of various types of propaganda. In every place where the Office of War Information programmed the projection of American music, propaganda results of the most satisfactory nature were attained.

CULTURAL INTERCHANGE

The work of the Office of War Information has come to an end, but the propaganda programs it initiated, particularly in the field of cultural interchange, have not come to an end. The work has been absorbed by our State Department, and has become a part of the diplomatic machinery of the Nation. So today, we find as part of the established personnel of each of our embassies, a cultural attaché, whose duty it is to keep alive the impact of American art forms in the country to which he has been accredited.

No one must suppose that the problem is thus so easily solved. The State Department itself recognizes that the best it can ever hope to do in the matter of the interchange of cultures is to establish the channels through which the flow of our culture into other countries can be accomplished. The actual accomplishment of the task must be by private enterprise. All of the cultural forces within the Nation must be corralled and put to work.

In the field of music no greater force exists for helping this task to successful completion than the Music Educators' National Conference. This great body of educators, touching as it does the life streams of the country in every area, being sensitive to the forces that are alive in every area, should have a conception and an understanding of that American music which best conveys the feeling of what we are here in this country; and should therefore be, at all times, in a position to counsel with and guide whatever other groups may be actively engaged in the actual projection of our music abroad.

It is almost axiomatic that before we can successfully project into other lands our culture and the art forms through which it is expressed, it is necessary that we here in American have a knowledge and a belief in the fullness of our culture, and in the adequacy and artistry of our art. There still exists here a belief in the superiority of the classical forms of music to the modern, and a belief that American compositions are inferior to European. These beliefs are based more on traditional and conditioned thinking than on critical perception, and as is always the case when such a condition exists, these beliefs are too often wrong.

EDUCATORS' RESPONSIBILITY

The music educators should turn on their great power and begin at once the task of selling American music to Americans. It is an adequate music and it is artistic, but, over and above that, it is expressive. In the repertoire of American musical composition is found the disclosure of the entire American culture. The same forces that produce our automobiles produce our music. The same vast, enthralling beauty we find in our plains, our mountains, our rivers and bays, we find in our music. All that we are and all that makes us what we are has been told musically somewhere by our ever-growing group of American composers. Certainly children whose first contact with life is American life, whose first contact with history is American history, should have as their first contact with music, American music. Too often this is not the case. More really creative music has flowed from the minds of American composers in the last 10 years than has come from Europe in the last 50. This is only natural because here the forces that mold us as a nation are kinetic, not static. But we must make our own people understand and appreciate this. This is the first step in gaining world recognition for our musical works; and the accomplishment of this first step is largely the responsibility of this great organization.

This is a big task, but when we realize the sad fact that no nation in the whole world believes that America has any interest in spiritual or esthetic values, we realize that it is a task that must be undertaken. Their conviction is that we here have a mechanistic culture, and therefore have nothing to translate into art forms. Therefore to them we have nothing to offer the creative individual, and thus have few creators; and that over and above that fact, we have, as a people, neither the temperament nor the emotional capacity to enjoy or appreciate the art forms when they are created.

The realization of this fact presents the second face to the problem. The infiltration of our art forms, particularly our music, will carry to the world the realization that here in the United States we have a real, living, vital culture as well as citizens with creative ability, who have the sensitivity to feel the impact of that culture and the capacity to express it in art forms. It will carry, too, an understanding of us that can be had in no other manner, for real understanding is not the offspring of intellectual processes so much as it is the offspring of emotional stimulation. True, complete understanding is a blending of both intellectual and emotional forces, but primarily it is the latter that exercises the most important power.

It is not enough, however, to let the world know of our culture and our expressions of it. We must also let them know of our appreciation of art, of our enjoyment of it, and of our desire and need for it. For if we fail in this we have gained but little in dissipating a fixed and firm idea abroad that we lack the capacity to appreciate any values that are purely esthetic. So long as this impression remains, the full friendship of the whole world, which we so richly deserve and have done so much to earn, will be denied to us.

We must continue to bring to our shores the musical works of the other nations; we must continue to listen to them and enjoy them; and we must honor their creators and learn from them the cultures from which they are derived, the values they describe, and the emotionalism that inspires them. Thus the world will approach the ground of common understanding and mutual respect and friendship.

PROTECTION OF MUSIC CREATOR

We in the United States have a bigger task, a harder problem before us, in accomplishing these ends, than any of the other nations in the world. This is because it is true that commercial values have been allowed to take precedence over spiritual values. This is amply illustrated by our copyright law among other things. The public policy that is served by such laws is to encourage the creation of music, of books, of dramas, of educational material; and yet our legislators have always been more concerned in protecting the commercial user of artistic creations against the authors thereof, than they have been in giving to the author the full fruit of his ideas. Surely the New Hampshire Legislature was right when it said that no property was so peculiarly a man's own than the product of his own mind. Yet legislators have constantly sought to whittle away from the creator as much control of that property as possible.

A copyright law which gives to a composer the exclusive right to control the public performance for profit of his musical work but which states that the performance of a musical composition on a coin-operated machine is not a public performance for profit, is a law deliberately seeking to benefit commercial interests. How can we hope to convey complete conviction that we are a Nation of people whose esthetic and spiritual values are real, when our very laws intended to develop these esthetic and spiritual values speak contrariwise?

If peace is to come to the world and remain, it must be based on the establishment of common grounds of trust and faith and understanding. These can be achieved, but not through commercial treaties, or financial aid, or political activity; but through a common comprehension of each other's table of values, a comprehension best acquired through the emotions rather than through the intellect. Thus far, no medium has yet been found more potent in accomplishing this end than music. It is today recognized as one of the most vital elements in national and international propaganda; and its use will become greater, not less. Its power is inexhaustible.

Dedication of Olympic National Park

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 27 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on June 15, at beautiful Lake Crescent, in the Olympic National Park in Washington State, the Secretary of Interior, the Honorable J. A. Krug, dedicated what he properly called one of the great areas of America. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my own introduction of the Secretary, as well as his address of dedication.

There being no objection, the address and introduction were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTION OF SECRETARY KRUG BY SENATOR HUGH B. MITCHELL

There could be no better setting than Lake Crescent for the dedication of this last national wilderness to the recreational and inspirational needs of a country of 130,000,000 people.

Here beautiful Lake Crescent has long been a magnet drawing people who appreciated its majestic beauty. But these same people little knew how much the primeval wonders of the Olympic forests would mean to future generations. They knew less of the eventual meaning of that tossed up galaxy of mountain peaks so proudly presided over by Mount Olympus.

Today we pause briefly to pay tribute to the meaning of these natural wonders to a busy nation. Today, with this dedication, the mountains, the glaciers, the rain forests, the streams, the elk, the deer—everything this wilderness contains—take on a new and important meaning to a nation and a world weighted down with the problems of a complex civilization.

Today we are here because the American people have decided through their Congress that these wonders of nature which only Washington State and the Olympic Peninsula could produce should contribute to the stability not only of the Nation but of the world.

These are no idle words. No person can go among the giant trees of the Olympic Park and remain unchanged. No person can hike from Jackson ranger station to Olympic guard station and on to Mount Olympus without becoming a better citizen. The contemplation of Nature's wonders brings unconsciously an improved ability to cope with the man-made troubles of a world economy.

In the future, hundreds of thousands of visitors from throughout the world will come annually to the Olympic National Park. Whether they see Lake Crescent, tramp our forests, climb Mount Olympus, or contemplate the mountain beauties from Hurricane Ridge—or do all of these—the people will have extracted from nature much that is worth while.

The value added by this national park to the Nation's wealth will more than balance any immediate economic loss. In calculating the economic picture, we must recognize that the future of Washington State should no longer depend upon the number of giant trees logged. Where it continues to depend upon the forests, the economy should rest more upon what is done with the tree that is logged. It must depend upon sustained yield cutting, but more than that it must depend upon the fullest utilization of each and every tree taken from the forest or knocked down in the logging operation.

We hear much of the "locked up" timber of the Olympic National Park. It is true that logging of some of that "locked up" timber would help a few mills operate. But I want to say that the future of forest jobs depends upon better utilization of sustained-yield forests. Better utilization can be assured not by more and more cutting but by learning how to make more and more out of less and less timber.

This calls for the transference of interest from the logger to the laboratory. If the forest industry could be brought up-to-date, it could provide more and better jobs. In a modern economy there can be no excuse for wasting what it takes nature thousands of years to produce. The wastes of forest and mill should today be making sawdust wallboard and plastic building materials so badly needed in the homes veterans seek.

We here in the Pacific Northwest did not prepare ourselves for this building material emergency. We should never again be caught napping. We should immediately set to work forces which can teach us to manufacture out of what is now waste hundreds of materials we can today make in the laboratory but which we have not learned to produce economically in the factory.

In a dedication such as this today, we are doing more than setting aside an area of the public domain. The dedication is really a recognition that America has an economy which allows all of the people the leisure time to travel many miles just to enjoy the natural beauty of the Pacific Northwest. It is the job of the American economy to see that more and more people have the time and money to do just this.

So that we in the Pacific Northwest can take the lead in the improvement of the economy, I want to suggest now a cooperative effort by industry, government, and science to the end that an industrial empire with thousands of American-standard jobs be built on the foundation of what is now forest waste.

We in the Pacific Northwest are on the threshold of an era of achievement. We have the electric power and the natural resources. But to capitalize fully on these we must have a great research laboratory which can point the road to the future. Industry alone has been unable to keep up with the march of science. Government alone has balked at undertaking so great a responsibility. Science alone cannot do the job. So, therefore, I suggest that the job be done through the partnership of government, business, and science. Here in the inspirational setting of the Olympic National Park, I propose that government and industry immediately set aside at least $5,000,000 for a Pacific Northwest research center.

Chemistry is the foundation for the plastics so important to a forest economy, so I suggest chemical research as the first and most important step for this laboratory. But in a region rich in natural wealths no field should be closed. We must study all fields because today we are far behind other regions where industrial development has stemmed from research findings. We must catch up and go ahead.

In this aim we are fortunate in having a government which understands the necessity of steady economic advance.

Today we have as Secretary of the Interior, a man who by his word and by his action, proves that he understands the need for improved utilization of nature's wealths for the benefit of the whole people.

It is my distinct pleasure to present to you, Mr. J. A. Krug, the Secretary of the Interior.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY KRUG AT DEDICATION OF OLYMPIC NATIONAL PARK, WASH.

Two months ago it was my privilege to take part in the dedication of the home of Franklin D. Roosevelt at Hyde Park as a national historic site. Today, at the opposite side of the American continent, participating in the dedication of Olympic National Park, I feel again a deep pride and a special inspiration, for here we stand surrounded by magnificent evidence of the vision of our late President and of the courage with which he battled for the cause of conservation. This was one of his favorite areas. He sensed the glory and the grandeur of its wilderness beauty. Giving full support to my predecessor, Mr. Ickes, and to Governor Wallgren, then in Congress, who introduced and carried through the legislation, and with the enthusiastic backing of conservationists everywhere, particularly those of this region, it was he who confirmed the establishment of Olympic National Park on its present grand scale.

This is the twenty-sixth national park established by Congress. It is one of the great areas of America, and has already become one of the most important of the reservations that have been set aside for the enjoyment and inspiration of all our people for all time. It is the greatest asset of the Olympic Peninsula and will become increasingly so with the passing of the years. But it has far more than local significance. It belongs to the Nation; and therefore the Nation has the responsibility so to protect and administer it as to keep its beauty and its greatness unspoiled, and to assure its enjoyment by countless generations of our people.

Usually inventories are cold things, but an inventory of the things that give Olympic National Park its greatness is something to stir the spirit.

South of Lake Crescent, behind the mountains that stand guard over it, lies the heart of the Olympics which culminate in the grandeur of Mount Olympus itself, surrounded by its satellite peaks. Through the valleys and on the upper meadows ranges the largest surviving herd of the Roosevelt elk, one of the outstanding mammals of the North American Continent. With them, favored as to food supply and the climate, flourish other animals native to the region, living their own lives protected from interference by man.

On the lower slopes to the westward is that marvel of growth, the "rain forest," a prime example of the once vast virgin stands of Douglas fir and hemlock, cedar, and Sitka spruce. Product of good soil and the abundant moisture borne in from the Pacific, the assemblage of forest giants, rising from undergrowth that is almost tropical in its luxuriance, is a natural spectacle the like of which is contained in no other national park.

Can we preserve too much of this kind of beauty in America?

There are those, I know, who say that the Olympic National Park is too large—that it takes in too much merchantable timber, which, if released, would prolong the life of the logging companies and mills of the region. That issue, it seems to me, was decided by Congress in 1938, when, after prolonged debate, it authorized the preservation of a maximum of 898,292 acres. Congress, which also has decreed "the preservation from all injury or spoliation of all timber" in the park, alone possesses authority to modify its decision of 8 years ago.

I have been asked to make some of this forest available for commercial use, but, of course, I have no authority to take it, under the law. I am convinced that such forest as that which gives Olympic National Park such outstanding distinction must be preserved if future generations of Americans are to have the privilege of savoring fully and deeply its wilderness grandeur. This is one of the remaining great stands of virgin timber, and we should be very slow to deprive succeeding generations of the best example of primeval forests that once were so extensive.

It is, I realize, difficult today to determine what future generations, with whom we share the benefits of this achievement, will judge to be adequate or excessive. But certainly it would seem better to err slightly on the side of too much rather than too little. In the judgment of most conservationists there is not now more preserved here than the minimum to provide an adequate representation of this type of forest.

It has been suggested that the park be selectively logged for the utilization of its "ripe" timber; that the park forests would be improved by such cutting. Even if the basic park act would permit it, I cannot concede that for park purposes, this forest would thus be "improved." The national park concept—the maintenance of natural conditions—precludes those practices which are designed to produce the greatest returns of commercial products. We have also to consider the problem of how the cutover area would be left and whether or not its condition would be suitable for park purposes. And, too, once logging is introduced—no matter how selective—the delicate balance of nature is disrupted and the forest no longer exists in its superlative natural state.

I recognize, of course, the importance of the lumber industry in the Northwest, as well as in other parts of the United States. I know that by far the greater portion of our forests must be subjected to logging, in order to meet the pressing needs of the Nation. I know, too, that no fair decision on such matters can be made which refuses to give due consideration and proper weight to its local effects. However, I wish to declare, unequivocally, my conviction that, where questions affecting a national park are concerned, the interest of the Nation as a whole is paramount. We have no choice but to think of the rights of future generations. Had earlier generations not been thinking and planning for us, we might not today have had the unspoiled wonders of Yosemite and Yellowstone.

Having in mind the Nation's needs, it is only the really extraordinary examples of virgin forest, such as we have in this park, that we can justify setting aside for preservation and enjoyment of their scenic grandeur. There is included in all the National Park System only a little more than 1 percent of the forested lands of the United States, while the entire System contains only eighty-five one hundredths of 1 percent of our total land area. Surely this fraction of 1 percent is not too much of our native landscape to hold intact as the forces of nature created it. I doubt if it is nearly enough. Other countries, realizing the value of this concept of land use, are seeking advice from us as to how to establish national parks. Some of these countries are starting too late; much of their perishable natural beauty has been long destroyed. We in America have not started too late, as Olympic National Park attests. But the endeavor—much of which I must recognize as honest and sincere—to reduce the gains made by the great conservationists of the past, requires us today at least to match their vision and determination and courage by defending what they have won for us and for our children.

The preservation of scenery, or of sites of scientific or historic interest does not, of course, always require ownership or administration by the Federal Government. Quite the contrary. Important as the National Park System is, it derives this importance not from the number or size of the areas it contains, but more from the fact that it contains the supreme examples of each type that are of special concern to the entire Nation.

The Department of the Interior, of which the National Park Service is an important part, and I, as Secretary of the Interior, have a deep concern that in the management of the Department's affairs, which touch at so many points on the utilization of our natural resources, all resources shall be wisely used. That is the essence of conservation. I am profoundly certain that the lands and their resources that have been included in national parks and monuments are not "locked up."

Within the memory of men living in the great Northwest the forests once stretched across the top of the country from Maine to the Dakotas. An ocean of mustard grass, belly-high to a horse, stretched across the plains. Let us not forget that part of the great spirit and broad vision of these pioneers came from the gandeur of the continent itself. The very boldness of their spirit was a reflection of the size and greatness of the land they settled. It is little enough to ask that their children, and grandchildren, and generations yet unborn shall be able, through enjoying national parks such as these, to know something of the pristine glory of their country. Whatever the future may bring, our descendants will rejoice in this great symbol of the beauty and glory of America.

Give the Country Back to the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, almost a year has passed since hostilities ceased, but little progress has been made toward restoration of world security. Europe and Asia are being overrun by communism and fascism; Britain is being socialized; and now there are many radical groups in our own country seeking to destroy the fundamentals of our constitutional government. The United Nations is seeking to preserve cooperation between our Nation and other powers; but it is evident there is a lack of world cooperation, particularly because of the attitude of the Soviet Government.

There is much confusion in our own country, as well as fear that reconversion is being retarded because of indecision and red tape in the National Capital. Vast war powers delegated by Congress to the Chief Executive are still effective. The fiscal year closing June 30, 1946, should be considered as a peacetime era, with the exception of a few weeks prior to VJ-day; but there has been no material retrenchment in Federal spending. The deficit during this fiscal year will be approximately $22,000,000,000, and Federal civilian pay rolls are being maintained at levels only slightly below peak war figures.

There can be no effective readjustments until the people themselves more fully appeciate that our Republic cannot continue to follow trends which ultimately will lead to national bankruptcy and the destruction of representative government. Therefore, it is encouraging to know that some newspapers are seeking to arouse public opinion by pointing out that there must be less centralization of government and less encroachment upon local self-rule.

The Deseret News, published in Salt Lake City, Utah, has been unusually active in crusading for the preservation of our constitutional government. I insert the following editorial from that newspaper because of its timely warning:

THE TIMES THAT TRY MEN'S SOULS

If anybody thinks that government of the people, by the people, and for the people is not fast perishing from the earth right here in this land of Lincoln, then he had better discard his rose-colored glasses and get an appointment with a good eye doctor.

Our revolutionary fathers knew that they did not have an assurance of freedom and self-government so they arranged a Declaration of Independence, a Revolutionary War, and the greatest constitutional document of all history in order to make this a land of liberty. The sacrifice of Valley Forge was not too great a price to pay, and freedom was born.

Eighty-five years later their descendants knew that if their priceless heritage was to be preserved, the fiery baptism of a Civil War was not too much for Mr. Lincoln to ask of them. They saw the issue, paid the price, and this Nation, under God, had a new birth of freedom.

But today the torch of freedom is burning low because we who are now alive do not know that freedom is now at stake, and we are not willing to sacrifice the loaves and fishes we are receiving in return for our freedom.

We need again, as it were, a revolution against government tyranny, a civil war against the powers that are encroaching upon local self-government. But we cannot have either until the people as a whole will recognize the threat to freedom which now exists.

Every great step toward the establishment of freedom, in the entire history of the world, has been one away from centralization of governmental power and toward local self-government. Centralization of power breeds tyranny. Local self-government fosters freedom.

Now for the past score of years the United States has been traveling in reverse gear. Every important piece of legislation has been designed to take power away from the States and from the local governments and centralize it in Washington. The people and their local officials have turned their supplications to the Nation's Capitol as though the very throne of grace stood in its sacred portals, and at long last almost a whole new generation of voters has grown up, trained not in working out their own political salvation, but in devising ways and means to get special privileges out of bureaucratic autocrats.

Congress no longer legislates for the people according to the constitutional pattern. It would be impossible for it to do so and cover all the fields and handle all the matters now dumped on Federal shoulders. Instead it passes some general laws, and turns their administration over to appointed agencies to administer under rules of their own creation.

In spite of all the preaching we do about our three independent branches of government that check each other in the administration of the people's affairs, the day has fully come when Congress is putting all three powers of government into the hands of appointed personnel who function without any effective supervision. They make the rules, construe the rules, enforce the rules, and in very deed have all the powers a king or a dictator ever had.

The volume of federally concentrated powers is now so great that only by ridding the Federal Government of non-Federal duties can we ever bring its total government responsibility within human capacity. The only chance of having the Federal Government operate under laws passed by Congress is to strip it of all but Federal business, let the States handle the rest, and give the country back to the people.

Freedom demands this choice.

Removal of Bodies of Historic Figures From Military Graveyards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HADWEN C. FULLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, in keeping with a policy of many years, the War Department is about to remove from abandoned military posts in New York State the bodies of historic figures who have rested in military graveyards for at least 150 years and place these bodies in nearby national cemeteries.

In my opinion, the destruction of these historic shrines is an extremely short-sighted policy. The War Department justification is that with the abandoning of the posts in question there is no one on hand to take care of the graves and the bodies would be better off in a national cemetery where the best of care would be given.

However, these historic graveyards in these military posts are visited annually by thousands of people and are a center of attraction for many tourists. They are part of the historic background of these old posts and his is dear to the hearts of the American people.

Rather than have these shrines destroyed, I have proposed in a bill which I have introduced today, that these graveyards be preserved in their present status in every community where local agencies are willing to assume the responsibility of giving these graves perpetual care.

I feel that enactment of this bill will not only solve the problem of the War Department, which cannot afford to maintain a paid staff to care for these graves in abandoned posts, but will make it possible for the local communities involved to preserve these historic shrines for posterity and prevent their destruction.

In my own district there is an historic graveyard at Fort Ontario, Oswego, N. Y., which is threatened with destruction under present policy. I have protested vigorously to the Secretary of War, but feel that some legislation is needed for the protection of this and similar historic military cemeteries throughout the Nation.

Grandma Kilworth, 104 Years Young

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I wish to include an article from the Des Moines Tribune about my home-town neighbor and friend, Grandma Kilworth.

Grandma is now 104 years young and is a great inspiration to all who have the pleasure to know her because of her vigorous genuine pioneer Americanism of the type that has made our Nation the envy of the world.

Pray God that we may keep faith with those pioneer settlers.

AT 104, SHE DISLIKES THE PAMPERING

(By Herb Owens)

EXIRA, IOWA.—When the Audubon County boys were at Camp Dodge for training during World War I their first visitor from home was an energetic, cheerful little widow of 75.

The woman, known and loved by all the boys, was Grandma Kilworth.

All during the last year men in military uniform have been dropping in at a neat little white cottage here when they arrived home from war. These boys, too, know and love Grandma. Now she's 104.

PAMPER HER

"Folks are beginning to pamper and baby me—and I don't like it," said Grandma. "I've always been able to take care of myself—and I've handled thousands of babies.

"Now my grandchildren cut my grass, hoe my garden; a daughter gets my meals—except breakfast, which I fix for myself. I still get out and take care of my flowers there."

Grandma, who is Mrs. A. Mary Kilworth, is not the least bit boastful of her longevity. Her grandmother lived to past 103; her great-grandmother, past 104. She's a bit surprised that her own mother only lived past 85.

CARPENTER

Born December 18, 1841, near London, England, Mrs. Kilworth came to the United States about a year after her marriage—about 85 years ago—and lived near Geneseo, Ill. Her husband, a carpenter, built homes, churches, and schools in the vicinity a few years before they moved to Moline, Ill., where he worked in a wagon factory.

When Kilworth tired of factory work they moved to a farm near Troublesome Creek, about 5 miles south of the few buildings that were called Exira.

"My husband and I worked pretty hard on the farm—but we loved it. There wasn't a morning from spring to fall that we saw a bed after 4 a. m. When he died (in 1906) I came to town.

ONLY HOUSE

"This little house was the only one on the street then—and I planted every tree that's on the place. Maybe I've got too many now—but I've loved them.

"I've loved my flowers, too, and all the children that come here. Of course, I had to have some garden of my own and the kids thought I was silly. I insisted that I wanted something of my own—so I have a row of cabbage and a row of tomatoes."

Mrs. Kilworth, who still mowed her own lawn at 101, remains pretty healthy. Damp weather raises hob with her rheumatism, for which she takes a little medicine now and then.

SHOULDER

"The doctor keeps pestering me about not walking too far or doing too much. He says it will bother my joints. My left shoulder gives me the most trouble now. Of course, everyone tries to wait on me hand and foot."

Grandma lives alone, having built another home back of hers to house her daughter, Mrs. Ida Martin, and family. Another daughter, Mrs. O. C. Wheeler, lives in Exira. One son, John, past 70, still operates her home farm, although he long ago retired and rented his own farms to sons.

THE BABY

The other living son, Earl—the "baby," now 63—is a carpenter at Shellfish, Mont.

"I've got great, great grand-children—and I don't know how many—in Wyoming, Missouri, Colorado, and other places. I've never seen most of them."

Grandma loves children, but she doesn't think they're being reared to the same principles of thrift and economy that were hers.

"I don't think they pay enough attention to the things they should—the things that matter. In my day—and, of course, that was long ago—children worked hard and saved all they could. Now they seem to spend all they make."

BIBLE SCHOOL

"Of course, there weren't movies when I was a child. When we went out in the evening, we had to get permission from father—and there were strict orders about getting in, too. Recreation then was mostly a night of Bible school, one night a week," she said.

"There was no 'running around nights,' to be sure."

You may be sure, however, that Grandma has lost none of the charm which has endeared her to Exira folk for 40 years. She's energetic yet, too, and has to be warned constantly to check herself.

"Well, I can't stand just to sit and sit. I've got to be doing something. I always was one to keep on the go pretty much—and I certainly don't like being slowed down," she said.

Who Has the Savings?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the June 23, 1946 edition of the New York Times:

THE MERCHANT'S POINT OF VIEW

(By C. F. Hughes)

Among the reasons assigned for the stock-market break last week was that the country faces a buyers' strike due to rising prices. This echoed the fears expressed recently by some trade authorities and might also represent certain propaganda launched by OPA interests who believe that unamended controls offer the only defense against still sharper price advances.

There are undoubtedly some signs that the public at large is beginning to grow a trifle weary of fancy prices and inferior qualities, and attendance at the Louis-Conn fight in the week provided an example paralleling dwindling receipts for the night clubs and other places of amusement.

However, as B. Earl Puckett, president of Allied Stores Corporation, noted in the week, it is a bit ridiculous to talk of a buyers' strike as long as retail sales keep climbing as they have been doing right along this year. To lend point to his argument, department store sales for the week ended June 15 were 37 percent above these in the corresponding week of 1945, and for the year to this date were 27 percent ahead.

The increase in trade, therefore, has accumulated in recent weeks rather than diminished. What the results will be over ensuing weeks when the full effect of price advances now working through from primary markets begins to show up at retail counters, is the important question. Retailers nevertheless are almost unanimous in believing that they can count upon a thriving business for the rest of the year.

It was 18 months after World War I when Wanamakers touched off the inevitable price collapse of 1920 with their "20 percent off all price tags" in the store. Over the period from the armistice in November, 1918, consumer prices had jumped almost 30 percent and wholesale prices 23 percent. Ten months after the end of the first World War the consumer price rise was 10 percent, the wholesale increase about 4 percent.

While the consumer price rise since September, 1945, or 10 months after the end of World War II has been less than it was in 1919 in actual money, the comparison takes no account of quality and probably neglects some black market features of the present situation. Wholesale prices, however, have advanced 6 percent since September as against the 4 percent in 1919.

The fact is that the price advance is accelerating and shows few signs so far of leveling off except in a few lines where production has managed to exceed demand. It is the wage-price spiral which arouses most anxiety coupled with the kind of price regulation which upsets normal demand-supply relationships.

For the longer view aspects of consumer buying, however, the question mark placed after the pent-up demand potential has been fairly well answered at last by a survey carried out by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture at the request of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. The partial results of this survey were summarized last week and are printed in the June number of the Federal Reserve Bulletin.

This highly significant study shows that, excluding currency holdings (upon which it is impossible to obtain reports), the top 30 percent of spending units (which represent family pools) hold 87 percent of the one hundred and thirty billions in liquid assets which were owned at the end of 1945. The next 30 percent own 12 percent and the bottom 40 percent have only 1 percent.

Previous estimates of the distribution of war-time savings ranged all the way from the assertion of the CIO that the low-income groups had little or no extra savings to the claim of the Institute of Life Insurance that 45 percent of all war-time savings were held by those with incomes of less than $5,000 and nearly 10 percent by those who earned less than $2,000.

What the present study implies is that the pent-up demand represented by bank deposits and Government securities is largely in the hands of the top 10 percent, who own 60 percent. The other 90 percent own 40 percent and it is here that industry expects to draw upon savings for its millions of sales of appliances and what not. The plans built upon pent-up demands, therefore, may have to be reshaped in view of this report upon pent-up wherewithal to pay.

The study, based upon hour-long interviews after careful tests of the proper technique, also presents findings upon the spending intentions of consumers. The overwhelming majority reported, according to the Reserve Bulletin, that they had no expectation of using their liquid assets for any purposes in 1936.

"More than half of those with bank deposits had no intention of using any of them this year, except in emergency," the Bulletin says, "while only one-quarter definitely expected that they would utilize some part of their holdings. The remainder were undecided. In the case of savings bonds, the situation was even more striking. Over three-quarters were clear that they were not going to redeem any of their bonds, while only 8 percent definitely intended to use them for any purpose."

On the average, according to the findings, prospective buyers expected to pay $1,100 for a car, $320 for various consumer durable goods other than cars, and $5,020 for a house. It is clear from these averages that some ideas in industry will have to be revised. The results of this study rather than fear of any immediate "buyers' strike" may have been the real reason for the reappraising of values in the security markets.

Immediate Entry of Jewish Refugees Into Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I believe we all have read, and been profoundly shocked, by Mr. Ernest Bevin's insult, not only to the Jewish people, but to the President of the United States, the State Department, and the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

Speaking in the capacity of Foreign Minister of the British Government, it is only natural to assume that Mr. Bevin's statements reflect the official policy of the British Government and, hence, the people whom it represents. Mr. Bevin's announcement of his opposition to the recommendation of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry that 100,000 Jewish refugees be permitted immediate entry into Palestine, with the provocative comment that the reason Americans were insisting on the Palestine entry was that they did not want the Jews to come to New York, was a direct betrayal of the principles for which all democratic nations have been striving. Regardless of whether or not this was the purpose of his statement, Mr. Bevin very evidently was promoting racial prejudice and friction amongst the American, British, and Jewish peoples. Such a statement, especially at a time when racial equality and fairness should be emphasized, was unnecessary and unwarranted, and should not go unchallenged by Americans, as it is possible that we may next expect an attack on other racial and religious groups in this country.

I definitely feel that the British Government should, through Prime Minister Attlee, publicly repudiate Mr. Bevin's statement and that apology should be made for his intemperate remarks. As Mr. Bevin's policy obviously does not reflect the official policy of the British Government, the obligation to remedy the situation which has been created lies with Mr. Attlee. Even Mr. Churchill has seen fit to express himself most emphatically upon the matter and has called for complete and open debate in Parliament.

One of Philadelphia's leading papers has referred to Britain's Foreign Minister as "made to order for all the bigots, Kluxers, and prejudice-obsessed people in this country." Surely such an opinion of Britain's spokesman cannot induce any encouragement as to why we should give favorable consideration to extending a three and three-quarter-billion-dollar line of credit to that country. I cannot convince myself that I should vote in favor of such a measure when the American Government is so viciously attacked by the British Foreign Minister. I further wish to announce that I will vote against granting any loan to Great Britain until such time as this issue and other major differences of opinion have been remedied.

Feed for Poultry and Dairy Cattle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, last week I told the Members of the House of the concerted efforts of all of the members of the New England congressional delegation to secure desperately needed grain and feed for their dairy cattle and poultry. I showed you photographs of 200 chickens picked up dead of starvation on the Lupien farm in Chelmsford, Mass., in one morning and the dead ducks on the small duck farm started by a GI veteran in Springfield. Officials of the United States Government—largely of the OPA and of the Department of Agriculture—control the distribution of grain and feed in the United States. There are two forgotten areas—New England and the far Northwest.

I call to the attention of the dairy farmers, the poultry farmers, all the farmers, the working people, and the city folks of New England who look to these farmers for their milk, their cream, their eggs, and their poultry, the published letter sent directly from the White House by President Truman in reply to a telegram from the junior Senator from New Hampshire, calling attention to the present plight of our New England farmers and urgently requesting the President to aid in sending grain for the New England poultrymen. By its essentially negative answer to this plea, the President's letter shows little concern in the destruction of New England's dairy herds and poultry flocks and the inability of dealers to secure feed for distribution. The letter contains not one word of interest in their problems. He avoids the subject by attacking the Senator personally. To him the farmers of New England are, in fact, Macedonians and foreigners. He does not care what they think. They can take it or leave it. "I don't know whether that will please you or not, but I hope it will." The people of New England will long remember President Truman's letter.

Disability Compensation for Members of the Reserve Components of the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution passed by the Reserve Officers Association of the United States at their convention in Chicago, May 31 to June 3, 1946, as follows:

Whereas many officers of the Reserve Corps, National Guard, and Army of the United States have suffered disabilities incident to their active duty service; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by the act of April 3, 1939 (53 Stat. 557), as amended provided for retirement pay, and other benefits in such cases; and

Whereas the Army regulations and Technical Manual 12-245 published to implement that act and to provide equality of action between the cases of officers of the Regular Army and officers of the other components, are clear and fair; and

Whereas the provisions of the act and the regulations are being so flagrantly violated by the retiring boards and the office of the Surgeon General of the Army as to nullify and defeat the intent of the act of April 3, 1939, as amended; and

Whereas such action has denied to many officers, not members of the Regular Army, benefits which the Congress provided for them: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Reserve Officers Association of the United States condemns the aforesaid actions of the War Department and demands the immediate discontinuance of discriminatory and illegal denial of the rights of officers of the civilian components of the Army; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be requested to investigate all cases which have been decided by retiring boards, fix the responsibility for improper administration, and to provide remedial action in all such cases; be it further

Resolved, That whenever Reserve, National Guard, or Army of the United States officers on active duty become disabled, they shall not be placed on temporary limited duty in an inactive status without pay and required to report back at their own expense, but shall either be sent before an Army retiring board or placed on sick leave with pay and shall be given the same privileges as Regular Army officers; be it further

Resolved, That when such officers are required to appear before retiring boards for rehearings, when proceedings are disapproved, they shall be ordered to active duty so that they shall not have to appear at their own expense.

Threat to New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Herald, June 26, 1946:

THREAT TO NEW ENGLAND

If President Truman had taken the trouble to ask for the facts and figures about the food situation in New England, he would not have written his ill-tempered note to Senator TOBEY, of New Hampshire, scolding him because of his demand for an increased supply of grain, and advising him to cool off. The shortage of feed for New England herds and flocks is serious. If it is not remedied soon, it will become desperate and even disastrous. If officials in Washington who could immediately provide aid take their cue from the scoffing President's negative note to the Senator, New Englanders will wonder whether the six States should not become beneficiaries of UNRRA.

Does the President realize that agriculture is the third most important means of livelihood in New England? Has he been informed that its principal diversions are dairying and poultry? Can he not comprehend that New England is at the end of a long haul from the chief grain-producing centers that we are dependent on feed shipped to us, and that if he and the officials responsible to him continue their present carelessness, inefficiency, and indifference, this whole section will suffer grievously.

The facts are so simple and impressive that nobody who has an interest in the well-being of New England can fail to understand them. Massachusetts alone needs normally about 60 carloads of grain daily. We have not been getting them, and the President doesn't seem to care. The Department of Agriculture has announced that it has found about 800 carloads of grain for the whole Northeast—but the total portion for this State is 90 carloads. Moreover, some of these units are on paper only.

And consider some further facts. Our flocks of hens are 40 percent of what they were in January. Egg production in May was 17 percent down from the figures in April. The dairy output will drop sharply if the shortage of feed continues. Like eggs and poultry, milk will become scarce. Large flocks of hens have been sold already because the owners could not obtain the grain to keep them alive. These common substitutes for meat will be few if the present trend and the prevailing mood of President Truman continues.

Is there a general shortage of grain? Yes. Other sections, however, are faring far better than Massachusetts, Senator TOBEY's home State, and the rest of New England. The best-informed experts of Massachusetts insist that New England is the victim of discrimination, of improper and inequitable distribution of the supply which is actually available. This inefficiency will be aggravated, not remedied if the President merely tries to laugh off our troubles.

New Englanders do not ask to have relief of starving people abroad curtailed. New Englanders are not asking for special privileges. They do expect, however, that the President and the Department of Agriculture will study the facts and consider our plight more sympathetically than the President has chosen to in his ill-advised note to Senator TOBEY.

Release of Navy Dental Officers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication which appears in the Philadelphia Record of June 27, 1946:

RELEASE NAVAL DENTISTS FOR CIVILIAN PRACTICE

To the EDITOR:

We, the dental officers, USNR, at Guam, would like to call your attention to a matter of tremendous importance which is now affecting us and many other Reserve dentists.

We refer to Navy order ALNAV 281-46, which freezes, for 3 years, Navy dental officers of the Reserve who have had part or all of their professional education provided under V-12 or ASTP manner. This action affects only one group of men in one department of the Navy. Many other groups have received as much or more Government subsidy under the same or similar programs, yet they are allowed to return to their civilian pursuits.

The most serious problem of all is the serious effect this action will have on the professional abilities of the dentists. Practice in the Navy is restricted and most of the skills we have worked years to acquire will soon be forgotten unless we are released to continue our private practices. Everyone in the United States is personally aware of the acute shortage of dentists where it is not unusual to wait weeks or months for an appointment. The ratio of dentists in the Navy is much higher than the ratio of dentists in the United States.

The Guam Dental Clinic, which is one of the largest in the Pacific, may be cited as a criterion regarding the need for dentists. The clinic has requested 30 dentists for the peacetime base. At present we have 11 Reserve dentists and 6 Regular dentists (commander and above). It would be a gross exaggeration to say that each dentist works 2 hours a day. Yet, it is claimed there is an essential need for each man here. What type of thinking is this?

We believe that if this matter is investigated and revealed, this policy of holding Reserve dental officers after all other Reserves have been released will cease.

THE RESERVE DENTISTS,
Fleet Post Office, San Francisco.

Baccalaureate Address by Chancelor Samuel P. Capen, of the University of Buffalo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of the address delivered by Chancelor Samuel P. Capen, of the University of Buffalo, at the baccalaureate exercises June 2, 1946, in Edmund Hayes Hall:

A year ago Americans were the most envied of all peoples. America was everywhere looked upon as a land of abundance, of individual opportunity and of an assured future so brilliant that no other country could hope to surpass it. Not all the citizens of other nations would have exchanged their citizenship for ours, but many would have been glad to do so.

America was respected and admired throughout the world. It was respected for its extraordinary achievements in war, both on the fighting fronts and on the production front at home. It was respected for its unmatched national power used with no purpose of aggrandizement, but only as an instrument for defense and for the liberation of subjugated peoples. By those who knew—and they were many in many lands—it was admired for its national unity achieved without coercion; a wholly voluntary unity and a degree of cooperation and mutual sacrifice never before exhibited by any nation except under the imminent threat of invasion. It was admired for the generosity and friendliness not only of the Government acting officially for the Nation, but also of the millions of Americans in uniform scattered all over the world and of the millions more at home who gladly and freely contributed out of their own substance to aid the unfortunate of other lands.

A year ago Americans were proud, not with a blatant and offensive pride, but justly and quietly proud of the overwhelming success of our arms, of the ability and magnanimity of our leaders, both military and civilian, of the teamwork and boundless good will of the vast majority of the people.

A year ago Americans were confident; confident that national unity would endure; confident that better conditions of life for everyone were easily within their grasp, that they could turn the immense productivity of war into peaceful channels with increased abundance for all; confident that they could and determined that they would play a leading part in organizing the nations for the preservation of peace and in binding up the world's wounds; confident that the American political structure was essentially sound and sufficiently flexible for the Nation's changing needs; confident that free enterprise had proved both in peace and in war its superiority to other economic systems, that it was not only more productive than any other but that it was the essential foundation of America's high standard of living, and that it need not fear the rivalry of any form of totalitarian or state managed economy.

A year ago the atomic bomb had not made its appearance. The war in the East was still on, but the end was in sight. The Charter of the United Nations was being formulated on American soil. The eyes of the greater part of mankind were turning hopefully toward the dawning of a new era of peace and prosperity.

This was a year ago. If we now look abroad upon the world, what have we to say? If we review the events of the last 12 months, how do we feel about them? If we ask ourselves how far have we Americans met what was expected of us or fulfilled our own expectations, what will be the answer?

Are we now envied? Probably to some extent, but the envy is tinged with distrust; here and there with hate. Are we respected or admired? Not much, I gather, from the reports that come to us through the public prints. Our unseemly haste to scrap our military power has hardly contributed to the respect in which we are held in those quarters of the world where military might is still the dominant factor in the relations between nations. We may think we have been generous in our efforts to relieve the distress of peoples bereft of the bare necessities of existence. But these peoples do not think so. They see chiefly the delays, the maladministration, the enormous gap between what we led them to expect and what they have received. Is the uncertainty of our foreign policy an object of admiration?

And if we turn our eyes upon ourselves, if we look honestly and objectively at America as contained within its national boundaries, what is our verdict? We see the most successful Nation in history—judged by any standard that measures human success—the strongest, the richest, the freest, engaged in mass sabotage of its own power, wrecking its own productive capacity, undermining its own administrative machinery, abandoning its unity in favor of a reckless struggle between irresponsible and selfish chieftains of industry and labor for mean personal advantages; advantages which, if won, are largely illusory. We see racial and religious intolerance once more rearing its ugly head. We see ourselves hovering on the brink of preventable inflation. We see lawmakers who lack the courage to enact laws to protect the general interest. We see executives who stand helplessly by without even attempting to guard the public safety. We see the greatest democracy being murdered in its bed. And the assassins are not invading aliens, not even the small though troublesome body of native converts to alien political theories, but the members of its own house.

Are we proud? Yes, we are still proud, and justly so, of our war record, of the devotion and the sacrifices of our youth, of the good sense and the good will of the great majority of Americans, workers and employers, farmers and professional people, men and women in all walks of life. But if we feel any pride in the way we have managed our collective affairs in the first year of peace, then we must be hopelessly besetted with self-esteem.

Are we confident? I trust that most of us are. Above all I trust that you are, and those of your generation. I trust that you are still confident that with our help—yours and mine and that of millions of our fellow citizens—an international organization can be perfected which will prevent wars and further the spread of justice throughout the world. I trust that you are confident of our ability to master our domestic problems, to preserve the American system of political and economic freedom, to develop civic cooperation, to demonstrate as we have never yet demonstrated the limitless potentialities of American energy and brains and resources for the improvement of life on this planet.

But if we are confident, as we have sound reason to be, it should not be with a passive confidence. Peace must be fought for, and not grudgingly or half-heartedly. It must be paid for by every one of us; paid for in money, yours and mine; paid for by denying ourselves some things we much desire; paid for by individual and national self-control; paid for by thought and imagination persistently applied by all of us. We cannot dump the task in the laps of our political leaders and go on about our private business.

The horror of the alternative to peace is now vivid in everyone's mind. But, unless war should break out again in the near future, which does not seem likely, the memory will grow dim; and as it dims our resolution will be put to the real test. We dare not forget. We dare not forget either the past horror or the still more awful prospect which is inherent in the new means of destruction. We must create and maintain a climate of opinion which will support our chosen representatives in the long and arduous business of strengthening the machinery of the United Nations until it can cope effectively with any possible threat of war. The creation of this climate of opinion is not a job that can be delegated. It remains the collective responsibility of all the plain citizens of the United States.

Some people talk glibly of American world leadership. I often wonder whether they have any idea what the phrase means. There are only two ways to attain world leadership. The one is by conquest, or intimidation backed by the threat of conquest. The other is by moral superiority. The one is domination and its object is to exploit peoples and to exercise tyrannical power. The other is leadership in the interest of human rights "with malice toward none; with charity for all," and it is exercised only by persuasion and by the compelling force of example.

We have just lavished our blood and treasure to block the most nearly successful attempt in modern times to win world leadership by conquest. Surely it need not be said that the role of conqueror has no appeal for us, or ever will have. We nearly had world leadership of the second kind offered to us by common consent. But now the offer is held in abeyance, and properly so, until we prove whether we deserve it.

These, I think, are the most fateful days our Nation has faced in several generations. They are not, of course, the days of the greatest immediate danger. But the danger, if remote, lurks nonetheless in the offing. We are engaged in a race, and it is definitely a race against time. It is a race between democracy and totalitarianism, between popular self-government and the absolute control of the many by a few who have seized the power of the state, in short, between liberty and tyranny. It is unnecessary to identify the contestants in the race. They are well known. The race is being run before the eyes of the whole world. On its outcome a long future will depend not only for us but for men everywhere. And once more, as was said aforetime, America is "the last, best hope of earth."

What must we do to win? Nothing half so spectacular as we have done while you have been members of this university, although perhaps the task is harder because it is relatively humdrum. We must set our own house in order. We must show that free men can cooperate voluntarily not only to repel danger from without but also to improve their common lot; that they can and will curb irresponsible power by whomever exercised; that they can and will be tolerant of differences of opinion, respectful of the rights of others; that they can and will select courageous leaders who are committed to the advancement of no special interest but only to the general good.

Democracy is not a state of heavenly concord. It is by definition a state of conflict, or, if you prefer, of competition. Its affairs are conducted on the basis of partial agreements. That is what majority rule means. Opposing views and opposing interests are aired until one side prevails by force of numbers. But agreement on any issue of general policy is hardly ever complete or final. The opposing minority remains and continues to press for the acceptance of its opinion. A democracy is therefore always in a state of unstable equilibrium. It is always in danger of being wrecked unless it has a set of rules and unless the rules are enforced with the assent of most of the citizens.

Our own democracy is not only one of the oldest; it has also been in many ways one of the least unstable. The principal reason is that we have had a splendid set of rules. By and large the citizens have understood them and believed in them. Although groups of citizens are always trying to break them, in the main they have stood up and the violators have been brought to conform to them.

Sometimes, of course, the citizens are confused. They do not see how the rules apply to novel situations. Sometimes they are fooled by the specious arguments of the promoters of special interests. They permit infractions of the rules here and there without realizing that they are conniving in the overthrow of the house in which they live. But always thus far in our history they have finally come to understanding and have insisted that the principles which the rules express shall be observed.

We all know the rules. They are embodied in the Constitution of the United States, in the laws made in conformity therewith, in the major decisions of the courts, in the sayings of great public leaders which have struck an instant response in the hearts of the people, in the long tradition of American national life. We know them so well that, paradoxically, we tend to forget them. Now is surely the time to remind ourselves of a few of them which have a special bearing on the dilemma in which we find ourselves.

Here, then, as a reminder, is a part of the American code. The public interest is supreme. It outweighs the interest of any group. The public interest comprehends the interest of both the majority and the minority. The majority of the moment may not exploit or curtail the rights of the minority. A minority may not take any action which is hostile to the public interest.

Government, local, State, and National, is the 'nstrument—established by the people, sustained by the people, controlled by the people—to protect and promote the public interest. All voting citizens are equally responsible for the Government. The Government, in turn, is equally responsible to all citizens.

The Government operates through the sanction of laws. It may not operate in any other way. The laws are enacted by the legislative branch whose members are chosen by the people in free elections. No laws may be made conferring special favors, privileges or exemptions on any individual or any group large or small. No administrative officer may construe an existing law to grant special concessions to groups or individuals. If no law exists which empowers the Government to block the actions of a particular group of citizens which threaten the public interest, it is the instant responsibility of the legislative body to enact such a law. All laws apply equally to all citizens, and all citizens are equal before the law. No person may be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. No law may be enacted abridging freedom of worship, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, or freedom of assembly.

The Government may not require a citizen to be a member of any organization as a condition of employment. No Government official may join, or retain membership in or receive any emoluments from any organization having business with the Government or seeking legislation in its own interest. The Government may not engage in business in competition with the citizens. On the other hand, the Government is charged with the preservation of the conditions of free competition. It is charged with the prevention of any monopoly of goods or services by any individual or organization. Only the Government may levy taxes on the property of the citizens.

In the areas assigned to it by law the authority of the Government is absolute. The Government is the custodian of public order, the protector of the rights and safety of all the people. To resist the Government in the exercise of its legal authority is a criminal act. No organization of citizens may strike against the Government or against the public safety.

These are some of the rules—though, of course, not all of them—by which the United States has ordered its national life. They have not been arbitrarily imposed on Americans by a power outside their control. They have been made by the people's representatives, acting with the people's assent. They can be canceled or changed by the people's representatives, but in no other way. Until altered or repealed they are presumed to be binding.

It behooves all of us to think them over and to measure the recent tragic disturbances of our Nation by this yardstick. If we do so, we shall see that many of the rules have recently been more honored in the breach than in the observance. We shall have to admit that laws have been made and allowed to stand on the statute books which violate some of them. We shall have to concede that officials in high legislative and executive positions have ignored one or more of them or acted counter to them. It will be clear that powerful individuals and organizations have no intention of observing some of them and have been allowed by our servants, yours and mine, to break them with impunity. And it should be clear that every successful violation of any of them weakens the whole structure of American society.

I am persuaded that Americans in an overwhelming majority want to reestablish the rules in full force and effect. I am persuaded that in an overwhelming majority they want as representatives in State legislatures, in Congress, and in the courts persons who are neither spokesmen for nor subservient to any special interest either of capital, or labor, or agriculture, or any ism or creed; who have the intelligence to see and the courage to stand for the general interest; who have the integrity to disappoint some of their friends and to antagonize, if need be, some of their constituents for the sake of the welfare of America as a whole. I am persuaded that the overwhelming majority of Americans are sick of pussyfooting by either legislative or administrative officials; that they are disgusted with a supine attitude toward industrial terrorism; that they are ashamed to the bottom of their souls that this great country should be plunged into chaos, unable to meet its moral obligations to the world, unable to unleash its strength for the benefit of its own people.

I hope that every one of you belongs to this majority. If so, do you want a prescription for your own conduct? Do you need one? Do you ask yourselves, what can we do? The answers are plain and they apply to all of us. We can talk, and in this country of free speech no one should underestimate the value of talking. We can write, those of us who have had any practice in putting pen to paper. We can influence our neighbors, if we are sure of our own position. We can refuse to join any organization formed for whatever purpose which has a political program designed to secure privileges for its members which are not enjoyed by all citizens. We can stand up to the abuse of the selfish and the prejudiced and we may expect plenty of it. We can accept being called either radicals or reactionaries—depending on which set of partisans is moved to honor us with an epithet—fortified by the comforting conviction that we are neither. Above all, we can vote. And when we vote we should have but one criterion: Is the candidate likely to represent firmly and fairly the interests of all the people rather than a special interest within the body politic?

The University of Buffalo was founded 100 years ago in a time of fierce stress and partisan rancor. It has seen crisis after crisis in the national life. Now on its one hundredth birthday it sees another. Always the great principles on which the democratic organization of American society rests have triumphed over the attempts to undermine them. The triumph has never been complete and the threat has never been permanently averted; nor ever will be. Eternal vigilance still is and will remain the price of liberty.

The university now calls you to mount guard in this never ending process of defense. It has a right to call you because you are life members of this academic society which has always kept the American faith. Its final injunction is couched in the words of the most inspired prophet of that faith: That you "here highly resolve * * * that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

The Public Stake in Minimum-Wage Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NED R. HEALY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Speaker, since it is likely that H. R. 4130, the minimum-wage bill, will come up for consideration in the House of Representatives in the near future, it is advisable to have available for the Members as much information as possible. I am very much in favor of the passage of this bill to raise minimum wages from 40 cents 65 cents per hour. I therefore place in the RECORD a speech made by Mr. Leon Henderson before the National Consumers' League in Buffalo, N. Y., on May 22, 1946:

The National Congress is considering seriously, but not seriously enough, to guarantee passage, substantial amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. These amendments would increase the minimum wage, greatly enlarge the coverage of workers, and in various ways make the act more effective.

I have been asked to discuss today the public stake in this legislation. As Chief Economist of the NRA I had an excellent post for observing the impact of legally imposed wage minima. In 1937 and 1938, I had a minor role in the effort which led to adoption of the original law. As a member of the National Committee for a Fair Minimum Wage, I have watched the current attempt to strengthen the standards and make them truly fair labor standards, fit to meet a postwar world. My three participations have all stemmed from public interest.

Over this period of 12 years, I have had to satisfy myself on several major counts.

First and foremost, does the existence of many millions of underpaid workers constitute a serious challenge to national morality and the community conscience?

The answer is "Yes."

Next, is the matter of low substandard wages one which is properly and necessarily to be dealt with by the Federal Government?

The answer is "Yes."

Next, can the productivity of the American business system pay wage rates high enough to sustain a minimum standard of family life?

Again, the answer is "Yes."

Finally: Can America attain and maintain full employment, with a rising standard of living, if a substantial portion of its families falls below minimum-wage standards?

The answer is emphatically "No."

Let's restate the questions as propositions and examine them one by one.

THE VERY EXISTENCE IN AMERICA OF A HIGH PERCENTAGE OF UNDERPAID WORKERS IS A CHALLENGE TO THE COMMUNITY CONSCIENCE

Roughly 25,000,000 workers are acutely concerned with the action of Congress on fair labor standards.

I could conceive, especially with the cold logic of laissez-faire economics at the forefront, of sorrowful but resigned acceptance of a stratum of the working population whose wages could not sustain minimum family life. But such a conception violates the fundamental ethics of our democracy. It implies the necessity of second, third, and fourth class citizenships. It argues for limited slavery.

In the face of America's known capacity to produce and its capacity to consume, subminimum income makes a mockery of elementary distributive justice. No one has the right to enjoy the fruits of sweatshop labor in a land of plenty.

It is overwhelmingly clear that millions of workers are receiving less than enough to sustain a minimum family budget.

When the community accepts or tolerates a wage level that affords less than minimum family standards of life, it accepts and tolerates the slums and the crimes they breed, it accepts and tolerates the ignorance, the sickness, and the degradation of opportunity that go hand-in-hand with submarginal wages.

For the public interest, there are deep significances and delicate nuances involved in the basic decision as to whether a minimum wage for the single worker should tend to approach the amount necessary for a minimum family budget.

FLSA (Fair Labor Standards Act) Administrator Walling has pointed out that no one has challenged the need for the increased minima on the ground that it is too high to establish a modest standard for the single worker.

For all that, the Senate minority report, signed by six Senators, did argue that fixing a wage for a family of four was a step along the road to the end of our free, competitive economy. These Senators seemed to be saying, at a time when 75 to 85 percent of USES job openings for veterans in many States were below 65 cents an hour, that the State had no direct interest in the ratio of bachelors and old maids.

Incidentally, the minimum family-budget work done in connection with the new legislation has added substantially to public knowledge and understanding, particularly in light of the extraordinary change in the cost of living.

From a community dollar-and-cents point of view, low wages are not even a good bargain. A few may profit, but the community pays. It pays through its costs of community services—medical care, care for the indigent and the illiterate. It pays through a higher death rate. It pays through lower industrial productivity, lost markets, bad debts, and loan sharks. It pays through its tax burden. It pays, just as a nation we paid for low wages through rejection of draftees. Above all, the community pays by what substandard family income robs from its children.

The community needs to recognize that families with proper income can help substantially in handling many social problems in malnutrition, crime, illiteracy, and slums. I heard a character in a new play say recently, "I've never had a problem yet where money would make it worse." The community can say the same.

The public has a decided interest in coverage, too, and here again the test is the community conscience and not one of expediency or bargaining.

ONLY THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT CAN DEAL WITH THE PROBLEM

Granted the community responsibility for the continuance of insufficient wages, the question still remains whether it must be attacked through Federal legislation. Such legislation, even with fair administration, can tend to be rigid or sluggish, and liable to hamper somewhat the free processes of bringing the factors of production together. Free people should always heed the possibilities of regimentation and the dangers of the police state. The public has a real stake in the freedom of the individual, and the strength which flows from the exercise of that freedom.

Why not depend on the process of education or collective bargaining? Why not rely on the growing strength of unions? Or leave it to the States?

Here the record speaks in bell-clear tones.

Many of the low-wage workers are defenseless and have remained below decent standards in the best labor market of a generation. Fully 20 percent of the workers eligible in some industries under the present act have not attained the minimum necessary for minimum family living. Women, children, Negroes, the unskilled, and the isolated workers have stood in need of protection during the war period. In the reconversion period the percentage of low-wage offers for all job seekers is almost unbelievable. In some States today, 90 percent of the USES jobs are below 65 cents an hour.

The record of the States is still dismal. Even if the Federal act is extended there will be broad work to be done by the States for intrastate business employees.

And the plain fact is that the American labor movement is structurally unsuited to effect through the bargaining process even moderate minimum-wage coverage for low-paid workers.

The question at stake is that of minimum standards of life—a humanitarian question not to be bargained with. The general community has permitted a wrong to exist—it should turn to the national state, its logical agency, for prompt correction. Fortunately, the experience with the Fair Labor Standards Act to date is so satisfactory that it is difficult to imagine a competent substitute.

American business can pay the higher minimum-wage rates.

The public has a necessity to know whether the cost of a 65-cent minimum wage can be borne by the American industrial productivity. If there are areas of doubt then the community can decide whether any business institution has the right to exist if it depends on substandard living of its employees. This would be the same question which the National Consumers League has answered so brilliantly in its fight against the sweatshop.

Undoubtedly, a higher minimum-wage will put pressure on some marginal businesses. The question of effect on some small businesses and new entrants cannot be dismissed lightly. But there is also unfair competition to consider. Our national experience has shown that without standards there will be low-wage competition, either by scalpers or low-wage sectors of the country.

I remember well the doleful predictions when the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed. If I had not heard the same in NRA and seen them come to naught, I might have been jarred—even though my hatred of the sweatshop is dominant.

In 1938, it was predicted that there would be wholesale closing of plants, that employment would decline, that the minimum wage would become the maximum, that collective bargaining would fade away, that totalitarian controls would take its place.

We know now how untrue such forecasts were—that instead, business has prospered.

Many facts support the ability of American industry to pay the increase.

Profits are ample enough, and can scarcely be threatened at prevailing margins and volume. Wages are paid before taxes. Overall profits before taxes this year should approximate the $25,000,000,000 of 1944. In the manufacturing industries, only 4 out of 17 would have to increase the total pay roll to meet the increase. These are the notoriously underpaid industries—lumber, timber, textiles, and apparel—where profits, prices, and demand all combine to make this the time to install something approaching a living wage.

Impressive though the profit figures be, and encouraging as the prior experience with wage minima has been, the best reliance on financing increased wage cost lies in the productivity record. Over a long period of time, wage rates have increased, but due to rising productivity of the worker, unit labor costs have gone down. Given the present state of technology, there is every reason to expect worker productivity to continue to increase. Instead of the average of 3 to 3½ percent increase a year in productivity, the postwar years should witness 10 percent a year increase for a time, as it did after World War I.

Here is a matter of real public concern: Wages should follow productivity, but certainly a prime claim to the fruits of increased productivity can be staked out for those whose living costs are not covered by their present wages.

A HIGHER MINIMUM WAGE IS NEEDED TO SUSTAIN FULL EMPLOYMENT AND A RISING STANDARD OF LIFE

It took a war to break the psychological shackles which throttled the American capacity to produce.

Our physical production more than doubled during the war. Every group now sees that our peacetime goals can and must parallel this record.

We have learned the lesson of volume—what it does to demand, to profits, to unit costs, and the ability to pay good wages.

The biggest market for goods lies in the hungry, eager demands of low-income families. We have seen what enormous quantities of food, clothing, and services they will buy if they have purchasing power. We know—in cold records now, what warm instinct told us before—that there is a great unsatisfied hunger for food, clothing, and shelter.

Here is the great frontier of tomorrow's business, running into the tens of billions. A frontier as yet untapped; a frontier which does not demand new products or great risks of capital, since it is a hunger for the kind of ordinary things of life which the American business system knows how to produce at a profit.

Dr. Barkin said elsewhere, "A full employment program cannot be built on the past." That is—it cannot be based on wartime savings, nor on prospects of foreign trade, no matter how attractive and important. It depends on income we can insure at home.

It must be based on maintenance of a high level of consumer purchasing power—purchasing power that is well distributed. What better prospect than the spending power of 25,000,000 low income workers and their families—most of whom need to use all their income to maintain family life.

There will be times when the great pressure from pent-up demand will ease—and employment will tend to ease with it, unless there is a floor to wages.

I have spent weeks and weeks on the statistics of the case for maintaining purchasing power. It is a good, air-tight case.

But the case for a minimum family standard of life is a much better case.

Taken together, they promise attainment of social and economic goals. They cannot be left to chance, and that's where the great body of people seem to be leaving the passage of the current minimum wage legislation. It's your fight.

This is the public domain.

The Selective Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of June 26, 1946:

THE SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

Stimulated by one final concession from the War and Navy Departments, declaring that they would not ask for inductions during July and August, in order to give enlistment under the new pay bill a fair trial, the House yesterday passed the 9-month, 19-to-45-year-old Selective Service Act by a 2 to 1 majority. The Senate followed suit without debate. There has been no such strong opposition to an extension there as there has been in the House.

It will be a sad day for our armed forces if the increased inducements to enlistments do not bring in the needed men. Because, as finally passed, the Selective Service Act excludes the only age class—the 18-year-olds—with any considerable number of eligibles. Heavy drafts during the last months of the war had largely dried up the other pools. The 2 months' holiday will increase the pool of eligibles, including 19-year-olds, by an estimated 18,000 men, but that may be only a fraction of the number that will be needed if enlistments do not pick up again. They have been falling off by increasingly large percentages during the last 3 months.

The 2 months' holiday in inductions only made formal for a stated period what already had been the practice and the promise for the future. Since the end of the war the armed services have steadily decreased their requests for men to the number actually needed as replacements. Indeed, they have not asked for as many as they might have, because of the strong political pressure. Instead they have had to hold men who have been in service 18 months or longer. Under the terms of the new act such men now can be discharged on request. If all of them so request, a new crisis may result. At any rate, the real test will come in the fall, when the bulk of the 1-year enlistments begin to expire.

The sum of the matter is that the House—which would have passed a much weaker measure had it not been for Senate pressure—has chosen to gamble with the national security. Meantime, the loss of prestige which this country already has suffered abroad can hardly be retrieved now. Certainly the present act will do little to dispel the question in the minds of other peoples as to whether this country is going to remain strong enough to fulfill its international commitments and to help keep the peace until a stronger United Nations exists than we have now.

Veterans Want Permanent, Not Prefabricated, Houses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include a letter from a house-seeking veteran reporting his difficulties and portraying how the housing program which was to help the veteran is being manipulated to help the prefabricating experimenters, and to harm the established building industries and building trades, and, worst of all, the veteran himself. I hope the Housing Expediter and the CPA will pay more attention to the wishes and advice of these veterans than they have paid to Congressmen who have been urging the same thing for many months.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 21, 1946.
The Honorable WALTER H. JUDD,
House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a veteran of the last war and have been attempting to find a place in which to live for my wife and two children. This has gone on since my discharge in January of this year. After a great deal of house hunting and trudging, I finally decided that the most appropriate thing to do under the present circumstances was to find a lot and build a home to accommodate my family.

I finally secured a lot and obtained priorities for the building of a suitable home. The final priorities and GI loan were concluded better than a month ago. The lot has been excavated, but that is as far as I have been able to go, for the reason that no lumber whatsoever is available to my contractor to go ahead with the building of this home.

I have been terribly concerned about the matter, and therefore proceeded to make an investigation to determine why lumber was not available. I found that without exception every contractor with whom I talked blamed the shortage of lumber available for housing to the present program of allowing too much lumber to prefabricated housing and little or none to permanent housing.

Certainly this is a short-sighted policy in view of the fact that Minnesota is in a cold climate, and prefabricated houses at best are only temporary shelter. I have further been informed by many of the contractors with whom I spoke that permanent housing could be erected as cheaply in this area as prefabricated housing. Therefore, if all of the lumber were channeled into the permanent-housing projects, it would result in an actual saving to the veterans, for they would then be investing in something permanent rather than in something temporary.

On this basis, it seems to me, that our Congressmen should do everything within their power to urge the powers that be, to limit the flow of lumber, at least in the northern part of the country, to permanent housing rather than prefabricated housing, and give those of us who are attempting to find a permanent place to live for the rest of our lives, something with which to build.

I believe that a cartoon in this morning's Minneapolis Tribune is very appropriate in this regard. It shows the great number of priorities that have been granted and the contractor having nothing but toothpicks with which to build.

Your cooperation in this regard will be greatly appreciated, for the housing situation has indeed become critical as far as I am concerned. This is not a selfish attitude either, for I am sure that my case can be multiplied a thousand-fold.

Very sincerely yours,
SAMUEL L. SCHEINER.

South Dakota American Legion Convention Adopts Constructive Resolutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, last week the South Dakota Department of the American Legion held its annual convention in Mitchell, South Dakota's famed corn-palace city.

Under leave granted me by the House, I herewith call attention to the following resolutions officially adopted at this convention. I am sure Members will agree with me that they comprise a highly constructive and significant set of resolutions which should command the respect and cooperation of public-spirited citizens everywhere.

Whereas millions of American citizens are about to be released from the fighting forces of their country; and

Whereas many thousands of such forces have joined the American Legion, and many more thousands of discharged veterans are eligible for and may enjoy membership in said body; and

Whereas there has arisen in some parts of the United States a tendency to deny, by the use of force, to veterans who had not become affiliated with one or another of the numerous labor organizations the right to go unmolested to and from lawful employment; and

Whereas by the preamble to its constitution the American Legion is bound to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy, and to consecrate the comradeship of its members by devotion to mutual helpfulness: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the members of the American Legion in convention assembled, That the National Commander of the American Legion be urged by the department of South Dakota and by the members of said department to exert his power and influence to the end that no member of the American Legion or other war veteran be deprived of or denied the right to work by reason of the nonmembership of such person in a labor or any other organization: Be it further

Resolved, That the Congressman now representing the people of South Dakota at the National Congress be prevailed upon to seek the passage of a congressional enactment safeguarding and preserving for all who served their country in time of war the right to seek and to hold lawful employment without first holding membership in any labor or other organization: Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the National Commander of the American Legion, and to the national Congressmen serving South Dakota, and that additional copies hereof be made available to the press.

Whereas it has come to the attention of this Department that Circular VHP-1, dated March 26, 1946, part 4700—veterans' emergency housing program, does not relieve the housing emergency, and this department, by majority vote, rejects the House priority; namely, part 4700—veterans' emergency housing program, for the following reasons:

1. The greater percentage of returning veterans do not have sufficient cash to start construction of a new home;

2. Returning veterans would rather rent a home that is already constructed or being constructed;

3. Veterans who have returned are not certain as to their permanent location;

4. The returned veterans who plan on a permanent location find it difficult to secure a loan under the GI bill to purchase a home if they were available;

5. The restrictions are so drastic as to stop any kind of construction, even by persons who are willing to construct homes for sale or rent to veterans;

6. These restrictions also stop construction of businesses which would employ returning veterans, or give the veterans a chance for on-the-job training as set up in the GI bill of rights, thus relieving the unemployment situation;

7. These restrictions prohibit the sale of materials, even if available, unless all phases of this order can be met;

8. The ever-present red tape alone is discouraging for any veteran to even try to conform to the restrictions as set out in the above-cited circular;

9. There is no protection for the veteran who may sign up an agreement to rent a home which is being constructed, for the reason that the owner may, after a short period, sell the property out from under him.

10. This ruling opens up the channel for the exploitation of the veterans, for the reason that the unscrupulous contractors or money interests can use the right of the veteran for his own personal use: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the above-mentioned circular VHP-1, part 4700, veterans' emergency housing program, is discriminatory—instead of speeding the housing shortage it tends to retard it because of the red tape and confusion written all the way through the order. That communities or areas producing lumber, sand, cement are curtailed in the production and sale of such essential materials for the construction of homes or businesses according to the restrictions contained in the order; be it further

Resolved, That building restrictions, priority, and price ceilings be abolished, and in lieu of the same a preference right for the veteran to obtain housing when made available; be it further

Resolved, That Senators and Representatives from South Dakota be urged to take the necessary steps to have this order rescinded so as to allow anyone to purchase and to build any type of structure from the materials available or obtainable.

From the time of the discovery of this country the American Indian has been subject to abuse and unjust discrimination, the nature of which is common knowledge to all.

Whereas by his courage and loyalty to his country the American Indian has demonstrated in both world wars by actual combat that he is deserving of the admiration of his fellow countrymen; and

Whereas, according to official records, more Indians volunteered their services in their country's behalf on a proportionate basis, population considered, than any other group of our citizens; and

Whereas there remains in evidence in this State, as well as in other States, unjust discrimination tending to bar returning veterans of the last war from attending social functions and similar privileges accorded their white comrades with whom they served in the fox holes and beachheads of Europe and in the Southwest Pacific; to rectify this gross injustice: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Department of South Dakota, the American Legion, in convention assembled on this 18th day of June A. D. 1946, do petition our Government to grant the American Indian full and complete citizenship, including the right of voting, conducting his persona affairs in a manner now exercised by persons of other races; be it further

Resolved, That a copy thereof be sent to each of the four members of the South Dakota delegation in Congress, and that the national committeeman of the South Dakota Department of the American Legion be instructed to contact the national committeemen of the American Legion representing States having considerable Indian population to the end that proper and suitable legislation be enacted by Congress which will provide the rights and privileges sought herein.

INDIAN RIGHTS

Recommend that funds and loans ordinarily made available to veterans under the GI bill be made more surely available to Indian veterans through the Indian administration or any other governmental agency existing or created for that purpose. This followed discussion revealing that GI loans to Indians on reservations are tossed back and forth between loaning agencies and the Indian offices with neither willing to push them through.

Further recommend that Indian veterans be accorded full rights of citizenship and the social privileges accorded other veterans.

Whereas the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940 as amended provided that in case any person who, in order to perform military service, leaves a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer, and who on his discharge is still qualified to perform the duties of such position and who makes application for reemployment within 90 days, is absolutely entitled to his old position or a position of like seniority, unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so;

Whereas the rights of a veteran to his old position are quite plain, and

Whereas efforts are now being made to change the rules after the veteran has performed his service and qualify the rights of the veterans to their old position: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion, Department of South Dakota, That any legislation hereafter enacted by our Federal Congress preserve every right that the veterans have under said Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act.

This body goes on record and recommends to the Veterans' Administration that whenever a veteran at time of entering into any training or educational program under Public Laws 16 and 346 has no dependencies, but acquires dependency during his training or educational program, the veteran so concerned should be given 60 days to show evidence of dependency status, and the subsistence allowance increase by virtue of acquiring dependency status should be retroactive to date that dependency was acquired as evidenced by proof submitted.

The convention urges all possible speed in the construction of the proposed Veterans' Administration hospital at Sioux Falls and that a copy of this recommendation be sent our congressional delegation and to General Bradley.

Helping Needy, Ambitious Youth Pays Good Dividends

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, during my rather extended service in Congress nothing has given me more pleasure than assisting young men and women to help themselves. Having been reared on a farm and having come from a large family, I know what it means to struggle for an education. So it has given me much personal satisfaction to assist ambitious young folk secure the education they so much desired.

As I think of the legislation I have sponsored, the hundreds of millions of dollars I have been able to slash from appropriations, the assistance I have been permitted to give my constituents all seem to pale into insignificance compared with the many fine, clean-cut, appreciative young men and women assisted and who have made good their opportunities.

During the recent war I received letters from young men, whom I had personally assisted, from almost every battle front on which American forces participated. They were heart warming.

Every once in a while I receive such a letter from a young person whom I had forgotten having assisted. Occasionally a letter comes from one I was able to render some assistance in connection with the almost forgotten National Youth Administration that many were so critical of during the early days of the Roosevelt administration. Under the leave granted me I am submitting for the RECORD a letter from a very brilliant and charming young woman who has recently graduated from the Oklahoma College for Women. The letter follows:

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE AND MRS. JOHNSON: This is to let you know how much I appreciate the many things you did to help me reach the goal for which I was striving. I am one of the senior girls who visited Washington, D. C., in June 1940 with the group from dear old Fort Cobb High School.

I am indebted to you and to the NYA for giving me the chance to get the things of which I dreamed while I was pulling cotton that bright October day when my father, who has gone to his rest beyond, brought me the news of work in Anadarko, Okla.

My father would be very happy had he lived to see this day.

I wish personally to thank both you and your wife again for the nice things which you did to place me into the teaching field of vocational home economics or into other fields in which I may have a choice. I hope to see the day when our Government will again be helping the youth of America to do the things that they want to do as the NYA helped me. The NYA may not exist any more, but its works shall always be in the hearts and minds of those who have been helped.

Sincerely yours,

(Miss) RACHEL PRICE,

Labor Union Strategy Virtually Killed OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Star of June 27, 1946:

LABOR UNION STRATEGY VIRTUALLY KILLED OPA—FAILURE TO HOLD THE LINE SOUNDED DEATH KNELL TO PRICE CONTROL

(By David Lawrence)

These are days of strange paradoxes. Labor union leaders are crying out that the OPA must be "saved," when the truth is that labor union strategy in major industries has virtually killed the OPA and brought on an unparalleled wave of inflation.

The moment one economic group in the community insisted on forcing up costs and threatened to paralyze production and distribution unless its wage demands were met and the moment the President of the United States failed to hold the scales even and granted wage-cost increases, the death knell of effective price control in America was sounded.

The form in which OPA is now continued is secondary. The effect of the amendments made to pending legislation is to permit producers to add wage costs to their prices. So all the hullabaloo about "saving the OPA" is academic. Price control for all practical purposes has been killed by the President of the United States through his policy of wage inflation.

READ ONLY OF CONGRESS

The country reads only what Congress is doing at present. The defenders of the OPA program are criticizing Congress and stirring up propaganda from coast to coast to give the impression that chaos will result if the OPA bill is killed. There was a time quite recently when many observers, including this correspondent, believed that runaway inflation might follow the abolition of the OPA. But the events which the Nation has witnessed on the labor front, where wage costs were officially boosted by the White House and prices necessarily increased, make the OPA and price control of much less importance.

The OPA should, of course, be retained, but only as part of a national program of fighting inflation by freezing wage costs. But the President is too timid about restraining the labor front from forcing runaway prices, and he has thus contributed by his policy to the inflationary trend. Hence, OPA cannot prevent the price level from rising any more.

The black markets which are flourishing might have been broken up by a sensible program combining wage and price control.

The effort to increase production by means of subsidies has not been as effective as its sponsors predicted. Shortages are still prevalent and scarce goods find their way to black markets. Production in many lines is retarded or stopped altogether because of OPA rulings. Enormous losses have resulted.

The President will soon have to decide whether to veto or sign the OPA extension bill. He doesn't like the measure, but if he wants a semblance of price supervision and if he wishes the OPA to remain as a going concern in a small way, he might better sign the proposal. If he does veto it, the measure probably will be passed over his veto. If it isn't there is little chance for a resolution to pass continuing OPA as is. This has been the last resort hope of the administration manipulators of the OPA bill, but they will take a big risk if they persuade the President to veto the bill with that move in mind.

ECONOMIC GROUPS FIGHT

The problem is, to be sure, a contest between economic groups, and recent developments deserve to be studied as an example of what happens when a politically dominated democracy tries controlled economy. In the first place, the whole success of any program of restraint on prices or wages depends on a bit of self-denial by all economic groups, but it depends mostly on a leadership that has the trust and confidence of the groups themselves.

Whatever confidence the management groups had in the President was gradually dispelled by his relinquishment of virtually all controls over wages while he insisted on price controls. Then, instead of balancing the economy by holding wages down, the President capitulated to the cause of political expediency. If there had been in the White House a man who could have retained the confidence of all economic groups, there would not be any debate on OPA today. Public opinion would have supported a constructive program. But the President's own friends—the labor union leaders who demanded substantial wage increases above prewar levels—really destroyed the OPA.

Memo No. 4 for People With Short Memories, Especially Those Who Need To Be Reminded of the Curse of Sisyphus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, on Tuesday, and on Wednesday I addressed this House in an effort to call attention to the need which exists for taking action on President Truman's emergency strike legislation which has now passed both Houses of Congress but which is dying the slow, tortuous, unsung, death of being stifled by political pressure which for nearly a month has now kept it from being referred to the conference committee. If it dies, Mr. Speaker, whom do you suggest we nominate as its executioner?

Many whose memories are not too short will, I hope, recall the legend of Sisyphus who we are told was condemned for life to spend his time rolling a huge stone to the top of a hill only to have it roll back down again so the whole process had to be repeated over again forever and ever and ever. Sisyphus worked hard and tried mightily but he never got anywhere or accomplished anything worth while since he was forever condemned so as not to be able to finish his job.

Mr. Speaker, will some future historian write the legend of Harry Truman, President of the United States, and shall he be required to describe the President as an American President who—like Sisyphus—never completed a challenge. Must Harry Truman go down in history on this labor problem as the fellow who marched up the hill to demand of Congress that he be given additional power to curb strikes through emergency legislation only to be required to march down the hill again with nothing accomplished, and nothing achieved? Mr. Speaker, the signs on the horizon indicate ominously that such is to be his fate.

If Truman, like Sisyphus, is to be remembered for futile treks up the Hill and dismal retreats back down again, it should be made crystal clear to all who run or read, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the Republican Members of Congress who condemn him to such a sorry saga. We of the minority party have repeatedly urged you of the majority, who have the votes and the authority, to support your President.

Surely the President was not merely engaging in political histrionics; surely the President did not go to the country on the radio and come to Congress in person to sponsor legislation with his tongue in his cheek and a please-do-not-pass-it order in his hip pocket; surely the dramatic manner in which he demanded immediate action was not designed merely to delude the people and becloud the issue. However, Mr. Speaker, questioning eyebrows are being raised all across this land of ours as people wonder what strange causes are now compelling his long period of inaction on this important legislation.

Now is the time to finish the job the President assigned to Congress. Now is the time to send this legislation to Congress and to bring it back for final approval. Let us not encourage a new wave of strikes and a return of industrial paralysis by recessing for the summer without rescuing President Truman from the fate of Sisyphus.

Even people with the very shortest of memories must recall that less than a month ago we were all told this legislation was a first essential must. Now is the time, then, to put first things first and to insure against future strike damage by passing the legislation the President requested before we are again requested to lock the door after additional horses have been stolen. Should we fail to do so, the Democratic majority must assume full responsibility for such sickly failure.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, at the outset, may I point out that the assessed value of all property in the United States subject to taxes in 1940, according to the Bureau of the Census, was $143,281,928,000. Our Federal debt is now $270,000,000,000—almost twice the assessed value. The proportionate share of this debt for the State of Kansas figures to $2,602,056,000. This means that every man, woman, and child has a pro-rata share of $2,000—a family of five shoulders a Federal debt burden of $10,000.

The proposed loan to Britain must eventually come from a depleted United States Treasury which can be replenished only by the sale of bonds to raise the money we do not have. The same wage-earning family head faces a family share of $135 to make up the $3,750,000,000 which the United Kingdom seeks.

Common knowledge and logic indicates this transaction to be the forerunner of other applications totaling fifteen to twenty-five billions. These give rise to a possible additional burden of $750 per average family.

So that the residents of the Second Congressional District of Kansas can see what the impact of this so-called loan may be at home, the following figures, based upon the 1943 estimated census, are presented:

County	Share of Federal debt	Cost [1] of British loan
Allen	$32,000,000	$432,000
Anderson	20,000,000	270,000
Bourbon	34,000,000	459,000
Douglas	54,000,000	729,000
Franklin	38,000,000	513,000
Johnson	86,000,000	1,161,000
Linn	20,000,000	270,000
Miami	34,000,000	459,000
Wyandotte	290,000,000	3,915,000
Total	608,000,000	8,208,000

[1] The estimated cost to the entire State of Kansas is $50,248,784.

One question naturally arises: If the United States Treasury were to be made the fiscal agent for the disposal of bonds issued by Great Britain to cover this loan, such bonds containing the same terms as are proposed for the loan by this Government, would the residents of this Second Congressional District of Kansas invest their hard-earned cash in eight and a quarter million dollars' worth of such securities?

Mr. Speaker, it should also be pointed out that if, as proposed, the entire amount is to be spent in this country a new inflationary element is released, an impact of three and three-quarters billion dollars of new money with which Great Britain may bid against American citizens for commodities already extremely scarce.

It is pertinent to observe, too, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed loan, together with such others as are almost certain to follow, would be an addition to a contribution of $2,750,000,000 for our commitment under the Bretton Woods agreement and of $3,175,000,000 to the capital of the International Bank, arrangements which, if memory serves correctly, we were told on the floor of the House would make unnecessary any further direct postwar financial assistance to foreign governments.

Duffy's Tavern

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a letter received from J. M. Allen, vice president of the Bristol-Myers Co., of New York, together with three copies of letters addressed to Rev. J. S. Sexton, of the Pilot, Boston, Mass.; one to Edward F. Gardner, of Los Angeles, Calif., and one from Mr. Ed Gardner to his sponsor, J. M. Allen, vice president of the Bristol-Myers Co. These letters are the result of my remarks on the floor of the House on June 12, 1946, in which I included copy of a letter from one of my constituents, together with an editorial from the Pilot, a Catholic publication, in reference to parts of the radio script used by the principal, Ed Gardner, on his Friday night program, commonly known as Duffy's Tavern, which is sponsored by the Bristol-Myers Co., of New York. I feel that in fairness to all parties concerned that these letters should be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in reply to my statement. I sincerely hope that Mr. Gardner in the future or any other member of the cast will refrain from making any statements which may be defamatory or injurious to the Irish Catholic people.

The letters follow:

BRISTOL-MYERS CO.,
New York, N. Y., June 26, 1946.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In view of the fact that you placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on June 12, 1946, a copy of the letter from Patrick J. Scanlon to the Federal Communications Commission, and a copy of the Pilot editorial of June 8, 1946, entitled "The Second Offense," I think you will be interested in the attached correspondence.

This covers a letter to Father Sexton, editor of the Pilot, a letter to Ed Gardner, who produces Duffy's Tavern under the sponsorship of Bristol-Myers Co., and a copy of Ed Gardner's letter of apology received this morning.

I would be pleased to hear from you if there is anything further we can do to make amends for the material used in this program, which it is quite obvious was without any malicious intent whatever and can be put down to poor judgment on the part of the producer.

Very truly yours,
J. M. ALLEN, Vice President.

JUNE 18, 1946.

REV. J. S. SEXTON,
The Pilot, Boston, Mass.

DEAR REVEREND FATHER: Recently we received a number of clippings of an editorial, which appeared in the June 8 issue of The Pilot, entitled "The Second Offense," which took exception to material that was presented on the radio program, Duffy's Tavern, on May 31.

If you were offended by this material, we are sincerely sorry because being charged with the responsibility for securing goodwill for our products, the last thing we would want to do would be to offend any individual person or groups of people.

First of all, we want to apologize for Ed Gardner, who produces the show, and who, himself, is a member of the Catholic faith. We apologize, too, for our advertising agency and for ourselves, who should have foreseen the possibility of objection to the material being voiced.

What really concerns us very greatly, however, is the implication of deliberate intent to use insulting material in the program. Since it is our function to make friends instead of enemies, that must be completely out of the question.

We believe that actions speak louder than words, so we are enclosing a copy of a letter written to Ed Gardner, producer of Duffy's Tavern, to make it clear that we will stand for no more material in the broadcasts that relate, in any way, to religious functions of any church, and we shall require him to make an apology, which will be sent to you, and to any others that may write us on the subject.

We are sorry that it happened, and we are sure, when Duffy's Tavern returns to the air next September, you will find it a program of good, wholesome fun without any references which could possibly give offense.

Very truly yours,
BRISTOL-MYERS CO.,
J. M. ALLEN,
Vice President.

P. S.—If you wish, you may print this letter in the Pilot.

JUNE 18, 1946.

Mr. EDWARD F. GARDNER,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR ED: Duffy's Tavern has recently been the subject of considerable criticism as a result of your St. Patrick's Day program and the program of May 31.

St. Patrick is, of course, a revered patron saint to the Catholic Church, as indicated by the celebration of his day on March 17, and any reference to brawling or excessive drinking to celebrate is considered unbecoming disrespect.

On your May 31 program the opening telephone monolog with Duffy made reference to a wake, which was interpreted as ridiculing those of the Catholic faith and Irish ancestry by mocking the custom of waking the dead. It is claimed that this traditional observance of paying respect to the dead is held in high reverence by many millions of our fellow Americans.

It is clear, in view of the reactions, that you and we were guilty of poor judgment in permitting this material to be used, and since it is our purpose to offend no one with our Duffy's Tavern programs, I want you to instruct your writers that, in the future, no references whatever are to be made to any religious functions of any church.

I will appreciate your acknowledging this letter immediately with a letter of apology, which we can forward to those who have complained about these two programs.

Very truly yours,

J. M. ALLEN,
Vice President.

JUNE 24, 1946.

Mr. J. M. ALLEN,
Vice President, Bristol-Myers Co.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR JOE: I'm sorry to learn from your letter of June 18 that there was any offense taken as a result of our program of May 31. Also the one on St. Patrick's Day.

I assure you that it was completely unintentional and furtherest from our thoughts to give the impression that the material used in these programs was designed to do anything other than create fun in the Tavern.

As you know, Joe, I'm a Catholic myself (with a priest for a godfather, incidentally), and one of the proudest moments of my life occurred last summer while I was entertaining our troops in Italy. I was granted a private audience in the Vatican library by His Holiness, Pope Pius XII. Consequently I hope you'll see that any slur I might have cast on the faith was completely inadvertent.

I'm sorry this unfortunate incident has placed you in an embarrassing position, Joe, but you may rest assured that the writers of Duffy's Tavern will be instructed to avoid any reference to any religious functions of any church.

Please convey my sincere apologies to the Catholic Church and to the Pilot. It was all a bit of careless stupidity—which I guarantee you shall not be repeated.

Sincerely,

ED. GARDNER.

National Housing Agency

REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, recently a matter was brought to my attention that really worries me. It may be selfishness on my part but as a retail lumber dealer and one who has always believed in free enterprise, I wonder why before the House of Representatives has had an opportunity to study the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, and to learn the implications involved in setting up the wartime National Housing Agency as a permanent agency of the Government, the President, or more likely the public housing friends who surround him, have attempted to close this matter through this Reorganization Plan No. 1. If Congress does not disapprove this plan the National Housing Agency will be saddled on us permanently.

Reorganization Plan No. 1 makes permanent the National Housing Agency. As I recall, President Roosevelt set up this agency as a temporary agency to coordinate all building activities during the war, and that the Federal Housing Administration and the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration would be returned to their prewar status at the termination of hostilities. Reorganization Plan No. 1 actually sets up a new agency which has not been authorized by Congress and one which is sure to lead to greater expenditures and more Government control. Should Congress approve this plan and does set up this National Housing Agency, we will have taken a long long step toward socialization of the lumber and building industries.

I am happy that the committee bases its objection to part V of plan No. 1 which would set up as a permanent agency this National Housing Agency. This agency would destroy the private ownership of homes which has been the backbone of our democracy. For years we have encouraged private home ownership, believing that it made better citizens.

Legislation and Government controls cannot change our present high costs. Costs of building have to be in line with the general price level. This may be a bitter pill, but England and France tried to control building costs with the result of having constant housing shortages. We hope some day to rid ourselves of bureaucratic controls which are destroying our production power and with private enterprise once again, have adequate housing for all.

Russia and the Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the Beloit News, of Beloit, Wis., in this matter of the exercise of the veto power within the United Nations organization. It is apparent that the use of the veto by the Russian delegation is giving a good deal of trouble to the smooth functioning of that organization. Perhaps it was a mistake for the United Nations organization to include such a provision. At least there is serious doubt now among the leading authorities that the United Nations organization can ever function as it was intended, with the veto power in force. This timely editorial by Mason Dobson, editor of the Beloit News, is very enlightening:

USES OF ADVERSITY

Russia's United Nations veto of the compromise proposal for dealing with Franco Spain was the Soviet's first glaringly inexpert contribution to that subject. But it certainly was not the first diplomatic fumble by a major power in trying to deal with Europe's perennial Fascist regime.

Few governments (and none of the big ones) like Generalissimo Franco or his political philosophy. But they seem unable to agree on what to do about him. Spain, a poor, hard-scrabble country, hasn't been steady on her feet since her civil war. But she has great strategic importance.

Britain doesn't want to see communism replace Franco. Russia has enough friends in the deposed republic to be assured of at least a friendly Spanish government if the republic is restored. That's the core of the dilemma. The trimmings, including America's suggestions for ousting Franco, have been compounded of confused starts and stops and general awkwardness.

And through it all Generalissimo Franco, the pompous little dictator of a little country, has grown more pompous and assured. And it must have given him particular pleasure to see Russia, his bitterest foe, fix things so that a mighty coalition of disapproving nations couldn't make a move against him.

But perhaps it is well to see the veto in action, even though it left the problem of Franco Spain more unsettled than ever. The veto, which was Russia's baby, was included in the UN Charter over the objection of the smaller countries for two reasons:

1. The opposition knew that insistence on no veto could wreck the still unformed United Nations or drive Russia out of it.

2. The opposition was given assurance that the veto would be used only in extraordinary circumstances and as a last resort.

That, of course, hasn't happened. This veto, Russia's second, was employed simply because Mr. Gromyko and his government preferred to see nothing done rather than agree to a compromise which Russia didn't like. Britain's stand was as tinged with politics as Russia's. But Britain won the applause by yielding to majority opinion without recourse to the veto.

So now the world has had an excellent illustration of what the veto accomplishes, and the sort of extremity in which it may be used. Meanwhile, the whole idea's basic flaws are more apparent than ever.

Russia's contention, finally subscribed to by the other major powers, was that since the Big Five would provide most of the forces in case of punitive war against an aggressor, and since there could be no peace if they didn't agree, they might as well dominate openly the associated nations of the world.

The small nations' contribution to the UN armed forces might be proportionately equal to the Big Five's. Furthermore, the small nations, weak and tempting prizes, have always suffered heavily through war. Yet the veto power assumes that lack of size and strength means lack of wisdom, and thus the small nations, while they may be humored and tolerated, shall be denied an equal voice in their own fate.

In short, the veto power is unjust, undemocratic, and impracticable. But perhaps if it is used and abused enough in relatively minor matters, a way will be found to abolish it before it achieves its always-present possibility of plunging the world again into war.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a statement of the Honorable Hamilton Fish with reference to the British loan:

Every argument advanced for the British loan applies equally to loans for Soviet Russia, France, and other foreign nations. Even the sponsors of the British loan without collateral assert the chances of repayment are slim. We would be giving away our national heritage for a mess of pottage—throwing the Treasury doors wide open to the world. It amounts to pipe-lining or syphoning our wealth into Europe.

Judging from the past, the British loan will not be repaid. Certainly there is no assurance of repayment. What right has Congress to give away the people's money without their consent? Every poll taken shows 80 to 90 percent of the people against it. Why? Because of common sense, sound judgment, and patriotic motives. I anticipate that numerous Members of Congress will be defeated on election day and possibly in the primaries for voting for this fraudulent loan, which is nothing more than a camouflaged continuance of the lend-lease. I know in New York State that it will be a vital issue in the congressional campaign and that a number of veterans' organizations are already sharpening their political knives.

The giving of billions of our money to foreign nations without the consent of the American people is bound to be a paramount issue this fall.

Are the Members of Congress and the people back home to remain silent in peacetime as the administration shovels and pitchforks billions of our people's money into England, Russia, and other foreign nations?

President Truman said, "I think Great Britain is entitled to the type of government that Britain wants." Certainly, but that is not the issue. Shall we contribute to help end capitalism, nationalize industry, and destroy private enterprise? Are we to finance Laski's social revolution in England and to spread world communism by loans to Soviet Russia? I see no reason for the United States being forced to pay billions for the right to trade in any part of the British Empire. It would be bad in precedent and principle and would not pay off under any circumstance. We need not worry over our trade with India or Egypt as it is doubtful if they will remain long as a part of the British Empire.

How can we prevent or head off inflation, reduce taxes, or balance the Budget if we finance Europe by virtual outright grants? Let's stop the hypocrisy and fraud upon the people and call these loans by their right name—gifts or grants. Loaning money is a poor road to international friendship.

The British export-import trade has reached a level of $3,500,000,000, or considerably higher than anticipated when a loan was first sought. Britain is already grabbing up the trade and commerce in Argentine due to our fantastic interference with her domestic affairs. We are financing Great Britain our keenest competitor. By loaning or giving away our money we develop competitive industries in England—steel, cutlery, pottery, farm equipment, including most industrial production, to undersell and eliminate our American products from the world markets and probably to help encroach on our own and thereby eventually shut down our own mills and factories. Most economists believe that there will be a world-wide economic depression and financial panic in 5 years, after production has gone beyond consumption, both in America and Europe.

In that event there will be no interest payments in 5 years, and probably never. To that extent I submit the British loan is a fraud on the American people. We are all hot and bothered about paying the miners a welfare fund of seventy millions, or increasing the pay for our own wage earners, but we rush in to become an international Santa Claus and distribute billions of our people's money without their consent, to Britain and Soviet Russia, to promote socialism and communism, and to increase cutthroat competition for our own export trade in South America, Europe, and the Far East. We charge our own war veterans 4 percent on their small loans, but the administration is seemingly willing to lend billions without collateral at 2 percent to foreign nations, and even the 2 percent does not begin for 5 years. By that time the Labor Party may be out of power and the new Cabinet may repudiate the entire loan.

I do not blame the British for taking all the easy money that they can get out of us. The blame is on the administration and the Congress for jumping at the British bait of free trade and making suckers out of the American people without their knowledge or consent. We start by being "Uncle Sap" and end up by being "Uncle Shylock."

The New York Times of May 20 published a dispatch from its Rome correspondent revealing a secret agreement between Great Britain and Soviet Russia giving Russia a free economic hand in the Balkan nations in exchange for the Soviet's approval of a large measure of British control over Italian trade and commerce. This secret agreement is positive proof that Great Britain is looking after its own commercial interests and does not care a tinker's dam about opening up or extending any world markets to us, which is the heart of our loan agreement. As Mr. Eric Johnston stated it before the Senate committee: "Our system can only flourish and grow in an expanding world economy. * * * We want an expanding economy, and the British loan is part of that expanding economy."

I hope the House committee will not report this loan agreement until it has checked on the British-Soviet secret agreement on Italy and the Balkans.

Protection of Rights of the Public During Labor Disputes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, the protection of public health and safety is a primary function of government. During recent strikes, when the public health and safety were jeopardized, the Government attempted to deal with the situation and meet its responsibilities by seizing and operating various properties. In so doing, the Government proceeded under temporary war-emergency legislation—special grants of authority by Congress, containing specific expiration dates. Even the broad grant of authority for strike prevention and strike settlement recently sought by President Truman was with the expressed stipulation that it was to be temporary, not permanent.

At present we have no continuing law that provides adequate safeguards against the dangers to public health and safety that occur when essential public services are halted. The country's experience in recent months with strikes and threats of strikes in these essential services affords abundant evidence of the need for legislation that will declare and protect the rights of the public when labor disputes arise and work stoppages are threatened in public services or in production essential to public health and safety.

I am introducing in the House today a bill intended to fill what plainly is a serious deficiency in our existing statutes.

The short title of my bill is the Public Rights in Labor Disputes Act. I believe that its provisions are entirely fair, both to labor and to management. My bill frankly recognizes that the right by management to curtail or abrogate services or production essential to public health and safety is not absolute, and that the right of labor to curtail or abrogate these same services or the production of these same goods by the use of the power to strike is likewise not absolute. This bill would deny these rights when the public health and safety is endangered. It would at the same time provide machinery which, in my opinion, is as impartial as can be devised for the settlement of these disputes.

In brief, the bill create, as an independent Government agency, a Labor Disputes Conciliation Administration, forbids work stoppage arising from a labor dispute—and provides for the termination of such work stoppage if it has already occurred—if and when the President finds that public health and safety would be thereby endangered and proclaims the existence of a public emergency.

The bill provides for recourse to the courts by the Attorney General to compel compliance with Presidential orders forbidding or directing the termination of work stoppages. It provides a mechanism for compulsory arbitration when the parties have failed to reach a settlement of their disputes through voluntary negotiation and agreement or through arbitration of their own choosing.

The bill does not provide for Government seizure of any property or Government operation of any property and its aim is to avoid any such action.

The bill contains nothing that can be construed as requiring any individual to perform labor or services without the individual's consent; in fact, there is an explicit recital that no provision of any order of the President shall be so construed.

The declaration of policy contained in the preamble to the bill reads:

When labor disputes affecting interstate or foreign commerce result in or imminently threaten to result in the cessation or substantial curtailment of transportation, public utility, or communication services essential to public health or safety, or the cessation or substantial curtailment of supplies of articles or commodities essential to public health or safety, the public interest becomes paramount and the intervention of Government is necessary. It is the policy of this act to prevent labor disputes affecting interstate or foreign commerce from endangering public health or safety and at the same time to provide additional facilities for the settlement of labor disputes without resort to lock-outs, strikes, and other work stoppages.

The main provisions of the bill are as follows:

First. By definition, the compulsory arbitration which is provided for can be required only when a public emergency has been declared by the President. The President can declare such an emergency if he finds that public health and safety is endangered or likely to be endangered and that local government facilities to prevent a lock-out, strike, or other work stoppage are not available or are not being effectively utilized.

Second. Upon declaring a public emergency, the President shall issue an order directed to the parties to such dispute to cease and desist from carrying out work stoppages by the proper issuance or rescinding of the orders which have threatened or caused such work stoppages.

Third. The Attorney General of the United States is empowered to proceed in the district courts of the United States to enjoin any person failing or refusing to comply with the President's direction. This use of the injunction is subject to all the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act with respect to due process.

Fourth. When the President has issued an order, three methods are open to the parties involved for the settlement of the dispute:

(a) Through direct negotiation—that is, collective bargaining;

(b) Through the selection of such method of arbitration or through the selection of such arbitrators as the parties may mutually agree upon;

(c) If neither first nor second method is being availed of, the parties to the dispute shall be obliged to select arbitrators from a panel already established, and the decision of such arbitrators shall be final and binding for a period not to exceed 6 months.

Fifth. The panel of arbitrators is selected in the following manner:

(a) A Labor Disputes Conciliation Administration is set up with an Administrator as the head. This Conciliation Service shall take over the functions of the existing Conciliation Service in addition to the new functions prescribed by this bill.

(b) The Conciliation Administration shall have an Advisory Labor-Management Board, consisting of seven persons chosen from labor and seven from industry appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

(c) This Advisory Committee, in addition to certain continuing functions, shall have the duty of recommending to the President the names of persons whom the members agree upon as being fair and impartial persons to serve on the panel of arbitrators. The President in turn shall select from this list not less than 30 names to be sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Sixth. Where compulsory arbitration is required, each party to the dispute must select an arbitrator from the panel, or if either party refuses to do so, the President may appoint an arbitrator from the panel. The two arbitrators so selected shall select a third person who may or may not be a member of the panel. As stated above, all awards shall be final; they may be retroactive in character, and shall be enforceable under the terms of the United States Arbitration Act—that is, by suits in equity to compel performance.

It is my understanding that Congressmen AUCHINCLOSS of New Jersey, CASE of New Jersey, HALE of Maine, and HESELTON of Massachusetts, who are in full agreement with the provisions of the bill, are filing identical bills.

The full text of the bill follows:

A bill to declare and protect the rights of the public when labor disputes result in, or threaten to result in, danger to public health or safety

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the Public Rights in Labor Disputes Act.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. When labor disputes affecting interstate or foreign commerce result in or imminently threaten to result in the cessation or substantial curtailment of transportation, public utility, or communication services essential to public health or safety, or the cessation or substantial curtailment of supplies of articles or commodities essential to public health or safety, the public interest becomes paramount and the intervention of Government is necessary. It is the policy of this act to prevent labor disputes affecting interstate or foreign commerce from endangering public health or safety and at the same time to provide additional facilities for the settlement of labor disputes without resort to lock-outs, strikes, and other work stoppages.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this act—

(a) A "public emergency" shall be deemed to exist when (1) transportation, public utility, or communication services essential to the public health or safety, or (2) supplies of articles or commodities essential to the public health or safety have been suspended or substantially curtailed as a result of a labor dispute affecting interstate or foreign commerce (whether or not a labor dispute to which persons furnishing or employed in furnishing such services, articles, or commodities are parties).

(b) The term "interstate or foreign commerce" means commerce between a point in any State, or in the District of Columbia or any Territory, and any place outside thereof, or commerce within the District of Columbia or any Territory.

(c) The term "labor dispute" shall have the same meaning as when used in the act of March 23, 1932, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code, to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes."

LABOR DISPUTES CONCILIATION ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby created as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government a Labor Disputes Conciliation Administration (hereinafter called the Administration), at the head of which shall be an Administrator who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum. There shall also be in the Administration such number of Assistant Administrators (not exceeding three) as the President deems the work of the Administration may require, who shall be similarly appointed and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Assistant Administrators shall perform such duties as the Administrator may prescribe or as may be required by law.

(b) It shall be the function of the Administration to offer conciliation services in connection with labor disputes which the Administrator deems affect or may affect the interests of the public, for the purpose of assisting the parties to such disputes to adjust and settle their differences by negotiation and agreement rather than by lock-outs, strikes, or other work stoppages. It shall also be the function of the Administration, as hereinafter provided, to maintain a panel of arbitrators, from which arbitrators may be selected to arbitrate differences in labor disputes which the President finds have caused or threatened to cause a public emergency.

(c) The Administrator is authorized, within the limits of available funds, to appoint in the Administration such officers and employees, and to make such expenditures, as he may deem necessary to the efficient functioning of the Administration.

(d) Upon the thirtieth day after the Administrator first appointed under this Act qualifies and takes office, the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor and its functions are abolished, and its records and property shall be transferred to the Administration. Thereafter no conciliation functions in labor disputes may be performed by the Department of Labor or any officer or employee thereof, except to the extent required by laws prescribing minimum wages or maximum hours, or laws regulating the employment of children, which in each case are administered by such Department.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT ADVISORY COMMITTEE

SEC. 5. (a) The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint in the Administration a Labor-Management Advisory Committee, which shall consist of seven members representative of labor and a like number representative of business management. The members of the Committee shall receive no compensation for their services as members of the Committee. They shall, however, be allowed and paid their necessary travel expenses and their subsistence expenses (or a per diem in lieu thereof) while away from home on the business of the Committee. The Committee shall meet not less frequently than once every second calendar month, and shall also meet at such other times as the Administrator may require, or whenever a meeting of the Committee is requested by any five members thereof.

(b) The Committee shall have the function of advising with the Administrator with respect to the administration of this act, and shall also have the function, as hereinafter provided, of recommending persons for appointment on the panel of arbitrators, hereinafter provided for.

LABOR DISPUTES RESULTING IN ACTUAL OR THREATENED PUBLIC EMERGENCIES

SEC. 6. (a) Whenever, in the case of any labor dispute affecting interstate or foreign commerce, the President finds that a public emergency exists or is imminently threatened by reason of such dispute, that the public health or safety is endangered or likely to be endangered thereby, and that local governmental facilities to prevent a lock-out, strike, or other work stoppage and to assist in settling the dispute are not available, or are not being, or cannot effectively be, utilized or invoked, he shall issue an order directed to the parties to such dispute—

(1) Prohibiting the calling or authorizing of any lock-out, strike, or other work stoppage arising out of such dispute, and also prohibiting any person from assisting in any manner any such lock-out, or assisting in any manner any such strike or other work stoppage, whether by picketing, payment of strike benefits, or otherwise.

(2) Directing that all lock-out, strike, or other work-stoppage orders and authorizations, theretofore issued or made, arising out of such dispute be forthwith rescinded.

(3) Directing the parties to the dispute, except as provided in section 7, to refrain or cease and desist from practices which change the situation existing at the time the dispute arose, or which by changing an existing situation caused the dispute.

No provision of any order of the President under this subsection shall be construed to require any individual to perform labor or service without his consent.

(b) The district courts of the United States, notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act of March 23, 1932, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code, to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes," shall upon petition of the Attorney General (but not otherwise), have power to issue injunctions, restraining orders, and other appropriate process, to compel compliance with the provisions of any order of the President issued under subsection (a), or to enjoin violations or threatened violations thereof. No temporary or permanent injunction shall be issued pursuant to this subsection except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court (with opportunity for cross-examination) in support of the allegations of a complaint made under oath, and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered, with the exception that if the complaint shall allege that unless a temporary restraining order is issued without notice, danger to public health or safety will immediately result, such a temporary restraining order may be issued upon testimony under oath, sufficient, if sustained, to justify the court in issuing a temporary injunction upon a hearing after notice. Such a temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than 5 days and shall become void at the expiration of such 5 days. In all cases arising under this subsection in which a person shall be charged with contempt, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the contempt shall have been committed, except that this right shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice, or to apply to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders, or process of the court.

PROCEDURE FOR SETTLING DISPUTE

SEC. 7. (a) Whenever the President has issued an order under section 6 with respect to any labor dispute, it shall be the duty of the parties to such dispute to reach a settlement thereof under one of the following procedures:

(1) Through negotiation and agreement in such manner as the parties deem appropriate; or

(2) Through arbitration by an arbitrator or arbitrators appointed or chosen in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon between the parties; or

(3) If the dispute has not been settled within 30 days after the issuance of the President's order under the procedure provided for in paragraph (1), or if arbitrators have not been chosen and the dispute submitted to arbitration within 30 days after the issuance of such order under the procedure provided for in paragraph (2), the President may, and within 15 days after the expiration of such 30-day period shall, direct that the dispute be arbitrated as hereinafter provided, and that the parties comply with the award made as a result of such arbitration. The award so made shall be binding on both parties and may be enforced in the same manner as an award under the United States Arbitration Act.

(b) There shall be maintained in the Labor Disputes Conciliation Administration a permanent panel of arbitrators of labor disputes. The panel shall be composed of not less than 30 individuals, the precise number to be prescribed from time to time by the President; chosen as hereinafter provided. The labor-management advisory committee shall submit to the Administrator a list of individuals which it recommends as qualified to act as competent, independent, and impartial arbitrators. The list shall contain not less than two names for each vacancy on the panel of arbitrators which is to be filled. The list so submitted shall be transmitted by the Administrator to the President. The members of the panel of arbitrators shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but if the President nominates any individual not recommended by the labor-management advisory committee he shall submit to the Senate with the nomination a statement of why he believes the individual so nominated is better qualified than those recommended by the labor-management advisory committee. The members of the panel shall receive for their services a reasonable per diem to be fixed by the President.

(c) Whenever the President directs under subsection (a) (3) that a labor dispute be submitted to arbitration, each party thereto shall select an arbitrator from the panel of arbitrators, and the two arbitrators thus selected shall select a third arbitrator, who may be either a member of the panel or some individual not a member. If either party fails or refuses to select an arbitrator from the panel of arbitrators, the selection for that party shall be made by the Administrator.

(d) The award of the arbitrators shall contain suitable retroactive provisions, if such provisions appear appropriate, and the award shall be binding on the parties to the dispute for a period of 6 months from the date on which made, unless modified by mutual agreement.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

OPA Nonsense in Used Automobiles as Applied to Used Car Sales

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, again we have the perfect illustration as to unrealistic regulations by OPA in the used-automobile field. I am inserting as part of my remarks, two letters from a prominent automobile dealer in my city, who has analyzed the situation and points out the folly of the present regulations. Unless something is done to correct the situation there is apt to be a national scandal in this field.

Mr. Speaker, my constituent sets forth the problem much better than I can and under previous leave to extend, I insert two letters that I have received from him, one dated May 27, 1946, and one June 22, 1946.

I conferred with Mr. Harrington, of OPA, subsequent to May 27 and conveyed his ideas on used-car regulations to my constituent, who in response to that information replied under date of June 22:

MAY 27, 1946.

Mr. LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Member of Congress,
First District of Wisconsin.

DEAR LAWRENCE: You will remember my several letters, and our conversation relative to the absolute unreasonable and insane price ceilings established by OPA on used cars. These price ceilings are from 25 to 50 percent too high, and you have agreed with me that something should be done.

I was asked to appear at a hearing of our local price control board today, in answer to a complaint that I had not allowed a customer enough for his used car, and that I had violated the price regulations. I am glad to say that the local board dismissed the charges and gave me every opportunity to explain our position. They agreed with my interpretations of the regulations that we do not have to allow a ceiling if it is not a reasonable value.

This case, Lawrence, was filed against us, I believe, in a deliberate attempt at blackmail or conspiracy to show, through OPA, that we had violated the regulations by underallowance, and in the hope that the complainant could collect triple damages if he could prove his point. As a matter of fact we gave this customer a very liberal allowance, and more than he was entitled to, under any reasonable appraisal.

However, the point is this: How long is it going to take to get a sensible revision of used-car prices under OPA? How long can we new-car dealers tolerate this condition? Take this as an example:

OPA permits us to sell a brand new 1946 Chevrolet sedan for $990.50. OPA permits us to sell a used 1942 Chevrolet sedan for $1,089.

Both models are identical in model, style, equipment. The 1942 model is half worn out, and the other is new. The new car carries a year's guaranty—the used car a 30-day guaranty.

The used-car chiselers sold OPA on the idea of insanely high used-car ceilings. We new-car dealers want a fair ceiling, that is fair to both of our customers—the one who buys our used cars, and the one who trades them in to us.

Which one of these customers shall be "gypped"? Apparently OPA wants us to sell a used car for more than a new one; at least they authorize it, and in 6 long months since the war is over, they are apparently unwilling to change this intolerable situation.

Supposing that we sell a customer a used 1942 Chevrolet for $100 more than the price of a new one; and suppose our customer is willing to pay this exhorbitant price, because we cannot deliver him a new one right away. How can we face this customer a year from today—when OPA says new cars will be plentiful—and offer him about $400 in trade for one that he paid us $1,089 for a year previously? Can we tell him a fair depreciation is $689 for 1 year's service? No, we can't, and we won't.

This situation is serious, and it demands attention. This glaring example of OPA price control is intolerable, and we hope that it will be quickly corrected. Our associations are doing everything possible to get these used car ceilings reduced—not increased.

I have been a dealer, a citizen, and a taxpayer in Racine for 22 years, and I would like to look forward to another 22 years, and enjoy my same reputation in this city. If it were not for the hope of relief soon, I would close up my doors and quit in disgust. But I can't; I have too many responsibilities to my employees, many of them have been with me for 10 or 20 years. They all came back after the war—so they must like to work here. We pay them good wages, they give us good work. Where would they go, if I quit?

OPA has cut our discounts four times; first they reduced our delivery charge from 5 percent—or about $45—to $15, so we do this operation at a loss. Then they cut our discount from 24 to 21.7 percent, then to 19.6 percent and the final one today to 18.4 percent. They are forcing a black market in new cars; by maintaining unreasonably high used car ceilings, they lead the public to believe that the ceilings are minimum rather than the maximum prices or values. People want to sell their used cars at black-market prices, then come in and lay their filthy money on the line, and buy the new cars, at OPA regulated prices I would like to take an OPA man, Mr. Bowles preferable, on a tour and pricing expedition, in a town where I am not known; I would open his eyes. He would say, if he wanted to be fair, out with price control on used cars, they are raising prices, not lowering them, as the object should be. Take off the controls on used cars and they will drop 25 to 50 percent overnight.

Thanks a lot for your tolerance.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely.

JUNE 22, 1946.

Mr. LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LAWRENCE: In reply to yours of the 19th, I again want you to know that I do not want to bother you, or have it appear that I alone am doing a lot of "howling". The truth is, that every reputable car dealer in the country, feels exactly as I do.

Now, as to the silly statement of Mr. Harrington of the OPA, as to why used-car prices are high. He cannot justify any reason whatever for permitting the ceiling on an identical used car 4 years old to be higher than the ceiling price of a brand new car. It is true that under the Robinson-Patman Act, that the dealers were permitted to charge 1 percent per month for the insurance, storage, and caretaking of the "frozen" new cars on hand, and that this continued for a period of 27 months. But this 1 percent was the actual expense of keeping these cars (until released by the OPA), and it did not add 1 penny to the value of the cars. It was an expense item pure and simple. It was by comparison—just like any owner of Government bonds—usually the owner will place them in a safety deposit box, and pay the rent on same—does this add any value to the bonds? The answer is "No"—but it is an expense, and good business to do so.

Is Harrington trying to tell you that all frozen new cars were increased in price by 27 percent? What a joke. The dealer collected 2 percent if he had the car in storage for 2 months—or he collected 7 percent if he had the car stored for 7 months. At the end of 27 months there were no new cars left, so they stopped the storage charges, and few if any cars ever took the 27 percent rate of increase.

The truth of the matter is, OPA has bungled the entire new- and used-car program, and the regulations and ceilings on used cars must have been written by a bunch of schoolboys. Instead of holding prices down to a reasonable figure—which is my understanding of the purpose of OPA—they have automatically created the greatest scandal in American business—and that is by allowing used cars of the same make and model to be sold for more than a brand new one. So they propose to reduce prices on used cars by 4 percent every 3 months. My God—it will be 3 years at that rate before they would be fairly priced, and then the car would be junk. A used car, 4 years old, cannot be worth more than 50 percent of the value of a new one; and anyone who says it is—is just a d—— liar, or a fool.

OPA, nor no one else, can stop the public from paying what they choose for used cars, if they need them bad enough. Sure, they are scarce, but nothing can justify OPA in putting ceiling prices higher than a fair value. What is a fair value, you may ask—well, here it is—a conservative depreciation schedule which has been used for 20 years by leading insurance companies, appraisal companies, various trust companies, and car dealers who know their business. Thirty percent depreciation for the first year—1 percent per month for the next 4 years, and one-half of 1 percent for the remaining life of the car. This applies to the popular small or medium-size cars. The depreciation rate is somewhat higher for the larger and more expensive cars. If you would like a complete schedule, and the authority for same, I will be glad to send it to you. Why, even the Treasury Department permits a depreciation of 25 percent per year, (or a life of 4 years) on cars that are used in business, or combined business and pleasure. In other words, after a period of 8 years, a passenger car normally has no dollar value; but it may have a junk, salvage, or sentimental value of a small amount.

Why does not OPA get an experienced car dealer, manufacturer, or distributor, to place fair and reasonable values on used cars? Why did they tell the National Auto Dealers Association to go to h—— when they asked to have fair values placed on used cars? The answer is, that they listened to a lot of used-car dealers, and chiselers—and then put prices on used cars that are a joke and a laughing stock of the country—OPA has actually authorized and raised used-car prices to insane heights—you should hear the GIs rave when they are asked to pay (and legally to, by OPA) $1,100 for an ordinary used 1942 Chevrolet—when they could get a new one for $1,035, if it were available. Personally I don't sell used cars to the public—any that I take in trade I sell to the used-car dealers at wholesale prices—they can clip the public if they want to—but not me. I want to be here 10 years from now, and I want to be able to look my customers in the face then.

I wish I could talk to Mr. Harrington for just 30 minutes, I think I could ask him some questions that he would choke on. He would have to admit that the whole car pricing program is crazy. So why the h—— don't they change it, if they are wrong, instead of looking for excuses, trying to justify their insane program.

The taxpayers are getting d—— tired of paying the bills for the radio and other propaganda that OPA is putting out, and their misleading half-truths that they feed the people, to try to perpetuate themselves in office.

Again, I apologize for taking your time; so toss this in the basket if it bores you too much. I will be expecting to see you in the near future so give me a ring when you get back to Racine.

Yours.

OPA Extension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT J. McGLINCHEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 25, 1946

Mr. McGLINCHEY. Mr. Speaker, the powerful lobby to abolish the Office of Price Administration, which began even before the end of the war, has succeeded finally in forcing Members of Congress to vote either for the passage of a compromise bill, providing far less protection than the present law, or for the death of price control.

The National Association of Manufacturers, abetted by the Republican Party, for months has exerted violent pressure for the scrapping of controls, blaming practically every instance of business hardship on the Office of Price Administration. The easy answer to "No meat, no butter, no nylons, no men's shirts, no lumber" has been in each instance, "The OPA is responsible." This charge is not justified. It is true that shortages in these commodities exist but the facts brought out in the hearings on the price control bill show that production under price control is considerably higher than 1935–39 levels, and that there was more business hardship then, under free competitive pricing than there is today.

The shortages result chiefly from increased demand and increased buying power. For instance, as pointed out by Paul Porter, the Administrator of OPA, at the hearings, millions of American families that formerly could afford meat only once or twice a week now can afford it every day. If the opponents of price control had their way, these families would again be unable to afford meat more than once or twice a week, if at all.

According to the indexes of the Federal Reserve Board, department-store sales rose from an average of $3,340,000 in 1935–39 to $6,910,000 in 1945; and an estimate for 1946, based on first-quarter gain over 1945, places the figure at $8,300,000. It is difficult to read business hardship into these figures.

The personal hardship that undoubtedly will be felt by millions of our low-salaried people as a consequence of the relaxation of price controls is not pleasant to contemplate. Those in the higher-salaried brackets may be able to make ends meet, but what of the low-salaried white-collar worker, the disabled veteran whose only income is his totally inadequate monthly compensation check, the veteran's widow, the man or woman who depends on an old-age assistance check for maintenance, the retired civil-service employee? Their only hope is that business will react to the loosening of price controls with reason and restraint.

For those who advocate the removal of price controls altogether, I quote from the report of the congressional committee which returned recently from a tour of Russia and the Near East:

> The following prices may be of interest:
> A 12-pound turkey was offered for what would approximate $300.
> At Christmas time a second-hand suit of clothes sold for $250, just enough to buy a turkey for Christmas dinner. Eggs were sold singly for as much as $2 each.

It is inconceivable to me that anyone should advocate that our country should gamble with run-away inflation by the elimination of price control at this time.

Although I do not regard the bill as it came from conference as satisfactory price-control legislation, unless we accept it we will not have any price control after June 30. I shall vote, therefore, for the adoption of the conference report only because there is no alternative. If the conference report is voted down, the battle against inflation will be lost and our Nation will be headed toward economic disaster.

Unification of Armed Services as Ex-Navy Man Views It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under permission previously granted to extend my remarks, I am including a copy of a letter from a constituent who was recently discharged from the naval service. His letter deals with the important question of unification of the armed services, which matter will be considered by this House very soon.

Mr. Speaker, I do not agree fully with the view expressed in this letter, but, nevertheless, it is an able presentation as viewed by one who has been recently identified with the Navy. I am sure it will prove of interest to Members of the House:

Congressman LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Writing my Congressman is a new experience to me, and I have hesitated in this case for fear that the letter will be just one more small burden rather than the aid which I hope it to be. In the matter which is the cause and subject of this letter, i. e., the proposed merger of the military services into a single Cabinet department, I feel so strongly that the passage of this legislation would endanger the security of the Nation, and, further, that I am qualified to express an opinion on the subject, that I will risk being a nuisance to you.

That you may evaluate my remarks, I will mention that I was returned to inactive duty by the Navy in November of last year after three and a half years of service, chiefly in the Pacific. I was commissioned in the Navy via the "90-day-wonder" route and after several months of additional training was sent to sea as a junior officer aboard the USS Levy. I was ordered back to the States about a year later and trained in amphibious warfare. I was then ordered to place in commission and take command of my own ship, the USS LCS 109, which I held until my release a year later. The 109 fought through the entire Okinawa campaign on the radar picket line and concluded its wartime career with the Japanese occupation.

My service on the Levy was with Admiral Halsey's Third Fleet through the Solomons campaign and other South Pacific service. I agree that there are many persons much better acquainted than I with the Pacific war and with Navy problems, but I acquired sufficient familiarity to flatter myself that my opinion is of some value. So much for that.

Its proponents have advocated the merger for several general reasons. The claim has been made that the individuality of the services was responsible for many instances of divided command, and that lack of cooperation among the services cost unnecessary lives, wasted time, and duplicated efforts. It is their contention that a unified command would eliminate these evils. Certainly cooperation was not always what it might have been, and there was often duplication of effort. At no time, however, was there actually a divided command in the sense that the responsibility for any operation was uncertain or sufficient authority lacking. I am certain that all instances of costly noncooperation may be laid directly at the door of an individual officer in command—sometimes Army, sometimes Navy, sometimes Marine—who had the authority to achieve operational harmony and failed to use it. It must be remembered that for each instance of unsuccessful combined operation, there were 99 instances in which smooth teamwork effectively and economically carried the job at hand. I will venture to assert that this was always so when the operation was in the hands of a competent commander from any of the services. There will always be waste in lives and time and matériel in any warfare on a global scale from the sheer size of the thing, and a so-called unified command could no more improve that than it could abolish a. w. o. l.'s.

The Army and Navy are both military organizations whose primary function is to defeat enemies, but beyond that they actually have little in common. Sea-borne warfare is no more similar to land warfare than golf is to bridge. Even the superficial resemblance of naval ordnance to Army artillery blurs on close inspection. Naval warfare is a distinct and unique profession involving knowledge, techniques, abilities, materials, and problems with which Army officers have no concern. An example is the requirements of the mariner's profession which a naval officer must master as only a part of his own. It becomes of extreme importance, therefore, that the authority directing the development, training, and use of the naval forces have in itself a thorough knowledge of the needs, applications, and limitations of sea power, and that it be free to exercise the knowledge.

The subordination of naval strategy and operations to Army needs would remove the cutting edge from the weapon which we first seized to halt the enemy in both hemispheres. This subordination would necessarily occur to a greater or lesser degree whenever the military service was under the direction of Army authority. When the converse was true, if ever, the Army would be similarly under top naval authority with equally undesirable consequences.

The traditional entrusting of all services to a civilian Commander in Chief is to some degree comparable to parts of the proposed set-up and has, of course, certain disadvantages. Its chief value lies in the fact that it provides a disinterested check on the autonomy of the military services and that the Commander in Chief is the elective magistrate of the United States and hence directly responsible to the electorate for his actions.

If by this time you have written me off as simply a pseudo naval officer out of uniform, I will hasten to protest that I am not. I am no more than a citizen with some knowledge of the problem. My interest in the Navy refers to the agency whose function is to protect my interests by efficiently guarding those of my country. My experience convinces me that it can best do so with its present status and with a direct line of responsibility through the Secretary of the Navy to the Commander in Chief.

I find all the foregoing a bit wordier than I had intended so let me briefly summarize:

1. Noncooperation is not inherent in the independent statuses of the services. For confirmation, refer to almost any of the Pacific campaigns.

2. When noncooperation occurs, its source is the improper functioning of some person in authority. This would be true whether the services were merged or not.

3. The coordination necessary to successful amphibious operations can be obtained by combined training operations and in no other way.

4. The Army and Navy, in general, do not have common weapons, techniques, training, problems, needs, or development. They are two separate professions sharing the same ultimate goal, and cannot successfully be treated on any other basis.

5. Some inefficiency derives from the sheer wartime size of these organizations. Far from curing this evil, a merger would tend only to aggravate it.

6. In the areas of supply, personnel procurement, and some engineering, there is a substantial interservice overlap, and the possibility of a common agency might be explored with profit.

7. In summation, the merger would not serve any valid end and ultimately would constitute a source of danger to the standards of all services.

Thank you for your patient courtesy in reading this far. I know you have many demands on your time and I won't be at all offended if this letter is unanswered.

With my best wishes,

MARTIN L. SMITH.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have always been a stanch supporter of strong price control. I opposed every crippling amendment to the OPA bill. I condemned the action of the House and the Senate in limiting OPA controls at this critical period. I fought for consideration for the consumers of America. I believe in price control—because to abandon it prematurely will bring disaster to our economy.

The conference report on which we in the House acted Tuesday is not an adequate price control bill. I am afraid it will lead to inflation. I am sorry that it was the only choice we had. We who firmly believe in price control had the choice of registering a protest by voting "no" and possibly playing completely into the hands of enemies of price control, or voting "aye" on a bill to which we could not give full approval and save at least rent control and controls on foodstuffs.

I voted for the conference report only in the hope I would be contributing toward saving a little bit for the consumers of this country. I was fearful a "nay" vote might result in the loss of all protection for the consumers.

We had a choice between two evils. The choice either way was bad, but the badness, the evil, in the conference report came long before the conference report. The damage was done when the House added those eight crippling amendments some weeks ago. Those who really favored a strong price control bill opposed every one of those crippling amendments, and I am glad to say that the RECORD will show that I voted against each of them.

Should President Truman decide the OPA bill as finally passed is unworkable and vetoes it, I shall vote to sustain such a veto.

Under leave to do so, I herewith include a timely editorial from the Belleville (Ill.) News-Democrat, of Tuesday, June 25, 1946, entitled "Hold Onto Your Hat." The writer, the Honorable Robert L. Kern, shows he has a clear picture of this problem. The editorial:

HOLD ONTO YOUR HAT

It begins to look very much as if this Nation is being reconverted from the New Deal to a new delirium. The boom-and-bust cycle has started, but it will be 6 to 8 months before the full effects of it are felt.

Scarce goods are being withheld from the market by persons hungry for price rises. They will be gobbled up by a public which willingly put up with scarcities throughout the war.

An effort will be made to convince the public that production increased by leaps and bounds as soon as price-control policies were liberalized, but that to a large extent will be pure and simple bunk.

The evidence is overwhelming that speculating hoarders will turn loose what was made long ago as soon as they can get higher prices. And when these hoardings are depleted, and scarcity is evident again, watch the inflationary spiral climb!

More strikes will bring about bigger wage increases, price rises will follow, and the merry jamboree will go on and on.

That is one delirium. Here is another:

Last year's yield of wheat was one of the largest in the history of the country. Yet the bakeries cannot get flour with which to make bread. People cannot even buy flour to make their own bread.

Some of the wheat now being harvested is coming from the granaries but only a small part of it.

Hike the ceilings on wheat and its products and there will be plenty of bread—at a price.

Is the meat situation delirious? We'll say it is.

More cattle and sheep roaming the plains than ever before in our history and less in the slaughterhouses.

But at least the meat raisers are honest about it. "We've got the goods," they say, "and when we get higher prices we'll turn loose."

And the Office of Price Administration is getting all the blame for it.

The unanswered question in the minds of most consumers is, why is Congress giving OPA the works?

Peter Edson, noted economist, appears to have the right answer. In a recent commentary he explained:

"In simple political lingo, OPA is being crushed under a lot of logs. It is political log-rolling such as has not been seen in Washington since the old Republican days when sectional blocs made deals that gave everybody something in the way of a high protective tariff. Price control renewal bills emerging from both the House and Senate have a lot of resemblance to the old-fashioned Fordney-McCumber tariff bill. All were designed to keep prices high and to give the consumers a good squeezin'.

"In tracing political maneuvering one fact stands out. It was not entirely Republican opposition that killed off the Democratic administration program to hold down the cost of living. The Democrats are just as much to blame as the Republicans.

"The trouble began in the solid Democratic South. It began when Chester Bowles as Price Administrator declared it might be necessary to put a ceiling price on raw cotton. It was intensified when Mr. Bowles put new trading regulations on the cotton exchanges. They were intended to curb speculation, but they had the effect of holding down the price of raw cotton.

"Second bloc comes from the industrial North and East. Officeseekers here depend for their campaign expenses on contributions from manufacturers and businessmen. A politician must have campaign money before he can go after votes. If a group of businessmen-campaign contributors and a group of consumer-voters are waiting in a Congressman's office to influence him on price controls, there is no question which will get the Congressman's vote.

"The third bloc is from the 20 Western States, largely agricultural. Regardless of party, every farmer and stockman, grain dealer, feeder, and packer sees ahead a great chance to make a killing in meat. The only thing that stands in the way is OPA price control. It shouldn't take a slide rule to figure which way the wind blows in this part of the country.

"The stage being set in this fashion, action came easy. Western and southern Democrats and midwestern and eastern Republicans could find much in common."

Well, everybody should be politically happy. That is everybody but the poor consumers.

They don't count anyway.

But they can count a whole lot when ceilings go off and the boom-and-bust cycle starts, if they make up their minds to sock their savings into Federal bonds and refuse to buy any exorbitantly priced items.

Then they can sit back and wait for prices to come down.

And they'll come down, too—never fear.

Importation of Almonds Should Be Stopped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, all of the almonds which are grown in the United States and distributed through commercial channels are produced in California. It happens that this year the almond crop will be three and one-quarter times larger than the national average annual consumption of almonds during the past 10 years. The result will be that there will be a very depressed price for almonds.

We are doing everything in our power to feed the famine-stricken people of Europe so as to prevent undernourishment or even starvation. Italy is one of those receiving these benefits. Curious and inconsistent as it may seem, Italy and other countries are now shipping a considerable amount of almonds to this country. The food value of almonds is tremendously high not only in calories but also in vitamins. It would seem that common sense would dictate that this food should be retained where it can be used to take care of famine-stricken people. Also it would seem like common sense, when we have the largest crop of almonds that we have ever produced, that we should not further add to the dismal prospects of the almond growers further surpluses of this article by importation.

The State Department has the power to control these imports and in the case of other articles has done so. The Members of Congress from California have requested the Department to take steps to reduce or prohibit further importation of this food, and to use the almonds in the countries which are now seeking and receiving food supplies from us. All of the Members of Congress from California who were present on June 25 signed our petition to the Assistant Secretary of State.

For the information of Congress there is included in this statement the letter which was sent to the State Department as well as a brief letter of my own accompanying this joint request. These letters are here reproduced:

JUNE 26, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM L. CLAYTON,
Assistant Secretary of State,
State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLAYTON: Attached hereto is a letter addressed to you by the California congressional delegation.

Every Member of the Senate or House who is in the city has signed the letter, in which we ask your help in reducing the importation of almonds.

Those who have not signed are all out of the city on official trips or because of illness.

I trust that you can do something to help the almond growers of California, who are the almond growers of the United States as all of the almonds in this country are raised in our State.

With kind personal regards to you, I am

Sincerely yours,

LEROY JOHNSON,
Member of Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM L. CLAYTON,
Assistant Secretary of State,
State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLAYTON: The undersigned members of the California congressional delegation respectfully request that the State Department take steps to reduce the importation of almonds into this country.

The crop of almonds for this (1946) year, all of which are grown in the State of California, is 3¼ times the volume of almonds ordinarily raised in any one year. You can appreciate the devastating effect which any imports will have on the price structure of almonds. As you undoubtedly know, an almond grove is a permanent crop; trees once brought to maturity represent a great investment and cannot be pulled out and changed (like an annual crop) without very disastrous expense to the grower. Consequently, with the great emphasis that is being placed on building up or at least maintaining the present standard of living of our people and of maintaining a healthy economy, it needs no argument to convince you that there should be a curtailment of the imports of this particular product.

The reason for making this request is that we understand that you have successfully handled a number of similar situations. We, therefore, feel, the matter having been called to your attention by Mr. D. R. Bailey, general manager, California Almond Growers Exchange, and also by this communication, that you will take the necessary steps to obtain the help of the Department of State to avoid a financial catastrophe in the almond industry. Your good business judgment and statesmanlike conduct, in other cases of a comparable nature, have brought excellent results and we sincerely hope that you may give us the necessary help in this instance.

We understand that you have all the necessary factual data required in this matter. However, if you feel that we can furnish any further information that will be useful to you, if you will contact Mr. LEA, Mr. JOHNSON, or Mr. GEARHART, whose congressional districts contain the greater proportion of almond groves, they would be glad to furnish what information you may want.

Respectfully submitted.

Sheridan Downey, United States Senator; William F. Knowland, United States Senator; Clarence F. Lea, First District; Clair Engle, Second District; Leroy Johnson, Third District; Franck C. Havenner, Fourth District; Bertrand W. Gearhart, Ninth District; A. J. Elliott, Tenth District; George Outland, Eleventh District; Jerry Voorhis, Twelfth District; Ned R. Healy, Thirteenth District; Helen Gahagan Douglas, Fourteenth District; Gordon McDonough, Fifteenth District; Ellis E. Patterson, Sixteenth District; Cecil R. King, Seventeenth District; Carl Hinshaw, Twentieth District; Harry Sheppard, Twenty-first District; John Phillips, Twenty-second District.

Mr. Baruch and the Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann in the Washington Post on June 20, 1946, on Mr. Baruch's proposal to the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy. Mr. Baruch's proposal is the Lilienthal-Acheson report with the addition of the veto.

The veto in this connection has been greatly misunderstood. Mr. Walter Lippmann sheds some valuable light on the subject.

TODAY AND TOMORROW
(By Walter Lippmann)
MR. BARUCH AND THE VETO

In what he had to say about the veto Mr. Baruch reflected the feeling in this country that international agreements which cannot be enforced will give a false sense of security and are therefore worse than none at all. His remarks have been widely applauded in this country. Yet his treatment of the problem of the veto showed little evidence that he had investigated it thoroughly or had chosen his words carefully.

For while his words imply that the United States is opposed to the principle of the veto, the American proposal, which he himself outlined, is founded upon the American veto. Mr. Baruch's task is to negotiate a treaty with the other governments. This treaty is to contain international agreements to do certain things and not to do certain other things. This treaty cannot come into being until it has been ratified by many governments, not the least among them the Government of the United States.

If we do not ratify the treaty, we shall not cease to manufacture atomic bombs, we shall not place our atomic plants in the hands of any international authority, we shall not disclose any of our secret knowledge.

The treaty must, in other words, satisfy us or we shall veto it. There can be no international control of atomic energy without our consent. The power to prevent something from happening by withholding consent is the veto. In the case of atomic energy the American veto is unique and absolute.

Every sovereign state has the legal right not to be bound by a treaty to which it has not given its consent. But if, let us say, China or Brazil refuse to ratify, it would still be legal and feasible for other nations to make a treaty for the international control of atomic energy. China and Brazil have no present prospect of making atomic bombs. But if the United States refuses to ratify, international control will have been vetoed absolutely. For the United States has at present a monopoly of the bombs, stockpiles, and plants which the international control would have to control.

Now Mr. Baruch, as our representative, not only has no slightest intention of surrendering this American veto; on the contrary, he intends to use it for all it is worth to induce the other governments to agree to a treaty which we judge to be good enough not to veto. We intend to use our veto as a diplomatic instrument to obtain what we believe will be a constructive and beneficent treaty. That being our intention, and an altogether honorable intention, what is the good of concealing and confusing it by talking as if the veto—the principle of unanimous consent among sovereign states—were a peculiar device which, but for the Russians, we should gladly abolish?

What we really want is not to abolish the veto but to persuade the Russians to agree to a treaty which they and we can and will ratify. The treaty itself cannot be made except by the unanimous consent of the leading industrial powers. But if they ratify this treaty they will have consented to the abrogation of the veto on any subject about which the treaty is clear and definite. If the treaty says that only the International Atomic Development Authority may mine and own uranium and thorium, no government which has ratified the treaty can thereafter veto the monopoly of the Authority. Why should there be any confusion on this point? The President has the right to veto a bill just as every nation has the right to veto the treaty. But if the bill becomes law, the President cannot then continue to veto its administration. The veto controls the making of agreements, laws, and treaties, but when they are made there can be no veto of anything which is by agreement the law of that thing. Obstruction, resistance, nonenforcement are then not the veto power but lawbreaking.

Obviously Mr. Baruch was thinking of what would happen to the atomic treaty, first, if in administering it the Russians always said no as they have so often in recent months, and, second, if after ratifying the treaty, they conspired secretly to make illegal atomic weapons.

The first difficulty can best be met in the treaty itself—by taking every care before it is ratified that the rights, duties, and powers are as definite and clear as language can make them—and by providing—I should suggest—for judicial interpretation of any point in the treaty about which disputes may arise subsequently among the directors and managers of the Atomic Development Authority.

The trouble we have had with the Yalta and the Potsdam declarations teaches us that ambiguous, hastily improvised generalities are to be avoided like the pest. The drafting of this treaty should be done with exhaustive care by an international commission of jurists and scientific men. Insofar as they can write a treaty which effectively says what it means, and exactly how conflicts of interpretation are to be resolved, the treaty, when ratified, will in that degree be uncontrolled by the veto power. When a treaty exists, and where it is explicit, there can be no veto power.

There can be only open rebellion or secret conspiracy. Mr. Baruch's remarks are addressed to these eventualities: "There must be no veto to protect those who violate their solemn agreements not to develop or use aomic energy for destructive purposes." This statement rests, I submit, on a misunderstanding of the rule of unanimity in the Charter. There is no veto to protect those who violate their solemn agreements. The problem of what to do with a great power which violates a solemn agreement was thoroughly considered in drafting the Charter. The conclusion of those who studied the problem was the same as that reached by the authors of the American Constitution: That no great and sovereign power will sign an agreement saying that the other nations may make war against it, and yet that no agreement can prevent them from waging war against it if they think they must and believe they can.

It is not true, as Mr. Baruch implied, that the Charter protects great powers who violate solemn agreements. The Charter is silent on what may and must be done if a great power violates a solemn agreement as our Constitution is silent on what the Federal Government may and should do if States secede or nullify Federal law. The two documents are silent for the very good reason that the only thing that can be done is to make war. The lawbreaker cannot prevent such a war by the use of a veto, and for the law-abiding power the war would be not one bit easier to wage if there were no veto. The thing Mr. Baruch wants was omitted from the Charter because it would have injected a useless and deceptive complication into the international organization.

Suppose we persuaded the Russians to agree solemnly that if they make atomic bombs illegally, the Soviet Union may suffer "condign punishments." It is we who would have to inflict the condign punishments, it is we who would have to bear the main burden of the total war. To whom then is this solemn agreement to use sanctions addressed? To the Russians, supposing they are the ones who have decided to violate the treaty? Not at all. If they have decided to violate the treaty, it will be because they have decided that they have a good chance of benefiting from the violation and of escaping serious penalties.

To abolish the veto will not change that. But what it would do would be to give the right to a majority of other nations, not necessarily including the United States, to vote the United States into a war in the hypothetical future.

I cannot see what Mr. Baruch thinks he can gain by binding the United States now to fight, not necessarily with its own consent, in the future. What is more, I do not think that he and the Senate today can under our Constitution legally commit a future Congress to war, or that the legal commitment, if made today, would have any binding effect in the future.

This part of Mr. Baruch's proposal needs to be reconsidered and revised. In order that this may be done wisely and thoroughly, his staff could with great advantage be strengthened by the addition of men who are learned in the law and experienced in the practice of constitutions.

Farmers Can Haul Their Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the protection of the public in the use of the highways and freedom of action, I am including a timely editorial by Spencer Canary, editor of the Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio:

RACKETEERING BILL UP TO TRUMAN

Congress has taken President Truman at his word and passed the Hobbs antiracketeering bill.

This bill, if signed by the President, will serve to prevent the stigma put upon union labor by some conscienceless leaders and will to a degree stop the robberies which some racketeers have been perpetrating under the theory that they are not illegal.

The bill was made necessary to protect the public because our Supreme Court in 1942 held that labor unions were exempt from the 1934 act which outlaws robbery or extortion in interstate commerce. That decision was made in this case: Farmers had been hauling their produce from New Jersey to New York. The truck drivers' union was alleged to have used strong-arm methods to compel these producers to hire union drivers or else to pay a union fee.

The Hobbs bill would make such interference unlawful and punishable. Such interference is not unionism, but pure racketeering that is just as bad as banditry in robbing a bank. There has been a lot of it in many lines; and it is just as obnoxious to legitimate union men as to any other citizen.

It is in the same class as if Bowling Green's chamber of commerce were to seek funds to help the city and were to import some husky crooks to waylay and beat those who would not subscribe.

The Hobbs bill would make it as unlawful for union members, as well as anyone else, to hinder interstate commerce by "actual or threatened force, or violence, or fear of injury, immediate or future." But the bill also stipulates that nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect the Wagner Labor Relations Act, the Railway Labor Act, or the Norris-La Guardia Antiinjunction Act.

President Truman in vetoing the Case bill June 11 wrote that he is in full accord with the objectives of the antiracketeering section, but he objected to that part of the bill embodied in the Case bill because it omitted from the original act the provision that it was not to be construed so as to impair, diminish, or in any manner affect the rights of bona fide labor organizations in lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

Evidently the Hobbs bill meets all these requirements. So Mr. Truman may be expected to sign it and make it law.

Punishing UNRRA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include an editorial from this morning's edition of the Washington Post:

PUNISHING UNRRA

Once more the House is trying to tie strings on the money which the United States, by congressional authorization, has solemnly pledged itself to contribute to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The sum of $465,000,000 is still due as the balance of this country's commitment. It is urgently needed for the relief of hungry people. To attach to the fulfillment of this pledge a stipulation that the governments under which the hungry people live must adhere to the American tradition of press freedom—and that is what the House voted to do yesterday—is to nullify the pledge itself and to play politics meanly with human wretchedness.

The issue arises at the present time as the result of a State Department report made in conformity with congressional instructions to use its good offices to gain free access for American correspondents to countries receiving UNRRA aid. All such countries, with the single exception of the Soviet Union, agreed to give visiting reporters access to UNRRA news. The Soviet Union refused to give any general assurance respecting freedom of movement for newspapermen, although it is well known that American correspondents are now in that country and reporting regularly to their papers. The notion that the Russians can be bludgeoned into expanding the freedom of these correspondents by the withholding of our contribution to UNRRA is too quixotic for serious consideration.

Yet, if this is not the purpose of the House rider, it can have no purpose at all save to penalize hungry Russians for the shortcomings of their Government. The House attached just such a rider to its appropriation of UNRRA funds last fall. Happily, the Senate excised it—and will, we trust, do so again. For this proposal has nothing to do with relief and can have no effect save to exacerbate international relationships which are already, in all conscience, difficult enough. The rider is as irrelevant now as it was last fall—and as mischievous as it is irrelevant.

Farmer in the Postwar Period: His Income Has Reached an All-Time High, His Mortagage Debt Is Lowest in 30 Years

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM R. THOM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, a former farm owner and manager who for 10 years operated a 220-acre farm, Mr. Ross L. Holman, has written the following article for the Christian Science Monitor, setting out the present financial status of the American farmer:

Farm income has reached an all-time high. That is a preliminary estimate of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics for 1945. What makes it more interesting is that for the third consecutive year America has topped the prewar high of 1919. The recently estimated $24,000,000,000 income is more than $6,000,000,000 higher than the predepression peak of $17,710,000,000 in 1919 and more than five times higher than the depression low of $4,743,000,000 in 1932.

Since we are used to talking in superlatives when speaking of wartime incomes, the above news wouldn't excite us except for one thing. For over 20 years between the two wars farming was just about the sorriest way on earth to make a living. During much of that hectic period the farm problem was splashing across the front pages of practically every American newspaper. Farms were foreclosed by the tens of thousands, or being handed over to creditors without litigated proceedings. Approximately one-fourth of America's farmed acres were lost to their owners in this way.

But there is another reason why the $24,000,000,000 pile of agricultural dollars is some of the biggest financial news of the day. It is backed up by the lowest farm-mortgage debt since the First World War. The farmers came out of the recent war with a mortgage indebtedness of less than half the prewar peak. In contrast to this they came out of World War I with a mortgage load nearly three times bigger than the one they had when they entered it. In other words, they have used their increased income of 1939–45 to pay off their debts. They used the rising income of 1914–19 to build up a topheavy credit. All of which means that when agricultural prices drop after the repercussions of this last war have died away the farmer will not have to dump his crops on a glutted market in order to pay off pressing obligations.

The brighter picture doesn't mean, of course, that many farmers are not going in debt for more land. It doesn't mean that some of them are not borrowing heavily to cash in on present high crop prices. It doesn't mean that land prices are not booming. Chester Davis, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, reported recently that the average price of land is now 52 percent higher than the 1935–39 average. But making due allowance for these facts, the over-all agricultural picture shows that farmers as a whole are more solvent than at any time in their history. If the country doesn't indulge in another "boom and bust" land speculation it is unthinkable to expect crop prices to deflate enough to seriously impair the average farmer's solvency.

In order to fully appreciate the significance of the present agricultural situation, let us be more specific with our figures. At the beginning of World War I the American farmers had a total mortgage debt of $3,200,000,000. By 1920 it was $8,448,772,000 and later reached a total of $10,700,000,000.

On reaching the peak of $10,700,000,000 about the mid-thirties, farmers began reducing their financial load. They gave this mortgage burden a big wallop with their wartime income of 1939–45, and today it is only $5,250,000,000. Although many farmers are buying new land and contracting new farm mortgages, more of them are paying off their obligations. The Farm Credit Administration reports that in 1943 farm payments on principal of farm debt exceeded new mortgage loans by more than 4 to 1. The nonreal-estate debt of farmers declined during 1944 to $1,588,000,000.

But this debt within itself doesn't by any means tell the whole story of the farmers' financial situation. During 1944 the number of war bonds held by farmers increased from $2,360,000,000 to $3,910,000,000. During the same year their bank deposits increased from $9,700,000,000 to $11,700,000,000, according to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. In other words, with their savings in bonds and bank deposits they could pay off both mortgage and personal debts, have their farms clear of all encumbrance, and yet have more than $7,000,000,000 of liquid capital left to operate them. Of course, there are still a number of individual farmers who are burdened with more debts than they could easily pay. But the total net assets of the farm-owning population look like the best answer yet to the peace planner's prayer.

While there is still time for another spiral of land inflation and a swollen credit situation, it now looks as though the lessons of the first World War are too recent for the farmer to forget them. It wouldn't seem reasonable for him to run the risk of another era of economic slavery such as he endured in the period between the Kaiser and Hitler.

While, of course, no one can say the country will not go through another financial wringer like those that followed 1921 and 1929, it is some consolation to know that the chief influence contributing to these two debacles is not present in the existing postwar period. There is nothing that can demoralize a Nation's economy more completely than a mean economic situation on the farm. Farm revenue is the most widely distributed income in existence. Agriculture is pursued in every community and crossroads in the United States.

Agricultural income represents the living of approximately one-fourth of America's population. Another huge segment of the population which lives in country towns and villages is indirectly dependent on it. In a tremendous number of counties in the United States agricultural products are practically the only commodities shipped out of the community to bring in outside wealth. If you don't believe that the farmer's earning power affects the business position of the merchants and bankers around him, just walk into one of the county-seat towns of the South's one-crop area just after the cotton market has crashed. Not only that, but feel the pulse of even Wall Street itself after the South's chief money crop has gone into a tailspin. But give the 30,000,000 or more people in the farm population a livable income and the whole Nation of consumers will have a buying power that has a punch.

While the present situation is, of course, very encouraging, there is one danger at which we have already hinted. A rising tide of land and crop prices such as we are now experiencing is mighty tempting. While the real farmer is, as a rule, not a land speculator, he might be tempted into a sale of his farm to a speculator who offers him more money above the normal value of his land than he can expect to get in the earning power of his farm.

It is to be hoped that banks, finance companies, and other farm-lending agencies will be more conservative in their appraisal of long-time prospects than many of them were on their farm loans of the other postwar period. Easy land loans are usually the spark that ignites the orgy of speculation. While I have seen a few recent cases of bad judgment in making land loans, the present credit situation involving farm borrowing seems to be under better control than it was after the First World War.

Mr. Gromyko's Contribution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the second in a series of articles by Mr. Walter Lippmann in the Washington Post on June 22, 1946, on Mr. Baruch's proposal to the United Nations Commission on atomic energy:

TODAY AND TOMORROW
(By Walter Lippmann)
MR. GROMYKO'S CONTRIBUTION

The Russian proposals on atomic energy are very interesting in that they do not in principle contradict, and can be used in a most important way to supplement, our own proposals. They are addressed to the creation of a system of universal law in the field of atomic energy and all weapons of mass destruction.

The Acheson-Lilienthal report did not deal directly with this essential aspect of the problem, and Mr. Baruch's treatment of the veto was an attempt to supply the deficiency. Mr. Gromyko's proposals are another attempt, and in my view his approach is one which we have every reason to welcome.

He is proposing to make the production, the possession, and the use of atomic weapons "a serious crime against humanity," and to fix this crime not only by international agreement binding all states but also by national laws within each state. If this were done, then thereafter any person, private or official, who violated the law would be a criminal, subject to arrest and punishment, in his own country and in every other country.

Now, our plan differs from the Russian in that we do not propose to abolish atomic weapons but to give the international authority the monopoly of such weapons. But this difference, which will have to be explored carefully, is less important than the agreement of the two plans. For in our plan it would be a serious crime for any government or any private person to produce, own, or use an atomic weapon. The Russians would make it a high crime for anyone to have atomic weapons, whereas we would make it a high crime for anyone but the authorized international authority to have them.

The Russians stipulate that we should destroy all our atomic bombs 3 months after the agreement comes into force. Since it cannot come into force without our agreement (that is to say, unless we do not veto it) the door is wide open to us to propose rules and regulations that should be embodied in the treaty and in the domestic legislation which Mr. Gromyko proposes in order to support the treaty.

While the proposal that we cease making atomic bombs and destroy those we have is one that we cannot accept offhand, we should not reject it in principle. From a strictly military point of view the Russian proposal is, I think, more favorable to the United States and less favorable to the Soviet Union than is the American proposal. For under the American plan the international authority would develop atomic energy plants outside the United States, and there is no doubt that, using American know-how, the international authority could build them sooner than any other country can hope to build them by itself.

The Russian proposals would leave us with a monopoly for quite some time to come, and a great headstart for a much longer time, in the facilities necessary to make atomic weapons. For my own part, I do not believe that the Russians have really understood the problem of atomic energy well enough to realize how much they are conceding to us and how little they are getting for themselves. When they do, they will shut the loud mouths of the Daily Worker and their other foolish friends, and take a very different view of the extraordinarily radical proposal which Mr. Baruch has made to them.

For the situation in atomic energy today is as if the United States had the only steel plants in the world. With that steel are made the only guns in the world. Along come the Russians and say: "Destroy the guns you have, cease making new guns, but keep your steel plants, and keep the dies, jigs, blueprints, machine tools, and whatever else it takes to make guns out of steel. We Russians, on the other hand, having neither guns nor steel plants, expect some day to have steel plants as good as yours." We, on the other hand, have said that, if we can agree on a plan for it, we will not only stop making guns for ourselves but will participate in building steel plants as good as our own in other parts of the world.

The objection to the Russian plan is not that it would deprive us of a winning weapon of war. It leaves us with all the means of making these weapons, and this immense military potential would continue to be a great element in the balance of power in the world. The objection is that while it still leaves us preeminent in atomic power, it offers no guaranty, and not even a plan, against national rivalry in the development of destructive atomic power.

For the Russians do not seem to have understood the fundamental conclusion of the American scientists—that any country which has the facilities for making atomic energy in large quantities has practically all the facilities for waging atomic war. Unless all the important development of atomic energy is firmly under international control, the threat of atomic war will be imminent and persistent.

The more we examine the Baruch and the Gromyko statements the more we have reason to feel, I believe, that this is as promising a start as we had any right to expect. That is, in fact, an understatement. For the two plans open many doors. They shut no doors. And they make all the room a statesman could ask, at the beginning of a great enterprise, for negotiation, persuasion, explanation, invention, and accommodation.

Address by Hon. Kenneth C. Royall, Under Secretary of War, Before Affiliated Young Democrats of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. MEAD
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, June 28 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Kenneth C. Royall, Under Secretary of War, at the seventh biennial State convention of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York, at the Hotel Piccadilly, New York City, on Friday, June 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It has been a pleasure to meet your officers and so many members of your organization—and to find a group so interested in matters which are of importance to your State and your Nation. I am privileged to speak before you.

Many of those present were recently in the armed forces. Others served without uniform in what was, in size and scope, the greatest of America's undertakings and accomplishments during the life of our Republic—the fighting and winning of the Second World War.

Because this war touched every side of our American life, because it put to a test the ideas and ideals of our democratic form of Government, because it taught us lessons of inestimable value to the future of our Nation—lessons in civic and patriotic responsibility and in leadership—in objects for which your organization stands—for these reasons I have chosen tonight to review briefly some of the great contributions of the State of New York and of its people toward the winning of this global war.

The story has been told of several States—for example, Texas—where its citizens have asserted that the United States was a valuable ally of that State in the recent conflict. In the case of New York, such a statement comes very near to being true.

For New York State had enough men in uniform to make up the seventh largest military force of all the 21 United Nations in the war. It furnished, for example, more men in the field and on shipboard than did Canada, or Australia, or Czechoslovakia, or Norway, or Holland, or Belgium—and many more than did any but five of our other allies.

Or to put it another way, the entire number of troops engaged in the assault phase of the Normandy engagement were less in number than the total of the armed forces from New York State. New York sailors and marines were considerably greater in number than the entire strength of the Navy and Marine Corps in 1941—even after these services were well on their way toward war mobilization.

There were more than 1,500,000 New Yorkers in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Included in this number were many volunteers—and, in the case of the Army, thousands of splendid National Guard troops. New Yorkers served in every branch of the services; and there was not a single major campaign on the sea, on land, or in the air in which New York troops did not participate.

In every section of this country there is at least one division which, to that section, typifies its fighting spirit. In the case of New York, the Twenty-seventh Division has occupied that position during two wars. Its enviable record during 1917-18—in the Meuse-Argonne, in the Ypres offensive, in the Somme, and, finally, in breaking the Hindenburg line—placed it among one of the greatest divisions of all American history and has given to this State, for almost 30 years, just pride in the demonstrated courage and stamina of New York boys.

This time the division distinguished itself on the other side of the world—on Makin Island, Eniwetok and Saipan, Okinawa and Kume Islands—in some of the most rugged fighting of the entire war.

And the division—unlike the National Guard divisions of many States—retained to a large extent its New York identity, both in enlisted and officer personnel—in fighting men and fighting leaders.

To the Twenty-seventh Division and to other divisions, New York furnished leaders—leaders whose names will go down in history—battlefield leaders, rear echelon leaders, planning and operating leaders, leaders at home and abroad.

Although in the entire United States Army the proportion of general officers was smaller in this war than in preceding American wars, yet New York furnished a total of 133 Army generals and 39 officers of corresponding rank in the Navy and the Marine Corps. And, in all services, there were many outstanding commanders in the rank of colonel, or Navy captain, or below.

New York leadership started at the very top—with the Commander in Chief—with a man whom history will acclaim as the greatest national wartime ruler of the ages—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

And your State furnished Stimson, Forrestal, and Patterson—three men whose wise planning, single-minded patriotism, and unwavering determination and moral courage throughout the conflict entitles them to a large share of credit for our successful wartime effort.

In the armed services themselves you had Gen. Mark Clark, who—unjustified attacks to the contrary notwithstanding—conducted one of the most courageous and one of the most successful campaigns in the history of modern war. Then there was intrepid "Young Teddy" Roosevelt—and also Admirals Blandy, Horne, and Wilson, who played such prominent parts in the splendid record of the Navy.

And New York gave to the Army "Wild Bill" Donovan, famous leader of the Fighting Sixty-ninth in the First World War, who in this war organized and conducted so skillfully the Office of Strategic Services—and Gen. Leslie Groves, under whose leadership the atomic bomb was developed in time to hurry to conclusion the war in the Far East—and Charles P. Gross, who accomplished what seemed impossible in carrying out the greatest army transportation plan of all time.

I wish time permitted me to mention many more New York leaders. I hate to omit a single one.

But may I return to the subject of New Yorkers who fought on the field of battle? More than 28,000 of your young men were killed in action and 10,000 others died in the armed forces while rendering other services. The number of Americans—from all States—killed in battle in this war was four times as great as in all other wars against foreign enemies—and New York had its full share of such losses.

For the first time in American history, the percentage of casualties was higher among officers than it was among the enlisted men and, as a general rule, the percentage increased with the higher ranks. It was because American officers were taught—and were required—in World War II, to lead their men on the battlefield, and not just to follow them.

Your combat men and officers—living and dead—are the heroes whose accomplishments and whose sacrifices transcend those of all others in the war. They wrote some of the brightest pages in all of the great history of this great State.

There is no yardstick for personal danger—no measuring rod for physical courage—no equivalent for either of these, in money or in goods or in anything material. Nor is there any human satisfaction quite like the spiritual reward—the proud feeling of accomplishment—which comes to a man who, in a noble cause, has met danger and overcome it.

No rank, no pay, no fortune, no office, can supply the phrase, "heroism above and beyond the call of duty," or the phrases "gallantry in action," or "unwavering courage in the face of imminent danger"—all words of Army and Navy citations for heroic conduct in battle.

New Yorkers won their share of citations and decorations in the armed services. The gallantry of New Yorkers is referred to in general orders published in every theater of operations. For them "uncommon valor was a common virtue." The rarely won Congressional Medal of Honor, the highest award for gallantry in action, was awarded to 34 New Yorkers in the Army, Navy, and Marines.

I would that I could read the citation of every one of these winners of the Congressional Medal, as well as of the winners of the Distinguished Service Cross and other decorations for bravery. All of these boys—and their families—deserve to have these citations read again and again. But may I—as typical of the New York courage—give you briefly the story of two New Yorkers of the One Hundred and Fifth Infantry of the Twenty-seventh Division at Saipan in July 1944, both winners of the Medal of Honor.

The Japs staged a banzai attack. Sergeant Thomas Baker was wounded. He refused to let himself be evacuated because he felt it would expose first-aid men to needless danger. "Give me a pistol, eight rounds of ammunition, and some cigarettes, and set me beneath that tree," Sergeant Baker told his men.

They left him sitting, calmly smoking his cigarette, and pointing his pistol in the direction of the oncoming Japs.

They found him later, slumped under the tree in death. His pistol was empty, his ammunition was gone. And there were eight Japs lying dead in front of him.

At the other end of the line, a battalion commander, Lt. Col. William J. O'Brien, had also been wounded. He dragged himself to a jeep which had a machine gun on it. As the insane Japanese charged, Colonel O'Brien calmly continued to fire his machine gun. His men also found him dead—with 20 Japanese lying around him.

These and others like them have passed on to another world. But they still remain an inspiration—and a challenge—to you and to succeeding generations of New York young men and women. They continue a symbol of New York's fighting courage.

We must never forget our combat veterans. But, without forgetting them, we must also know that New York's contribution to the war did not stop with combat troops alone—did not stop with men in uniform alone. World War II was truly an all-American war. The vicarious—as well as the precarious—warrior played a not-to-be-forgotten part.

Your noncombat soldiers did hard and essential work—work which often was not free from danger of attack. Your civilian leaders—your two Senators—your Congressmen, with few exceptions—fully supported the war effort. Your whole people led the Nation in contributions to war chests, in bond subscriptions, in nearly every phase of the war effort.

New York industry—both management and labor—rendered a service without which the achievement of victory as quickly, or without many more casualties, would have been difficult, if not impossible.

The Army and Navy "E" was the highest recognition given by the armed services for the achievements of war industry. Not only was it awarded to the companies themselves, but with each award recognition was given to the workers—workers who played such an important part in the Nation's victory. In the State of New York, 1,461 Army and Navy "E's" were awarded to plants—by far the greatest number awarded in any State in this Nation.

That is a brief glimpse of New York's great contribution to American victory in World War II. It was not only a quantitative contribution. It was a qualitative one, preeminently great in physical courage and stamina—in patriotism and the spirit of service—in ingenuity and in resourcefulness—in leadership and realism.

New York's part—the Nation's part—in the greatest of American accomplishments, points the way to peacetime possibilities and peacetime progress for your State and your Nation. The qualities needed to win this war are the same qualities which are needed to hold the peace and to realize therefrom the maximum benefits for our American Government and our American way of life.

New York's record gives it an opportunity, and at the same time a responsibility. You can—and it is your duty to—provide both leadership and "followship" in the full development of our national life. This organization represented here tonight is admirably qualified to help in seeing that the principles, the patriotism, the cooperation, the abilities developed in war are applied in peace.

Yours is a partisan organization. I am a partisan. But, in peace as well as in war, the welfare of the Nation must come first, and we must not let partisanship dim this main objective. Republicans and Democrats alike fought this war. Both were chosen by President Roosevelt to lead in our military and economic life. President Truman has followed the same course in dealing with our difficult problems of reconversion.

But, if we subordinate partisanship to the national interest, we have a right to ask others to do likewise—to ask it, even if we do not expect it. And today we cannot expect too much. The demolitionists are on the loose.

The Monday morning political quarterbacks are so busy telling us the mistakes we have made that they seem to forget that America did not lose this war, but won it—won it in spite of great disadvantages—won it and, at the same time, kept our domestic condition immeasurably better than that of any other major nation which participated in the war.

I remember the story of the Brooklyn Bridge—designed by great engineers and constructed by great builders. Before it was built, and while it was being built, there were hundreds of self-appointed "experts," who first said it could not be done, and then said it was not being done properly or safely.

And after it was completed and in use, the comments ranged from prophecies that the bridge would crash and throw hundreds into the river, to complaints against the exact shade of paint used on the lower part of the end structures.

Well, the Brooklyn Bridge is still standing, after 63 years, and it has carried more than 4,250,000,000 people between the boroughs of America's greatest city. The names of its engineers and its builders are written high in the histories of their respective professions. But no one remembers or wants to remember, the names of the carping prophets of failure and doom.

The partisan and political critic of today does not want to think about the greatness of America's accomplishment in recent years. He wants to direct attention to relatively petty faults which he asserts have been made.

It is often interesting to look at some of the earlier assertions made—and some of the positions taken—by such a critic. You are likely to find that he was opposed to the original Selective Service Act—was even opposed to its extension on the very eve of war—or that he fought the repeal of the Neutrality Act, or that he ridiculed plans and preparations for war mobilization—that he particularly ridiculed the prophecy that we would need—and actually produced more than 50,000 war planes.

Fortunately, these men were not in authority during the war. We could not have won battles under their leadership and with their counsel. We could not have supplied our Army on any plan which they would have formulated. And today, under their guidance, we would flounder in a morass of defeatism and failure.

The critics I speak of are the partisan critics, whose purposes—as well as the criticisms themselves—are destructive; the class who say "There ought to be a law," but either propose no law or propose one which the critics themselves do not expect to be passed, or one which has a purely selfish or demagogic appeal.

In most of my speeches during the last 7 months I have said that the War Department and the Army welcome sincere and constructive criticism, based on facts. We are more anxious than anyone else to have the best army possible, and we have taken the lead in study and action to the end—based on our experiences in World War II.

And we realize that many citizens know facts or have ideas that will help us to improve our department. Freedom of thought and expression is one of the greatnesses of America—particularly as such freedom of expression relates to the conduct of Government. This is fully recognized—in the principle and in practice—by the leaders of our armed forces, and by our national leaders.

But there is a difference between destructive and constructive criticism. This difference is well illustrated by contrasting the numerous partisan critics of today with a wartime group of distinguished citizens—the chairman and members of the Senate Committee to Study the Progress of the National War Effort—better known as the Truman committee of 1941—the Mead committee of today.

After this committee was constituted Senator Truman stated that its objective was to make investigations while the war was in progress so that errors could be corrected, rather than to act after the war was ended, as was the case with other committees after the war of 1917-18.

During the past 5 years the War Department has not always agreed with conclusions of the Truman-Mead committee. The members of that committee were human—and sometimes later events proved that they were wrong. But much more often they were right. And whether right or wrong, their comments and their criticisms were constructive, and intended to be constructive.

The committee did not lose its perspective. It did not forget the greatness of America's war accomplishments. On the contrary, it specifically recognized them again and again, in the unanimous reports of all of its members, regardless of party affiliation.

There can be no doubt, and the Army is glad to proclaim, that the services of this committee were of value to the armed forces and to the Nation, of value in helping the correction of some evils, and in avoiding others. The committee's work was an integral part, a constructive part, of America's victorious war effort.

This committee and all its members, Republicans and Democrats alike, deserve the appreciation and commendation of their country. The leader of the committee for the past 2 years—your own Senator JAMES M. MEAD—is entitled to great credit for his continuance of the committee's purposes and for his splendid combination of diligence and fairness.

But most of all—and with no disparagement of other committee members—I pay the highest tribute to the first chairman of this committee, who charted its course, who led it during the trying days of war expansion, and who, in all his actions, displayed the judgment, the soundness, the fairness, which is so typical of his service as Senator, and of his service now as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as President of the United States.

One more word about the criticism of the armed services. We recognize that there have been imperfections in the conduct of the war. There must necessarily have been many in such a large and uncertain undertaking. But we are convinced that percentagewise it is small, and that their nature is trifling as compared to the great victory our Nation achieved.

Even the trifling and the few, however, call for remedies. The American people have a right to expect that the lessons learned by the armed forces in wartime—and the faults then developed—should be faced frankly, and that corrective measures should be taken promptly. But in looking for faults, the Nation and this State must not lessen their pride in our great victory, must not fail to capitalize on what we have discovered about our abilities and our possibilities.

With the world situation as it is today, faced with the present problem of national defense and of domestic economy, the military is dependent, the Nation is dependent, as never before, upon the understanding, the constructive criticism, the interest, and the continued support of all of our people, and particularly of the leaders in all our businesses, professions, and occupations.

As influential citizens of a State which has made in war an unsurpassed record of courage, of stamina, of patriotism, of realism, you have a heritage of leadership—a leadership which you can exercise individually or through an organization.

On behalf of the armed services, on behalf of our Nation, I would urge you to carry forward the principles for which we fought and to perpetuate the principles and practices and abilities with which we fought, to show your pride in what you and other New Yorkers have done, show it by doing even more in these days of peace, more for your State and more for America.

Not Until Russia Changes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 26, 1946:

NOT UNTIL RUSSIA CHANGES

The outbursts in the Russian press against America's offer to internationalize the atomic bomb should be an eye opener to those head-in-the-sand Americans who will not see the situation as it exists.

This country offered more than it should in the Baruch proposal to the United Nations atomic commission. The most it should have proposed to do was to make available, as a part of our contribution to the United Nations military force, atomic bombs manufactured by us. Instead, Baruch went ahead and provided for the gradual disclosure of the secret.

Because this country did specify safeguards—with commitments not to abuse the use of atomic energy and inspection to see that the commitments were carried out—we are attacked by Pravda as a Nation striving for world rule.

When the spokesmen for any nation are willing to twist things like that, you cannot do business with that country. We found this out once before in connection with a very sad case in Europe.

What is the answer? Keep the atomic bomb as our secret. Keep it in the interest of world peace and, frankly, for protection to ourselves. When Russia changes, that will be time enough to talk about sharing the secret.

Aid to Veterans and Aged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am including some remarks with reference to the aged and housing of veterans, together with a statement from the Daily Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio:

WEICHEL OFFERS NEW HOUSING PLAN

WASHINGTON, June 15, 1946.—Representative ALVIN F. WEICHEL, Republican, of Ohio's Thirteenth District, called upon the Government today to relax old-age pension restrictions to allow elderly persons to share their homes with veterans. Asserting that many plans have been advanced to ease the housing shortage, the Sandusky Congressman said his plan represented "an untapped source of housing not heretofore generally known."

He said: "I am speaking particularly with reference to thousands of homes throughout the country partly occupied by aged persons who would gladly rent all or part of their homes to veterans.

"However, it seems they are handicapped by regulations whereby they are not allowed to rent these homes to supplement their meager old-age pensions. If these regulations were lifted and the worthy aged people permitted to rent these homes to veterans, it would materially provide additional housing."

WEICHEL told Congress that he was asking Governor Lausche to investigate the possibility of such action in Ohio. The Congressman inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Monroeville Spectator stating that 15,000 such potential homes are available in Ohio.

[From the Bowling Green (Ohio) Daily Sentinel-Tribune]

HOUSING FOR VETERANS

Congressman WEICHEL is certainly active in aiding veterans.

His recent suggestion that old-age pensioners be permitted to share their homes with returning soldiers without losing any of their pensions is good. There are, it is estimated, 15,000 such homes available in Ohio.

Mr. WEICHEL also has been active in helping to get more housing facilities at Bowling Green State University, 100 family dwelling units being the last.

Exit From a Blind Alley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the third of a series of articles by Mr. Walter Lippmann in the Washington Post on June 25, 1946, on Mr. Baruch's proposal to the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy:

TODAY AND TOMORROW
(By Walter Lippmann)
EXIT FROM A BLIND ALLEY

Mr. Baruch's remarks on the veto contain an important sentence of which the idea and the key word repeat, and are perhaps an echo from a sentence in the Federalist Papers (No. 15).

In discussing the weakness of the United Nations Charter where it deals with the enforcement of international agreements, Mr. Baruch said that "the Charter permits penalization only by concurrence of each of the five great powers."

Alexander Hamilton, in discussing "the insufficiency of the present Confederation to the preservation of the Union," wrote that "in our case the concurrence of 13 distinct wills is requisite * * * to the complete execution of every important measure."

But there the agreement ends between Hamilton's treatment of this fundamental problem and Mr. Baruch's, for Mr. Baruch, who cannot recently have read the Federalist in preparing himself for his great task, has allowed and encouraged his American supporters to demand the very solution which Hamilton and the founding fathers considered thoroughly debated, exhaustively, and rejected. It is the notion that since it is exceedingly difficult to get sovereign states to concur, to act unanimously, not to veto agreement, the remedy lies in abolishing the veto power and substituting majority rule.

This is for the moment a popular notion in this country. But that is only because it appears to be a short and simple way of dealing with the Russians. Yet for the reason so cogently expounded in the Federalist papers, it will not prove to be a successful method. Majority rule is a great principle for deciding issues among individual voters. It is an impossible device for deciding serious issues among powerful sovereign states. For the decisions of a majority of citizens can be enforced by arresting and punishing individuals who violate the laws made by the majority. But the decisions of a majority of governments can be enforced only by war. Since this punishment, namely war, is as punishing to the law-abiding as to the law-breaking states, it will be applied so rarely and so reluctantly that it cannot be counted upon. "It is not probable, considering the genius of this country," said Hamilton (Federalist No. 16), "that the complying states would often be inclined to support the authority of the Union by engaging in a war against the noncomplying states."

Mr. Baruch's treatment of the veto has taken this country—which has the responsibility of leadership in the field of atomic energy—up a blind alley. Somehow it will be necessary to retrace our steps, taking as our guide the deep political wisdom of the men who did in fact solve the problem of the veto power among the sovereign American States. They have taught us that the veto cannot be removed by substituting the majority rule of governments but that it can be superseded as general laws are enacted.

We cannot afford to misunderstand this problem. For on the right solution of it may well hang our hope of peace and an ordered world. The Russians have used the veto so often, and so tactlessly, and so recklessly that they have prejudiced a clear understanding of the real problem. Yet the fact of the matter is that the veto can be used only before there is an accepted and clearly defined law on a subject. Once there is a law, the veto cannot be invoked to repeal it. Once there is a law that says who is to enforce it, before what tribunal cases under it are to be heard, by what tribunal it is to be construed, by what institution it may be amended, there is no veto power left in matters which that law deals with.

So it is through the enactment of laws, and in no other way, that the veto problem can be solved. That is the reason why Mr. Gromyko's contribution opens up such an immense opportunity for creative and constructive statesmanship. Let us not look his gift horse in the mouth. Let us have the magnanimity to welcome it and then ride it, recognizing that it is not an alternative to our own proposals but that it is capable of being made into the necessary and imposing framework and support of our own proposals.

The Soviet Union has argued that the production, use, and possession of atomic weapons be made "a serious crime"—that is to say a punishable crime—not only under international law but under the national laws of every ratifying state. Our own proposal, though it goes much further and more radically into the problem of atomic energy, is nevertheless in law identical with the Russian, in that we, too, wish to make it a punishable crime for any government or any private person to make, use, or own an atomic weapon.

In my previous article on this subject I supposed that under our plan the international authority might be permitted to make, use, and own atomic weapons and that this constituted an important difference between the American and the Russian proposals. But I have since been advised that the American plan, like the Russian, contemplates the total outlawry of atomic weapons. So we are in complete agreement with the Russians that the national and private traffic in atomic weapons shall be outlawed as a criminal offense.

It was a grave weakness in our proposals that we offered Mr. Baruch's unconsidered remarks about the veto instead of offering the project of a system of law. But the remedy is at hand.

Assuming Mr. Gromyko's proposal had been thoroughly worked out, that international and national laws had been enacted in every industrial country, what would be the situation if we discovered by one means and another—by international inspections or by the secret agents that all countries will certainly employ where the stakes are life and death—that atomic weapons were being made secretly in the interior of Siberia? Could the Soviet Government veto an inquiry and a hearing on a charge that the world law and its own Soviet law were being violated? If the law were explicit, the Soviet Government could not, I contend, veto the inquiry and hearing.

It could obstruct. It could resist. But that would not be the veto; that would be rebellion and secession. The veto, we must realize, is a legal right which restrains the majority only as long as they are legally bound to respect this legal right. But if Russia refused to let the law of atomic energy be enforced, Russia would have placed herself beyond the pale of the law. She would have destroyed the legal basis of her veto, and there would be no further legal or moral restraint on the other nations if they thought it advisable to go to war.

Yet our objective is not to find ways of going to war. A great advantage in this approach to this difficult problem is that it keeps open a way by which a great power, which has perhaps begun to cheat and has been caught, can without loss of face return to the straight and narrow path. It can treat the violation as an offense against its own laws by overzealous or ignorant persons. Thus the legal approach not only authorizes law enforcement but facilitates law observance.

It has been said that all this is nothing but the old Kellog Pact which outlawed war just before the greatest war of all time broke out. But this is not the Kellogg Pact pure and simple. This is the Kellogg Pact plus the epoch-making precedent which, under Mr. Justice Jackson's leadership, the United Nations are now setting at Nuremberg. The Russians have subscribed to the Nuremberg precedent by participating in setting it, and their proposal must be read with this in mind.

It may then be taken to mean that the heads of states and responsible officials and all scientists and technicians who conspire to violate the law on atomic energy would like Goering et al. at Nuremberg, be subject to arrest and indictment, to trial and punishment, wherever and whenever they fall into the hands of the agents of any law-abiding state.

If it is necessary to make war in order to arrest them, that, and not the conquest or destruction of nations, will then be the limited and exact objective of righteous war. This alone will not prevent war. There is much more to be done. But it would make the next war—if, God forbid, it comes—not a war of peoples but an undertaking to enforce the agreed law of mankind.

Landlords Still Forgotten

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 26, 1946:

LANDLORDS STILL FORGOTTEN

When Congress finishes with OPA, the saved pieces will be small—except for one. Rent controls will remain as before. The owner of residence rental property in the areas designated for control, who has had no general relief these last few years, will still have no relief. With prices bound to soar in a hundred directions, the landlord will still have to stick it out. With everybody else getting at least a bit more leeway, the owner of a flat or apartment house will continue the forgotten man.

There is serious injustice in this. It is unfortunate, of course, that Congress insists on opening the floodgates at all at this time, but, if it is to open them for everybody except the rental house owner, it is perpetuating a situation which was already getting difficult.

There have always been areas in which property owners could charge any rents they pleased—areas where there was not felt to be a housing emergency in the war period. The owners of business property have also been privileged to do as they pleased about rents. Rents in these fields will naturally rise as the inflation progresses.

The house owner in most cities will, however, still get the same old rent unless he can make a special case with the OPA. This will, of course, mean further sales of rental properties to families who will pay the price to get assured shelter and a further withdrawal of units available to the man who must rent if he is to have shelter at all.

FBI Graduates Hear Francis Cardinal Spellman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning the graduation exercises of the National Academy of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which took place this morning, I include the introduction of the Director, J. Edgar Hoover, and the address of His Eminence Francis Cardinal Spellman. Fittingly, his eminence refers to the letters FBI—Faithful, brave, intelligent Americans. The Inter-Departmental Auditorium was crowded and the attention of the occasion was such as to encourage a devoted leader on a timely subject. The applause at the conclusion gave proper evidence of wholehearted approval.

INTRODUCTION BY DIRECTOR J. EDGAR HOOVER

Director HOOVER. Our next speaker is a native of Massachusetts. He entered the priesthood in 1916 and his long career has been honored by repeated elevations in the church. During this war he visited practically every battle front of the world as a military vicar and this year was elevated to the College of Cardinals. He has been a vigorous champion of democracy and a foe of all 'isms" except Americanism. I know of no description that fits him better than those Scriptural words "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" It is a pleasure to present His Eminence Francis Cardinal Spellman.

ADDRESS OF HIS EMINENCE, FRANCIS CARDINAL SPELLMAN

Mr. Hoover and my fellow Americans, the rising waves of crime today are nearly as threatening to American security and treacherous to her freedom as are the waves of war, and, as the men of the Federal Bureau of Investigation fight fearlessly to protect our Nation against crime, they also help to protect our country from the dangers of another war. Wisdom to avert war is more priceless and powerful than any of war's weapons and no men in any branch of the American Government more effectively exemplify and more efficiently enforce this principle than the members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Both in war and in peace they make a vital contribution to American democracy in detecting and preventing crime, in preventing and winning wars, and in keeping peace.

I believe that all informed, patriotic Americans take courage from their confidence in the integrity and competency of our law-enforcement agencies under the leadership of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. And you who today are finishing your courses in this national academy have the high honor and sacred responsibility to take your places with other graduates of this West Point of law enforcement and to carry on your important duties in the traditions created by your distinguished chief, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover.

The trust of the American people in your fidelity and vigilance is at once a compliment and a challenge, and in these days of chaotic crises while mankind is still engulfed in war-heated hatreds, lusts, and bigotries, honors can be weighed only in terms of opportunity to serve. And no greater opportunity to serve is given to Americans than to you, for you are the guardians of good government, defenders of democracy, protectors of the patriot, and champions of the common good—enemies only to the enemies of our country, the enemies of law and order. Loyalty to country and service in the cause of justice are your guideposts as you wage war against crime, war against war, and these, too, must be the standards of every true American if our United States is to endure!

The contagion of war's irrationality and violence has spread with fatal fury, and crime of all kinds has alarmingly increased. It is everyone's responsibility to check this contagion, to prevent and to correct the misuses of human freedom which constitute crime. Parents, teachers, and we of the clergy have particular responsibilities to give good example, to instruct and guide in the proper use of human freedom, and you of your profession are among those entrusted with the charge to prevent and correct abuses of freedom. Other countries long have had their secret police forces, and each of these, according to the concepts of its leaders and its purposes, has served to promote or destroy the welfare of the Nation and its people. In the totalitarian regimes it is traditional that secret police are instruments of terror and oppression, feared and despised. In these United States our law-enforcement agencies are a source of reassurance and tranquillity to our peace-loving people, a source of terror only to the lawless and subversive, and you in a special dedication, are pledged to the protection and defense of our country and her law-abiding citizens, as you constitute the ramparts of America's protection and peace.

Today men talk of the great and grave dangers threatening America, but I believe that the greatest danger is the terrible tragedy that we may fail to remain fundamentally these United States. To help save America you must constantly and loyally labor to unmask traitors who give lip-loyalty to the language of democracy while anarchy and tyranny seethe in their hearts. Here in our beloved Nation there are men and groups of men fanatically and frantically active, striving to array man against man, class against class, creed against creed, and nation against nation. And men of principle and patriotism must courageously guard our country and ourselves against those who, in hypocrisy, wear the garments of democracy's defenders but in truth are enemies of the people's sacred rights and freedoms. All of us must guard America and ourselves against injustices, against hatreds, greeds, and bigotry, for they are the seeds from which sprung the curse of the world's worst war and which sown again will toll the end of civilization. It is the duty of each one of us, of every true, loyal American, to protect our cherished American inheritance and institutions, thus to help maintain and secure peace and salvage civilization. In this tremendous struggle, in the accomplishment of this essential task, in this war against error, crime and sin, you are in the vanguard.

FBI, faithful, brave, intelligent Americans, inspire us with your lives and leadership to do our utmost to protect the glorious heritage of our Republic, to preserve our democratic institutions and obey the challenge and command of our martyred dead. Save our country; live in peace! The death of our beloved sons has been a soul-stirring tragedy, but this tragedy can be their glory and our blessing if in weakness we do not permit our dead to be betrayed, our strength to be dispersed, our unity to be destroyed and, which God avert, perhaps once more enmeshed in murderous war! We must use the weapons of wisdom, the sword of the spirit, the powers of the soul, as well as the physical resources of our land if we are to be faithful to our responsibility to our soldier dead and to generations of Americans yet unborn. Stubborn men, fearful of each morrow, must awaken to the simple, ageless truth that the roots of peace are grounded in God alone. For only when God lives within the depths of each man's heart will the cruel grow merciful and just, the bigot change his fierce, foul hates to tolerance and love, the lustful shed his pride and greed, and each man be a friend to all, the foe of none, and humbly live God's plan. Then only will the grandeur of God's peace penetrate the world!

Yes; guilty of the betrayal of our beloved dead and our America we shall be, if, still in the wake of war, we do not learn to trust and pray to God and follow Him. His grace and power will strengthen us against ungodly gusts of greeds that have swept like scythes across the world and left it bruised, and bereft of all things human and humane. It is your great honor and great privilege, graduates of today, to pledge yourselves to America, and thus keep faith and emulate a million fearless fighters who gave their lives that we, the living Americans, may live our lives in peace.

O God of Peace, we thank Thee that the clouds of war have lifted, we pray Thee that the peace that has come may be Thy peace, Thy peace, which alone is our good, a peace in obedience to Thy laws. Thou hast called us to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to defend man's rights, and God's rights. To that service we pledge ourselves and we ask Thee to make us worthy of Thy trust in us by our trust in Thee.

Federal Old-Age Security Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report:

REPORT TO SUPPORTERS OF FEDERAL OLD-AGE SECURITY ON H. R. 2229 AND H. R. 2230

The undersigned, a committee appointed by the supporters of old-age security, at a meeting held yesterday, June 26, 1946, submit the following report:

Soon after convening of the Seventy-ninth Congress, supporters of the Townsend National Recovery Plan met and organized, selecting PAT CANNON from the Fourth Congressional District of Florida, and HOMER D. ANGELL of the Third Congressional District of Oregon to act as chairmen of the steering committee. Soon thereafter the text of the proposed legislation to be introduced was fully considered and final form approved, and Representatives CANNON and ANGELL were asked to introduce companion bills in following out the nonpartisan support of this legislation. Thereupon H. R. 2229 and H. R. 2230 were introduced. Subsequently many meetings of this group were held at the call of the chairmen, with the Washington representatives of the Townsend organization, including Dr. Townsend. It was determined that the best procedure to follow was to marshall all support possible for a petition to the Ways and Means Committee urging the committee to grant a full hearing on the legislation and report out a bill. This was done and 87 Representatives signed the petition as a result of which the hearing was granted and took place on April 15, 1946.

In the meantime the steering committee and the Townsend representatives arranged for all witnesses who desire to be heard in support of this legislation to have that opportunity. As a result a large number of Congressmen as well as laymen were heard and the report has now been printed, being part IV of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on social-security legislation. It consists of pages 637 to 769. The Ways and Means Committee is still engaged in executive sessions and no report has been made on the Townsend legislation. In conjunction with the Townsend representatives, the steering committee decided that it was better procedure to follow this course than to file a petition to take the bills from the committee, as was done last year without success.

As evidenced by this hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, the Townsend supporters in the Congress have been vigilant and active in doing everything possible to bring about the enactment of this legislation. Unfortunately there is not a sufficient number of Representatives in the House to take this legislation from the committee by the petition method and secure its adoption. Until there is a sufficient number, it is the feeling of your committee that the most effective procedure is to continue our educational program here in Congress, and particularly in the congressional districts in order to secure a greater number of old-age security adherents in the Congress. In the meantime we urge that every Member supporting this legislation take steps to secure an open rule on the social-security legislation in order that when it is brought to the floor the Townsend bill may be offered as an amendment. We urge the strongest possible opposition to a closed rule.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM S. HILL,
Colorado, Second District.
GEORGE E. OUTLAND,
California, Eleventh District.
MICHAEL J. KIRWAN,
Ohio, Nineteenth District.
HOMER D. ANGELL,
Oregon, Third District.

TO HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, CHAIRMAN, AND THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

We, the undersigned, respectfully request your committee to grant a hearing at the earliest opportune time to the proponents of H. R. 2229 and H. R. 2230, which are companion bills and have for their purpose the granting of certain Federal relief to citizens 60 years of age and over. We also request that one of these bills be reported to the House by the committee so that the membership may have an opportunity to vote thereon.

Resolution of Wyoming Valley (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution from the Wyoming Valley Chamber of Commerce, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.:

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Wyoming Valley Chamber of Commerce, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., that the Federal Government is about to dispose of its so-called Big Inch and Little Inch pipe lines, constructed during the late war for transportation of crude oil to the refineries on the eastern seaboard, and that said pipe lines extend from the Texas oil and gas fields to terminals on the eastern seaboard with facilities for branch pipe lines to municipalities in the Middle Atlantic States, and

Whereas said pipe lines are adaptable for the transportation of natural gas and if put to such use would be in direct competition with anthracite coal in the market area of anthracite: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this body go on record as opposed to any use of said pipe lines, or sale by the Federal Government, for the transportation of natural gas, for the reason that competition between natural gas and anthracite in the Middle Atlantic States would result in a further shrinkage of anthracite sales with a corresponding depressing effect upon the general welfare of this community. And, be it further

Resolved, That communities in the anthracite producing counties of Pennsylvania be informed of our action and copies of this resolution be transmitted to Senators JOSEPH F. GUFFEY and FRANCIS J. MYERS and Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD.

F. MUELLER, President.

The Spirit of 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, contemplating the approach of another Independence Day, I desire to share with all lovers of Jefferson and free government some impressive lines which have come to me from the poetic pen of Capt. James Patrick McGovern, a veteran of the First World War, and a distinguished member of the bar of the District of Columbia. The depth of thought of his sonnet, entitled "The Spirit of 1946," has moved me to such an extent that I am prompted, from a sense of duty to my colleagues and my fellow citizens, to offer this splendid poem for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The verse reads as follows:

THE SPIRIT OF 1946

A Jefferson who fought with flaming pen
In peace as well as war for humankind,
And who for duty as for freedom signed
His life's blood in the crying cause of men—
We have a mortal need for now, today,
When martyrdom on battlefield remains,
But statesmanship at council tables wanes
And the white fire of truth is slow to sway.
Let us have Jeffersons whose balanced scales
Give every man as man his free-born due,
But grant no privileges for a chosen few.
Remember Jefferson before whom quails
Each one unmindful of our country's fate
When liberty turns license in the state.

—James Patrick McGovern.

OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on Friday evening, June 28, 1946, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, former President of the United States and now honorary chairman of the President's Famine Committee, at the invitation of the Canadian Government, made a notable address in Ottawa, Canada, in which he reported on his food mission throughout the world to 38 different nations.

This address is a summary of world food conditions—a matter of vital interest to all of us—and I ask unanimous consent for its insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT ON THE WORLD FAMINE

(Address by Herbert Hoover at the invitation of the Canadian Government, Ottawa, Canada, June 28, 1946)

Mr. Prime Minister, I have been honored by your invitation to make from Canada the final report upon my food mission to 38 nations. I am glad for this privilege. It gives to me the opportunity to pay tribute to the magnificent service Canada has been to the world. To Canada flows the gratitude of hundreds of millions of human beings who have been saved from starvation through the efforts of this great Commonwealth of the North.

Upon four nations—Canada, the United States, the Argentine, and Australia—has fallen 90 percent of the overseas burden of relief to this, the greatest famine in all human history. Over 10,000,000 tons of food have been shipped to the 800,000,00 people short of food since this famine became acute. Canada has provided over one-fifth of this supply. Without this gigantic flow of overseas food, hundreds of millions would have died and other hundreds of millions would have survived only as permanent physical wrecks. And when we use this impersonal word "people," let us not forget that most of them are women and children. Far beyond our humanitarian responsibilities lay the necessity to save the political and social structure of the world from sinking into a chaos in which recovery and the making of peace would be impossible.

We can see the future more clearly if for a moment we look back over our months of effort to drive the wolf from the door of the world.

CAUSES OF THIS CRISIS

This crisis, of course, had its roots in the degeneration of agriculture and manpower in the war-torn areas. But to this was added the plunder by armies of several million tons of food out of the last harvests in Germany, eastern Europe, and Manchuria. The crisis was further aggravated by the large feeding of bread grains to animals in the earlier months of the harvest year. But on top of all these disasters has been the unparalleled coincidence of five great droughts—in the western Mediterranean, India, China, South Africa, and a partial failure in crops in the Argentine.

The full realization of the impending calamity came early in March.

TWO SEPARATE PROBLEMS

At once it was evident that there were two quite different problems.

The first was the months of acute crisis until the arrival of the Northern Hemisphere harvests which come in from July to September and thus renew the depleted world larder.

The second is the problem of better organization over the year following the present harvest. My immediate concern was naturally limited to the crisis months. It is essential that this dual nature of the problem be borne in mind, otherwise the issues become confused and the cure chaotic.

In pursuance of President Truman's wishes, I have traveled some 50,000 miles visiting all of the important famine and food-deficit areas in the world and all of the major food-surplus areas, excepting South Africa and Australia. I have discussed crops, animals, calories, rations, stocks, ships, railroads, supplies, and hunger with the Presidents, the Prime Ministers, the food officials of each of these nations.

Without any special authority my function has been mostly advisory—or perhaps persuasive would be a better word. Certainly I am deeply indebted for the most extraordinary welcome and cooperation accorded to me and my associates.

THE APPARENT GAP IN FOOD SUPPLIES LAST MARCH

When the potential dangers were realized 4 months ago, the Combined Food Board estimated that there was an 11,000,000-ton gap in the necessary amounts of cereals to meet the minimum demands of hungry nations—and a similar appalling shortage in fats and other foods. With this gap facing us it did not seem possible to prevent mass starvation. I felt compelled to say publicly at that time, "Our task is now to minimize the loss of life."

THE GAP IN FOOD SUPPLIES REDUCED

On my return from Europe and Asia a month ago, my colleagues and I felt assured that as of May 1 the gap in the bare subsistence supply of cereals had been reduced from 11,000,000 tons to about 3,600,000 tons, with a corresponding reduction in the gaps of fats and other essentials. This reduction was due to the development of new sources of supplies; to substitutions; to the success of our appeal for self-denial in the surplus-food countries. The reduction of the gap was due especially to the willing acceptance in the food-deficit countries of drastic curtailment of their requested import programs. It meant for some of them drastic regimes of bare subsistence.

Our determination has been to hold the lowest of them up to a level of 1,500 to 1,700 calories per person per day. If we could hold these levels it would at least prevent mass starvation. But even this drastic program was endangered by that tragic gap of 3,600,000 tons. If it could not be overcome, we were defeated.

THE GAP IN SUPPLIES HAS BEEN MET

But something like the widow's cruise is happening. In this 2 months since those estimates the world has developed even further additions to world supplies. The Latin-American states have greatly reduced their import requirements during the crisis months. Especially the Argentine is greatly expanding its contribution of supplies. The other Latin-American states are giving aid. The British Government has reduced its pipe-line supplies. Larger diversions have been made in India from the surplus provinces to the famine areas. The conservation measures in Canada and the United States are contributing even more largely to our potential exports. The United States harvest has arrived earlier than usual.

From all these gains I am happy to announce to you that it now seems assured that the tragic gap of about 3,600,000 tons in minimum supplies with which we were haunted 2 months ago can now be closed. I am humbly grateful to be the one to make this announcement.

But it cannot be emphasized too strongly that this ultimate victory over mass starvation is based upon three assumptions:

First, that the drastic food regimes in the food-deficit countries will be continued during the crisis months until the danger is absolutely over.

Second, that the people in the food-surplus countries continue their sacrifice in the consumption of wheat and fats during the remaining few months of the crisis.

Third, that supplies be shipped overseas in an uninterrupted stream over this period.

The precariousness of the situation is not over. Scarcely any of the major food-deficit areas have stocks of as much as 30 days overseas food even on the basis of their much reduced living. If we fail in shipments, mass starvation will be instantly upon us.

DANGER OF MASS STARVATION PASSED EXCEPT IN CHINA

It is at least reassuring that if we have continued cooperative action of the various nations, mass starvation will be prevented, with one exception. That exception is China, where transportation to the interior and inadequate organization has rendered relief only partially successful.

In other famine areas there will be suffering. We truly need more supplies than just enough to prevent mass starvation. Many of the old people and the weaker children will fall by the wayside, nevertheless the great majority of the endangered will be saved. Beyond this saving of human life, the political and social stability of nations, upon which alone peace can be builded, will be preserved.

WHERE CREDIT IS DUE

For success in preventing mass starvation credit must go to the Combined Food Board, in which Canada plays so important a part. That board has had the stern task of dividing the world's food between nations upon the agreed programs. UNRRA deserves praise in the limited field it covers—that is the 20 percent of the people who cannot finance their food imports. And no tribute can be great enough to the magnificent cooperation of the responsible officials in the 40 nations which have joined in a gigantic effort to save life.

THE PROBLEM OF THE NEXT HARVEST YEAR

My present concern is with the immediate crisis months. But naturally my colleagues and I on this mission have been deeply interested in the food prospects of each nation after the coming harvest. Moreover, hope in the outlook for the next year affects the courage and morale of hungry people to endure for the next few months. More especially is this so as famine has its worse moments just before the new harvest, for then the reserves are gone.

THE PROSPECTS BETTER THAN THE PAST YEAR

I may say at once that I do not take the extreme pessimistic view of the world supplies after the coming harvests that has been expressed in several quarters. We can at least hope there will be no plundering by armies during the next year. We have reason to believe that there will not be five coincident great droughts again in 1 year. In three of these drought areas the harvest prospects are very much improved. For instance, it is already estimated that France and north Africa will require 2,500,000 tons less of food imports than during the past year. With continued favorable weather, we in North America seem destined to abundant harvests again.

It must not, however, be thought that all trouble is over. The war-devastated areas will not have fully recovered their ground crops nor have restored their flocks and herds during the next year. And famine will linger in China and India until November when the rice crops come. The food situation of the world in the next year will not be easy, but next year in my view will not be one of such dreadful crisis and drastic regimes as the one which we are now in.

WORLD ORGANIZATION

To prepare for the next harvest year the United Nations are now setting up the International Emergency Food Council. It will consolidate various world agencies into more effective organization. The selection of one of my colleagues upon this mission—Dr. Dennis FitzGerald—as secretary general is a complete assurance of efficient action.

But there is a further step beyond the present United Nations proposals which the world sorely needs.

THE HOST OF SUBNORMAL CHILDREN

This 1,500- to 1,700-calorie bottom level in many areas is dreadfully hard on children. While it will pull adults through, the kind of food is not the most suitable for children. Disease and mortality among the little ones are ever the sensitive barometers of starvation and poverty. Several nations have done the best they could by giving the children priority in their meager dairy products; some extra food is given in some schools; and the scattered charitable agencies are doing the best they can in limited areas. But in all, they are only touching the fringe of the problem. Millions of mothers are today watching their children wilt before their eyes. The proof of this is an annual mortality rate in many cities as high as 200 per 1,000 among children under 1 year of age. The further proof is that there are somewhere from 20 to 30 million physically subnormal children on the continent of Europe. There are other millions in Asia.

After the First World War, we gave a good extra meal a day of restorative food, to 10,000,000 undernourished children. I deplore that this special aid for children has had no counterpart through a widespread organization set-up after this war. And I repeat that civilization marches forward upon the feet of healthy children. We cannot have recovery of civilization in nations with a legacy of stunted bodies or distorted and embittered minds.

TO REDEEM THE CHILDREN

I would like to suggest that the redemption of these children be organized at once by the newly-created International Emergency Food Council and that all nations be called upon to contribute to its cost. The job could be done with three or four hundred million dollars—a charge beyond any organized private charity but not a great sum from the world as a whole.

Mr. Prime Minister, I have held this statement to sober words. I have not tried to describe the grim visage of famine in action. I have not attempted to express the emotion which every decent human being feels in the presence of the scenes of hunger and sickly children I have witnessed. Nor have I tried to express the sympathy and pride which swells in one's heart for those hundreds of thousands of heroic men and women in the world who are struggling to save these millions of human lives. They labor for their countrymen in villages, in cities, and in the halls of government. They know that hunger is a destroyer far worse than war. Great as its toll of life may be, yet its destruction of morals, of social and political institutions, are infinite.

May I repeat here a statement I have made to men of government in each of these 38 nations?

"The world has ended a bloody and horrible era of killing of even women and children. The jeopardy to mankind by famine gives to us an opportunity to change the energies of the world from killing to saving life. These months can bring the glow of a new faith and a new hope for the dawn of a new era to mankind.

"To succeed is far more than a necessity to economic reconstruction of the world. It is far more than the path to order and peace.

"It marks the return of the lamp of compassion to the earth. And that is part of the moral and spiritual reconstruction of the world."

Diversion of Water From Lake Michigan by City of Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Another Chicago 'Steal'?" published in the Montreal Daily Star of June 12, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

ANOTHER CHICAGO "STEAL"?

Are we about to see a renewal of the controversy which shook the relations between this country and the United States in the early twenties? At that time Illinois declared its intention of diverting larger quantities of water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago drainage canal, and was defeated only by a judgment of the United States Supreme Court. Now the American Senate Foreign Relations Committee has approved an amendment to the proposed St. Lawrence seaway treaty that would give the United States sole discretion as to how much water is to be poured through the drainage canal.

The amendment would have no importance whatever if it did not affect Canadian waterways. The water diverted through the Chicago canal would not flow in that direction at all by natural process. It is water diverted from the Great Lakes, and any volume of water allowed to escape from the Lakes to the Middle West river systems necessarily lowers the level of the Great Lakes and the whole St. Lawrence system. Arbitrary control of this flow by any authority would permit the same authority, if it saw fit, to wreck the whole St. Lawrence system for navigation by diverting increasing amounts of water through Lake Michigan and the Chicago canal.

Fortunately for Canada, the seaway plan cannot go into operation without Canadian consent, and Canadian consent would undoubtedly be withheld so long as this offending amendment remained in the treaty. Chicago, with the support of other Middle Western States, once before tried to "steal" the waters of the Great Lakes, whose sources lie wholly within Canadian territory. It tried to do it then by legal process and was defeated. It should not now be permitted to do by subterfuge what it was denied the right to do legally.

Inequities in Discharge Procedure in the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter dated February 27, 1946, from Ray S. Brogdon to Vice Adm. L. E. Denfeld, Chief, Bureau of Naval Personnel, Washington, D. C., on the subject of inequities in the discharge procedure in the Navy.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EUGENE, OREG., February 27, 1946.

Vice Adm. L. E. DENFELD,
Chief, Bureau of Naval Personnel,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ADMIRAL DENFELD: Having recently been discharged from the naval service, I wish to point out some inequities in the discharge procedures that are causing undue hardships.

By what fair method do you determine that a man with a wife (or other dependent) is entitled to the same number of discharge points as a man with two children? Have you ever tried to maintain a home, a wife and two children on $100 a month, under conditions as they are today? It is an experience you would long remember. The war has been over 6 months. Why not release all men in this category? Believe me, they are suffering undue economic hardship.

At the other extreme are men without dependents who have served as long as 4 years and still awaiting discharge. They are certainly deserving of consideration on the basis of time in service.

Then there are those men in "frozen" ratings who are held for additional time, regardless of their duties. If you can make a case for this policy of discrimination—how does it happen that officers serving as personnel, disbursing, and GSK officers were not also held? I think the answer can be found in a barnacle-covered tradition that sets forth that officers are a kind of supergentlemen that can fill any billet that might be assigned them while enlisted men are a lower form of life that must serve many months to learn an assignment and must be given no other than their rating qualifies them for. As a matter of hard fact, the enlisted man, eligible in all ways for discharge, except for his unfortunate rating, must wait additional months for the opportunity to go home, while his superior officer (the brains of the outfit) takes off for home and discharge.

It cannot be said that separation centers are operating at top speed. For instance the Bremerton separation center is set up to handle 1,000 men a day. Actually they have discharged about 2,000 men a week. That is where many men in yeoman and storekeeper ratings are serving their "penalty" months, twiddling their thumbs, while the rest of the Nation goes on strike for a fair break.

The Constitution sets forth that all men are created free and equal. It would be a nice gesture for the Navy Department to take cognizance of this guaranty with an about-face to equalize the opportunity for its Reserves to be discharged.

Very sincerly yours,

RAY S. BROGDON,

Copy to Senator MORSE, Oregon.

Copy to Congressman ELLSWORTH, Member, House Naval Affairs Committee.

Women in Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an article which I wrote for the August 1946 issue of She—the magazine for the modern woman. The article is entitled "Wanted: More Politics in Women," and it covers a subject which I believe is particularly important, not only to the womenfolk but to the menfolk of our Nation as the November elections approach.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WANTED: MORE POLITICS IN WOMEN

(By Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin)

"Politics bores me stiff; doesn't make sense to me. I'm too busy. Anyway, most politicians are crooks. Politics—Phooey!"

Fewer Jane Citizens talk that way to fewer John Citizens today than at anytime in our history. But there is still too much of such small talk from the neighbor next door and the girl at the next typewriter. Too many Janes, as mothers, still sound off such sentiments to too many Johnny Juniors as they grow up. Partly as a result of such formal and informal "teaching," every student and serviceman poll indicates, unfortunately, that politics is the pet aversion of America's youth.

Jane's dislike and distrust for politics express themselves also in her indifference to current issues of the day. In this apathy, she is joined with her male fellow citizen. As a result, Gallup polls have shown, for example, that 54,000,000 of our 90,000,000 American adults last year did not know what the Atlantic Charter was. In mid 1944, 27,000,000 did not know that the Japs had taken the Philippines; 33,000,000 didn't know what a tariff was; and to over 70,000,000, the important word, "subsidy," meant nothing. Yet, we say, truthfully enough, that the American public is the best informed on earth. The answer to this seeming contradiction is that all of us—you, as well as I—can stand much more information and understanding of current events and of politics.

It is understandable why the average Jane doesn't particularly take to politics. For example, she has household work to do; she has the baby to care for; she may have a job; she has her social activities, her religious affairs. Moreover, like as not, in her own upbringing, her parents discouraged political thinking on her part.

So, politics to her has always meant baby kissing, cigar giving, blabber mouthing, mud slinging, shady dealing, and the philosophy of "What's in it for me?" Politics to her is strictly the three-ring circus of party conventions and the foofaraw of elections. To sum it up, politics just doesn't rate with her.

But actually, the above are merely the more sensational elements of politics. As for the shady qualities mentioned, they are increasingly rare phenomena, thanks to the inherent honesty and the horse sense of the American people.

If you were to define politics accurately, you could say that it is the art and science of government—the art and science of human relations in public leadership. It is the sum total of processes, maneuvers, habits employed in the directing of community affairs and in staffing that direction.

You can't have government without politics any more than you can have human beings without emotions, prejudices, and inclinations. Good politics, clean politics, are necessary for good government and great statesmanship.

If politics is so indispensable and so universal, it behooves Jane to study up on it and master it. Granted that there is still a lot of murk and muck in politics, it's up to Jane to clear them out.

Politics is too important to be left to the professional politician, a man who may be (not necessarily is) in the game for "me first"; a man who may be separated from the economic and the spiritual life of the Nation and who may be entangled in the smart tricks, the clever devices, the dressy showmanship that so often characterize politics.

Politics is too important for you as a woman to leave it almost exclusively to men. You and your husband's or sweetheart's job, income, health, housing, are all affected by the orders and laws passed by your city council, your State legislature, your United States Congress.

At one time this past spring, for example, there were over 8,000 bills pending before the Seventy-ninth Congress. Based on the results of previous sessions, less than 10 percent of those bills would ever become laws. Would they be good or bad laws? Would they involve your lad in a third world war? Would they give a square deal to your serviceman husband? Would they halve your taxes? Would they increase employment? The answers to those questions were up to you and your intelligent influence on government.

Do you sincerely feel that you know as much as you should about the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution for women? How about the equal-pay-for-equal-work bill? The maternal and child-welfare act? The Federal-aid-to-education bill? The minium-wage bill? If not, you've got lots of company. If so, how do you feel about them? They affect your life, your position as a woman, as a wife, and as a mother, and they affect your countrymen.

I know that the past four war years have hardly provided much opportunity for Jane Citizen to busy her bonnet with legislation. American women and their menfolk did a magnificent, tough war job. They deserve—you deserve—all the credit in the world. But the job of making a better world has only begun, and it will only be done through politics—on international, national, and other levels.

"Wanted, therefore, more politics in women." That is different from "Wanted: more women in politics." It is well and good for women to correct their underrepresentation in political leadership. There are only 9 women in Congress, for example, out of a total of 531 positions. But sheer numbers of women in politics for their own sake is not "the consummation devoutly to be wished." We don't need a pack of uninformed, incompetent office-hungry females running for public positions any more than we need a pack of such unworthy office-hungry males.

Politics in women is particularly needed. Jane Citizen is the backbone of our Nation. She provides stability, continuity. She bears and teaches our young. She, more than John Citizen, makes and keeps the American home.

Jane Citizen has splendid precedents for political action and interest. There is an inspiring tradition of women's public service in our land. In many public matters—for example, those pertaining to children's welfare—women's beneficial work has been equal or superior to that of men. Many fine women's organizations have done nobly for the cause of women and of our people as a whole.

Perhaps you may remember the story of the militant suffragette who had been imprisoned for her work in advancing the franchise for woman. In the next cell was a younger suffragette who was weeping bitterly at the shame of being imprisoned. The older suffragette knocked on the cell door and counselled, "Don't weep, my dear. Pray to God, She will console you!"

Politics in women is particularly needed now. This is a big election year. In our National Government, 32 Senate and 435 House of Representative seats will be up for filling. Will those seats be ably filled? It's up to you to decide that.

It's up to you to "get politics," now, not as an awful-tasting medicine, not as a burden, not as a fanatic crusade, but as an adventuresome, enjoyable, and rational opportunity to serve your Nation and yourself.

Here are 10 ways to "get politics" and contribute to politics:

1. Learn about your Government: How are your city, your State, your Federal Government run? What makes the legislature, the judiciary, the executive branch tick? What roles are the political parties playing? To find out, consult your local library, your local political club, your informed friends, your adult-education school. For a humdinger of a question-and-answer booklet on Your Federal Government—What is It? send 10 cents to the Superintendent of Documents, United States Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C.

2 Learn about your leaders: Who is your Congressman? What are the names of your Senators? How about your political precinct leader, your mayor, your State assemblyman and State Senators? What are their backgrounds, their activities, their achievements on behalf of the public?

3. Follow your magazines, your newspapers, your radio for current events: What is going on in your city, State, and Federal Governments? What important orders and bills are being considered? What are they about? Who is for them and who is against and why? Skip the sensationalisms and high-jinks in the Government news; get to the meat of the facts.

4. Talk over current events—for light, not for heat: Your home need not be a bitter political arena, but it can well be a miniature town hall for the family. Your ladies' club can invite able, informed speakers to help you think and discuss current affairs. Your talk under the permanent-wave machine can touch upon politics, rather than upon gossip.

5. Teach your youngsters about Government: Measure up to your responsibility to implant in their growing minds a love for the Republic, a respect for its system of checks and balances, an admiration for its history, a sense of its obligations. In your effort to so measure up, you will find yourself reaching out for facts and conclusions and growing in your own right.

6. Participate in the political life of your community. There is a constructive political job to be done in your local community. How good are the school system, the police force, the sanitation department, the parks and playgrounds? Are they all you want them to be? If not, join with your local public-service organization—be it a ladies' auxiliary of the American Legion or the local chamber of commerce—to improve the community. By joining in local politics in its finest sense, you will be preparing for State, national, and international politics. Join the political club of your heart's desire—be it Republican, Democratic, or what have you—and participate in it. Come to it to learn, to grow, to contribute the best that is in you, not to fret, to jabber, or to yawn.

7. Get acquainted with Congress: Your Congressman will be happy to send you a sample copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and a copy of any bill or committee hearing or report which interests you, if it's available. He will be happy to send you copies of his addresses on important issue of the day. Become familiar with the important matters before Congress. Get the feel of Congress' workings; try to understand and appreciate your Congressman's problems. Secure from him a printed list of Senators and Representatives and their committees.

8. Write your Congress on important issues of the day: Your Congressman will be happy to get the benefit of your judgment on significant public affairs. First, however, get the facts on the issues, and then think them out. Write briefly, respectfully, logicaly. Don't overdo it and become one of the far-too-numerous crank writers.

9. Exercise your franchise wisely: Voting is a privilege, not a right. Listen analytically to campaign speeches. Separate the fact from the fancy, the meat from the fat. Make certain that the men and women for whom you vote have the knowledge, the ability, the experience, the character to represent your compatriots and yourself well. Make certain that they regard public office as a public trust.

10. If you are qualified, enter politics yourself: If you, yourself, have the qualifications and the time, the health, and the inclination to be a legislative trustee for the people, give the people the benefit of your worth. But remember that you cannot leap into the highest public office in one jump; you must prepare yourself for progressively higher leadership by working your way up the political ladder.

Thirty-nine women have held congressional seats. Two hundred and thirty-four women now hold office in 39 State legislatures. Thousands hold important public positions formerly held exclusively by men. But what is most important, 70,000,000 Jane Citizens can grow and develop an increased understanding of politics and make an increasing contribution to politics.

Memo No. 5—This Time for the Benefit of People With Long Memories

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, four times this week I have addressed the House with speeches under the title of "Memos for People With Short Memories" calling attention to the disgraceful and dangerous manner in which President Truman's emergency labor legislation is being permitted to languish on the Speaker's desk without even being assigned to a conference committee.

Today I want to address my remarks to people with long memories instead of those with memories so short that they cannot recall the labor disturbances which paralyzed this country a few short weeks ago and which—unless we pass the President's emergency legislation—may well again plague our Republic soon after Congress begins its summer recess.

Mr. Speaker, I address this question to the oldest Member of this body, the Member with the longest memory, and whichever Member has most studiously and sustainingly followed the actions reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. When before if ever in the history of Congress have we seen a situation like the one now confronting us in which the President of the United States has addressed a joint session of Congress requesting authority to meet an emergency and found his congressional party leaders so unresponsive to his recommendations and so indifferent to his reasoning that they do not even appoint a conference committee to attempt to adjust legislative differences between the two Houses so that the requested legislation can be passed?

Mr. Speaker, I offer the foregoing question as a foremost item for collectors of $64 questions. I believe it establishes a record. I think it is a sad and unfortunate record but I doubt if ever before have the leaders of a President's party reflected so little interest and confidence in the recommendations of a President of their party—at a time when they have working majorities in both Houses of Congress—that they have failed to appoint the committees essential to carrying out the President's suggestions.

Let somebody with a longer memory than mine correct the record, Mr. Speaker, if I am wrong. And, Mr. Speaker, let somebody in authority in the Democratic Party press for action now to get approval of the President's strike control recommendations or let the Democratic Party prepare to accept full and public responsibility for any labor disturbances which may occur in the month ahead.

The Barden Bill and Texas Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me, I include a statement for the RECORD which has been presented to the Committee on Education in connection with its consideration of the Barden bill. The statement follows:

STATEMENT FOR COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION ON H. R. 4384

In looking at national legislation designed for particular use, such as the Barden bill on vocational education, we are apt to fail to see the trees because the forest is so big. In an attempt to understand what it would mean to me as a Representative, I have obtained data on the need for an expanded program in my State, Texas, and in my home congressional district. Perhaps this data will aid other members of this committee to bring the bill into sharper focus.

The acute problem in Texas is one of expansion. This is not an artificially induced problem: During the war, many classes and services were closed down and obtaining teachers was difficult; and normal expansion and growth was virtually at a standstill. This brief statistical table tells the story:

	Active departments	Expansion and reestablishment needs	New departments requested	Total
Home economics	666	399	476	1,541
Agriculture	455	246	251	952
Distributive education	27	(?)	203	230
Trades and industries	191	(?)	12	203

Another State-wide problem grows out of the normal evolution in Texas of the junior college system. Recognized by State appropriation within the past few years as a logical intermediate step in our educational machinery, these schools represent for many, many students an extension of high school which will comprise all of their formal educational training. Hence the terminal courses in vocations offered in the junior colleges become of prime importance. The junior colleges have advised our State board for vocational training that they feel funds allotted to area schools should be principally administered through their facilities insofar as these terminal courses in the vocations qualify. The State board also advises me that there is no disposition to disagree with them on this contention.

Our able State executive director, Mr. W. E. Lowry, also makes this pertinent comment: "Undoubtedly, the first additions to the program should be in the field of vocational guidance * * * they bring an occupational survey and vocational guidance service to every child in the public schools of Texas."

This is a field of education which we are just beginning to appreciate and speaking for the State board for vocational education, we feel that too much stress cannot be placed upon this prospect of helping youngsters find themselves early in life.

Now, to bring this need even closer home and to state it in terms of the needs of school children (as well as adult classes) in one Congressman's 10-county district:

In vocational homemaking we have 23 programs operating. Expansions are needed in Bastrop, Johnson City, Burnet, Lockhart, Luling, San Marcos, Buda, Kyle, Manor, Georgetown, Round Rock, Taylor, and Thrall. New departments are needed in Elgin, Bastrop, Blanco, Marble Falls, Briggs, Lockhart, Prairie Lea, Martindale, Fentress, Lyton Springs, Dripping Springs, Austin, Manor, Pflugerville, Granger, Florence, Jarrell, Leander, and Liberty Hill.

In agricultural education we have 18 active departments. Departments were closed during the war at Blanco, Snook, Marble Falls, Luling, Manor, Georgetown, Hutto, Liberty Hill, Taylor, Friendship, and Andice and need to be reopened. New departments are needed at Bastrop, McDade, Paige, Somerville, Bertram, Briggs, San Marcos, Dripping Springs, Pflugerville, Burton, Leander, Florence, Copeland, and Jarrell.

Distributive education comparatively is a new field. During the past year we have held classes for adults at Austin, Brenham, Burnet, Elgin, Giddings, Lexington, Marble Falls, Bastrop, and Taylor. This program, I am advised by our State director, is relatively undeveloped because it was launched 20 years later than other vocational services. We should have a high-school program in these towns: Austin, Brenham, Georgetown, Lockhart, Luling, San Marcos, Smithville, and Taylor. In addition there should be at least three traveling instructors employed to train workers in the smaller towns in courses lasting from 1 to 3 months. The University of Texas should have funds for a teacher training and specialist training program. In all, the State board estimates a need for $66,400 for a proper development of this field of vocational training.

In trade and industrial education, only two cities out of this 10-county area are now served—Taylor and Austin. Training in nine occupations is offered at each city. I do not have the data on the expansion needs for this phase of the training.

I think there can be in the minds of members of this committee no doubt as to the wide success of this program of vocational education, since it was first launched in 1914 to train men how to be better farmers. Its evolution since that time has been natural and steady and is now one of the great educational forces of this country. The Texas State board for vocational education assures me of the merits of the Barden bill, and I hope this brief picture of vocational education needs in my State may prove helpful to the committee.

Modernizing Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the need for modernizing our legislative machinery is one the whole country senses and every Congressman acknowledges. The following editorial from a Washington paper this week urges that we consider this problem before Congress recesses, so that the next Congress will not have to work under the handicaps that have faced previous ones:

UP TO THE SPEAKER

What is the House going to do with the legislative reorganization bill? Ever since the Senate passed this reform measure 2 weeks ago the public has been looking eagerly for the answer. None has been forthcoming. Speaker RAYBURN has not yet given his nod of approval. It seems inconceivable that he intends to sabotage the bill. Yet every day that passes with the measure sidetracked on the Speaker's desk impairs the chance of it being passed at the present session.

The prestige of the House is thus clearly at stake. The Senate came through with a resounding demand that our legislative machinery be modernized. In the face of growing skepticism as to the ability of a democratic system to meet the complex problems of our day in an acceptable manner, the Senate struck out boldly for consolidation of leadership, for more expert service, better fiscal controls, fewer committees, higher salaries, and more workable rules. Behind the strength which the bill attained was a feeling that streamlining is imperative to save representative government. Is the House less conscious than the Senate of the urge to keep the legislative branch abreast of its responsibilities?

For our part, we do not see how Members of the House can face their constituents this summer without having approved this progressive measure. It is not merely a question of approving or disapproving a sound national policy. Rather this is a test of willingness to let our policy-making machinery function with a reasonable chance of success. The House can neither ignore this bill nor emasculate it without cutting heavily into its prestige and weakening its own position in the governmental set-up.

We say that because the vote in the Senate clearly shows a determination to rectify the weaknesses in its own organization. No doubt ways will be found to bring about most of the reforms it has voted even if the House should prove recalcitrant. The result will be to build up confidence in the Senate and tear it down in the House. If the Senate sets up the policy committees it has approved and the House acquires no such committees, the great advantage of the Senate in shaping the national policy will be obvious. But it is not enough to point to such advantages in a reorganized legislative body. So acute is the need for congressional reform that any men who take upon themselves the onus of defeating the work of the La Follette-Monroney committee in this field will be, in sober truth, gravediggers of democracy.

We only hope that the Speaker and his lieutenants sense the urgency and importance of the issue that the Senate has deposited in their laps. There is yet time to act, and to act properly. If the bill is not to be referred to the House segment of the La Follette-Monroney committee, it can be sent to the floor by the Rules Committee. Its provisions are well understood. We suspect that they are generally approved by the rank and file in the House as elsewhere. That rank and file are looking to the Speaker to give the bill a green light.

Foreign Policy of the Union for Democratic Action—Statement of Principles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement of principles of the foreign policy of the Union for Democratic Action.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

(Submitted by James Loeb, Jr., national director—Prepared and adopted by the national board of directors, under the chairmanship of Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr)

The Union for Democratic Action seeks to rally liberal and progressive opinion of America around the following objectives of foreign policy:

A. We believe that the peace of the world in the coming decades depends neither upon pure constitutional schemes nor upon unilateral policies of strategic defense. It depends upon the development of a system of mutual security, for which the beginning lies in the United Nations Organization. The progressive movement must be critical of the unilateral and irresponsible use of power by any nation.

B. We believe that we must make the democracy of the West meaningful to the hungry and desperate people of Europe and Asia by throwing the weight of our influence behind every policy in Europe and Asia which offers the people economic security within the framework of freedom. The conservative tendency to equate democracy merely with "free elections" or "free enterprise" and to deny the nations help in achieving economic order and security must be resisted.

C. We believe that a long-range policy of education will be required to make clear to our Nation and to all nations that the world community ultimately demands organs of world order more perfect than those now devised. On the other hand, we must insist that this goal must be approached step by step, so that tentative forms of mutual trust, now established, be not destroyed.

More specifically, these three principles of foreign policy means:

A

1. We must continue to seek for mutual agreements with Russia. The progressive movement in America must find a solid position between those who regard Russia as the fixed point of international virtue and those who hate and fear Russia to the point of supporting every policy which widens the gulf between Russia and the West. It is essential to develop a positive democratic program on which mutual understanding can be developed among all nations of both the Eastern and Western Worlds.

2. Purely strategic policies, either of yielding or standing firm in our relations to Russia, are themselves fruitless. It is apparent that peace cannot be preserved either by the division of Europe and Asia into spheres of influence, or by the effort of either Russia or the West to dominate these continents. We must make it clear to Russia and the world, by opposing any American imperialist policies or those of other nations, that our opposition to Russian imperialism is because it is imperialism, not because it is Russian. Russia and the West must finally cooperate to give political stability and economic health to the continents which lie between them. In seeking for higher strategies of mutual accord to gain this end, the progressive movement must be as critical of purely strategic and unilateral schemes of the West as of those of Russia. Such schemes are not meant to prevent war but to strengthen the one side or the other for the event of war.

3. We believe that atomic energy in our own country should be under civilian control and should not be allowed to be dominated by military consideration.

We believe that the report of the State Department committee, providing for the creation of a United Nations Atomic Development Authority, represents the most hopeful possibility of a solution for the atomic-energy problem. It avoids the opposite dangers of either holding the atomic secret as an exclusive possession, on the one hand, and of sharing it with the world, on the other, before there are adequate instruments of control. We believe that the neutralization of fissionable material will help to develop the constructive uses of nuclear energy on an international scale, while the complete international control of all sources and processes of atomic energy will prevent its irresponsible use. The elimination of the big-power veto as applied to all phases of atomic energy is imperative.

4. The progressive movement must support every measure which makes for a tolerable relationship between the wealthiest and most powerful nation on earth and an impoverished world. That means the support of:

(a) Every measure, including rationing, which will prompt us to share our abundance with a starving world. The American people are ready for a rationing program. The special interests which seek to prevent it must be overcome.

(b) Economic policies connected with and flowing from the Bretton Woods Agreement and making for a free and mutual flow of goods between the nations.

(c) Generous loans at low interest for postwar reconstruction among war-ravaged nations until such time as normal conditions will make the credit resources of the World Bank and World Fund adequate. Considering the necessity of maintaining an economy of full employment in a nation of high-productive power, such loans are in our national interest. Interest rates ought to be low, not as a matter of charity but of good business.

B

1. The progressive movement must insist that the democratic reconstruction of Europe and Asia requires that economic and property issues be dealt with radically. The primary way to combat Communist dictatorship and the extension of totalitarianism in Europe and Asia is to support those political movements which seek to establish economic security and industrial democracy within the framework of freedom. We must cease to follow policies which increase economic confusion and extend the political vacuum, which totalitarianism then fills. Europe cannot achieve economic health without wide-scale planning in terms of social democracy. If American power, under the influence of American conservatism, cuts off this alternative, western as well as eastern Europe will be delivered into totalitarian hands.

2. Any sign or symbol of a military alliance between ourselves and Britain must be avoided. Every military question must be subordinated to the quest for a wider accord among all the powers. Within this framework the progressive movement must seek to understand and support the British Government and all other imperial powers in any efforts that are made to find democratic solutions for their inherited problems of colonialism and imperialism. In this connection we heartily endorse the offer of freedom to India made by the British Labor government, and its proposal to withdraw from Egypt which it is already beginning.

It is particularly important that Britain and America seek to solve both their economic and political issues by mutual rather than unilateral action. The Palestinian problem is a vivid example of this necessity. The report of the Joint Commission on Palestine is a step toward a solution. It is essential, however, that Britain should not evade responsibility for carrying out the recommendations of the report and that America should support the solution jointly arrived at, by such political and economic aid as may be necessary. We advocate that this issue as other similar issues become the responsibility of the United Nations in due course. Both countries should resist the temptation to make unilateral use of power, either economic or political.

C

1. The progressive movement must join with other world peace organizations in showing the inadequacies of the United Nations Organization which gives the great powers excessive authority in the council of nations and which offers no constitutional security against war.

2. The progressive movement must, however, be astute enough not to allow these more ultimate demands to interfere with the achievement of an immediately operative system of mutual security which will give us some security until stronger foundations can be built. If the world is plunged into war in the next decades, it will be small comfort that this was done in the name of a pure idealism. Our task is to build provisional bridges across deep chasms of mistrust and fear. We may fail in the task. But if we fail, our civilization is lost, no matter what ultimate ideals it may have cherished.

The Cheese and Dairy Industry of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 29 (legislative day of Tuesday, March 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, many times on the floor of the Senate it has been my privilege to address my colleagues on the glories of my State's luscious, aromatic varieties of nutritious delectable cheese. I have invited my weary Senatorial brethren to come to visit God's country for refreshment and relaxation as well as for healthful eating of Wisconsin's products. Reinforcing my appeal I should now like unanimous consent that there be reproduced in the Appendix of the RECORD an article in the July 1946 issue of the magazine, Holiday, a splendid article entitled "Bring Your Own Crackers." It takes the reader on an intriguing tour of Wisconsin's cheese factories which make virtually every type of cheese produced anywhere else in the world. I understand that the article was prepared with the cooperation of our Badger State department of agriculture.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRING YOUR OWN CRACKERS TO A CHEESE DREAM IN WISCONSIN, OUT WHERE THE "BLUE" BEGINS TO RIPEN!

(By Phil Drotning)

It is my contention that a vacation should gratify the palate as well as the spirit. So let me introduce a novel variation for your next holiday—if you spend it in Wisconsin. The one prerequisite is that you go for cheese. If you do, you may visit a veritable dreamland of cheese factories, chat with the lusty experts who run them, and—most important—sample cheeses, some of which you never realized were made in America, until you're Roquefort-blue in the face.

Not so long ago the gourmet protested that only Limburg, Belgium, produced good Limburger cheese; that poignant, crumbly Roquefort was worthy of the name only when it came from the Cévennes district of France; and that real Swiss cheese must be imported from Switzerland. So when the war restricted imports, the gourmet heaved a sigh and prepared to go cheeseless. In most cases he required plenty of convincing before admitting that virtually every foreign type of cheese is made in America.

Take Roquefort, for example. One day a shepherd forgot his lunch of curd in the Roquefort caves of France. Weeks later, to save a sou, he ate the moldy mess. It was terrific. The cheese he accidentally discovered now is also produced in Wisconsin, in man-made caves or limestone caverns along the Mississippi. Although made from the milk of cows instead of sheep, and artificially cultured with mold, this blue-veined cheese has deceived many an alleged connoisseur.

CHEESE GOES WEST

Roquefort is only one of many foreign-type cheeses which have gone native in America. The man who loves to smack his lips over grated Parmesan on spaghetti will find this nutlike dry cheese in Wisconsin; those who prefer the sweet, caramel-like primost of Norway, or the salty, pear-shaped provolette of Italy, can sample those, too, during a Wisconsin vacation. You'll agree cheese has never been more tantalizing than when sliced from the wheel, loaf, or daisy in the spicy redolence of a storage room by the knife of the craftsman who made it.

There was a day when New York was the leading cheese-producing State, but today Wisconsin produces about nine pounds for every one made in New York. In 1944, Wisconsin's ambitious cheese makers turned out 474,698,000 pounds of cheese—just under half of the national total.

If that doesn't sound like a lot of cheese, consider that the average per capita consumption in America is only 6 pounds a year and you probably won't be tempted to start eating through it.

Tiny Wisconsin cheese factories, nestled in the verdant hills of the dairy country, make three-fourths of the familiar golden Cheddar (American) cheese produced in the United States. The combined efforts of nearly 1,500 crossroads cheese factories go to produce nearly 10 times as much American cheese as any other State, 70 percent of the Nation's blue-mold cheese, about half of the Italian cheese, and some 60 percent of the Limburger, to name only a few.

Well, bring your own crackers, and let's be off. We'll not only supply the cheese but stop at the State capitol, in Madison, and secure a copy of the Dairyland Cookbook, compiled from recipes submitted by nearly 17,000 cheese-conscious Wisconsin housewives.

Leaving Madison on highway 18, our cheese trail reaches south toward the Swiss colony at New Glarus. You will pass many autos whose licenses proudly proclaim that Wisconsin is America's dairyland, and perhaps some roadside signs bearing couplets which boast:

> If she has dimples on her knees,
> She eats pure Wisconsin cheese.

New Glarus is the nucleus of the Swiss-cheese industry, one of the first types made in Wisconsin. The colony was settled in 1845 when Switzerland suffered a disastrous famine and the government of the Swiss canton Glarus, hoping to alleviate the suffering by reducing population, sent two emissaries to America to investigate the new lands which were being opened.

The advance agents scoured the Mississippi River Valley, but not until they saw the rugged hills and valleys of the Sugar River did they know their search was over. As a result, on August 15, 1945, 108 poverty-stricken Swiss arrived to settle on 1,200 acres of land. They bought cows and began making the Emmenthaler cheese of their homeland. They even retained the custom of making a wheel of cheese for each new-born daughter, not to be served until the girl's wedding day.

Today New Glarus maintains much of its Old World flavor. If you arrive during Labor Day week end, you may find homes and stores empty, because the entire populace is in a nearby glade acting in the annual presentation of the Wilhelm Tell play. When you have watched Tell wield his crossbow on the traditional apple you may want to complete the picture by visiting the local Swiss museum and the chalet built by Edwin Barlow, director of the play.

Swiss-cheese factories in Green County produce about 30,000,000 pounds of cheese each year—the salty-sweet Emmenthaler type with the distinctive "eyes," made in huge wheels which average 200 pounds in weight. New Glarus and the county seat, Monroe, are surrounded by more than 300 factories which turn out a large share of the Swiss and Limburger cheese made in America.

Limburger cheese making has changed little from the methods used back in Limburg, Belgium. The cheese, when first taken from the vats and cut into 1-pound bricks, has not yet acquired its distinctive odor. But it assumes character during the 3 weeks it lies on shelves in the cellar, slowly accumulating a yellow mold. Every other day it is "smeared" (the whiskers are rubbed off by hand), and at the end of 3 weeks it is wrapped in parchment, manila paper, and foil. Another 3 weeks of storage in the cellar and you will be able to find it in the dark.

In the early 1870's, when New Glarus cheese makers began bringing Limburger to Monroe to be sent to eastern markets, school children held their noses as the wagons passed by. An ordinance was proposed to ban the product from the streets. But when money from the cheese began rolling in Monroe changed its attitude. What has been a smell became an aroma.

Driving through the countryside en route to another cheese factory you may be enchanted. in late afternoon, as a herd of lowing cattle moves along a hillside, to hear the hardy Swiss herdsman's yodel echo from the hills. Most of the natives are descendants of that early band of rugged Swiss pioneers and cling firmly to tradition.

TRANSPLANTED SWITZERLAND

Perhaps you will drive west from New Glarus on Highway No. 39 and stop a few miles out at the Pecatonica cheese factory. It is a typical Wisconsin factory, nestled in a picturesque glen at a crossroads.

Like almost every other cheese factory, it has a ground floor of tile, and is topped by a neatly painted second story of clapboard. It is typical, too, in its turn-over, receiving milk from about 25 farmers and turning out 3 or 4 wheels of Swiss cheese a day.

Inside, working in the clean, sweet fragrance that prevails in a well-scrubbed dairy, you will find John Metzger, the Swiss cheese maker, who has operated the factory for years. He knows cheese as a diamond merchant knows gems.

Each of four gleaming copper kettles holds 2,000 pounds of milk which is heated at a temperature of 122° Fahrenheit and becomes 300 pounds of curd, and later, 200 pounds of cheese.

John will add the rennet and bacteria cultures which cause the milk to curdle and the eyes to form, and while it is heating he and his helper will stir the mixture with the wire blades of a "Swiss harp." You will see them pick up a spring-steel blade and skillfully whip a bit of cheesecloth around the great mass of curd and lift it from the kettle with a block and tackle which conveys it to a nearby drainboard. There it is pressed into a wheel. After soaking for 3 days in brine, it is hand-rubbed with salt and shelved for 2 or 3 months of aging.

Next, John will take you into his storage room and slice a wheel aged to perfection. You'll nibble a bite or two, not wanting to wait until you get to your car. And as you drive off on Highway 39 you'll nibble some more and wonder why the rich, yellow Emmenthaler never seems as tasty when you buy it in a restaurant or store.

From the Swiss country your route can branch out in a dozen directions, in any one of which you'll find cheese. Because you'll probably want to plan your route to coincide with a bout with the husky muskie or the wily trout in Wisconsin's north-woods vacation land. let's just talk about other Wisconsin cheese types and the sections in which they are made. Your map will help you to decide which you want to visit.

For instance, choose Mayville, in Dodge County, often called the foreign-type cheese center of America. Clustered around Mayville are factories making a dozen different kinds of cheese, originated in as many lands, and you'll have a chance to marvel at the way a slight change in temperature or technique can turn the same basic ingredients into cheese totally unlike in color and appearance.

Cook the milk in a vat at 70 degrees and you may get cream or cottage cheese. Cook it at 92 degrees and give it a chance to mold, and you may have Limburger. Cook it in a tank at around 100 degrees and Cheddar will be the result; or in a copper kettle at 122 degrees and a bacterial culture to produce the eyes will result in Swiss.

Slight changes in technique produce cheeses ranging from soft, almost liquid varieties, to those which are hard as stone. Take the rubbery curd of Cheddar cheese (named for the English village in which it originated), press it into a mold of almost any shape, store it for 4 to 8 weeks, and you have the short-held, mild American cheese. Store it longer—as long as 2 years—and it gets progressively sharper and more flavorful.

In Dodge County, at Rolling Prairie, the Behle brothers' factory produces Camembert cheese, the soft, flavorful French type so highly regarded as an after-dinner delicacy. In Mayville proper, at the factories of the Purity Cheese Co., are made Edam and Gouda cheeses, each formed in a ball and dipped in red wax. The cannon-ball shape of these types traces to the Dutch practice of hauling their product to market in canal boats and rolling the cheeses down a chute.

Also made in Dodge County, and yours to find merely by asking directions, are Bond Ost, a Swedish cheese; the self-assertive Limburger; the finest Cheddar, Muenster, and brick. At Juneau are factories making blue cheese, aged in artificial caves.

North from Dodge County, at Holland, is the factory of the White Clover Dairy Co. Holland is a crossroads hamlet south of Kaukauna, home of a hickory-smoked Cheddar. Herds of goats graze on hillsides near the White Clover factory, and from their milk is made the sweet, brownish goats'-milk cheese of Norway, gjetost. Other Scandinavian types are made as well; the sweet and spiced noekkolost, the yellow-coated kumminost, the sweet, caramel-like primost.

Still other foreign-type cheeses are those of Italian origin produced in huge quantities by the Stella Cheese Co. in factories at Clayton, Barronett, Thorp, and other northern Wisconsin villages. Many in many unusual shapes and sizes, the Italian cheeses number a dozen or more varieties, some of which may be totally new to you.

Back in 1916, Attilio Castigliano, the Italian consul at Duluth, Minn., and Count Giulio Bolognesi, the consul general at Chicago, bought 1,700 acres of cut-over land near Lake Nebagamon in Douglas County. Castigliano, a graduate of the Royal School of Agriculture in Italy, began assisting the count in the supervision of a dairy farm.

PUTTING MILK TO WORK

Dairying in the area increased to a point where the milk-receiving points at Superior, Wis., could no longer handle all the milk, and the Italians, along with other farmers in the Brule area, found themselves without a market. Everyone was alarmed but the resourceful Castigliano, who found a compatriot, Frank Tescari, a former cheese maker from Italy.

They opened an Italian cheese factory in the farmhouse basement and, when World War I restricted imports, developed an extensive market.

The technique of cheese making calls for specialized skills.

Take the making of provoloni, for example. From spotless vats comes fresh curd which is cut into strips. Spongy and soft, it is worked with long-handled wooden paddles which slap, whack, and push it around in steaming water. The maker must know his job, for a few seconds of overexposure to the water will ruin $800 worth of milk and materials.

"Just right," says the cheese maker, at the precise moment. His assistants lift the curd from the vat with a roller and begin stretching and pulling it like taffy. Later it is cut into 25-pound chunks which are partially shaped by hand and then placed in perforated molds to drain.

Italian cheeses are characteristically well salted, to give them a tangy flavor. The provoloni is bathed in salt brine for 2 to 6 days, and then placed in a net of paper rope and suspended from the ceiling of a huge smoking room, in which it forms a tough rind amid swirling clouds of smoke from maple logs. This curing process imparts a nutty flavor to provoloni which, when fresh, makes a fine table cheese, and when older, a cheese to be grated for flavoring foods, especially minestrone soup and spaghetti.

At the Stella factories you will see many varieties of Italian cheese using the same curd, their differences being largely in size and shape. The provoloni has a diminutive relative, the provolette, which weighs only 5½ pounds, but usually comes in pairs. The caciocavallo, also twin cheeses connected by a string, weigh 2 pounds and are pear-shaped. The same cheese, shaped like a sausage, is called salami.

Others are the apple cheese, created by an Italian who must have had a sense of humor, for it is shaped like an apple and decorated with red wax like the Edam cheese of Holland. The mantica is pear-shaped, but when opened is found to contain a ball of sweet butter. The cheese is an insulator for preserving the butter, a practice valuable in the heat of southern Europe.

At Cumberland the Stella factory makes the kingly Romano cheese, which is shaped like a tall American Cheddar and weighs about 25 pounds.

This variety is dry-salted first, then placed in a brine strong enough to float it. A coat of lampblack is the final touch—now a concession to tradition, but originally a means of excluding moisture.

Fully cured Romano loses nearly a fifth of its original weight, and is extremely dry and hard when cured. It is grated and packaged for use in soups and in flavoring foods.

There are countless others, much the same: Reggiano, named after the city of Reggio, in the Po Valley; Parmesan, named for the city of Parma, and familiar to every spaghetti eater; and Asiago, rich in butterfat, which when fresh resembles American Cheddar, and when fully cured, Parmesan.

The Italian cheese factories also produce Gorgonzola, a mold-veined cheese similar to the French Roquefort. But the greatest production of mold cheese is the blue type, so named because the French went to court about our calling the American product Roquefort. Of the national annual production of 8,000,000 pounds of blue cheese, the State of Wisconsin produces about 6,500,000.

Wherever you go on this vacation you will be within easy driving distance of cheese factories producing virtually every type of cheese developed since the day, several thousand years ago, when an Arab started across the desert with a goat's stomach filled with milk.

By noon the blazing sun had transformed the milk into a rich, yellow mass of solid material—the first cheese. And the poor guy didn't have any crackers!

Hynes, Calif., Hay Fiesta Again This Year—Hay Market Has National Importance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted me so to do,

I wish to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the following article appearing in the California Dairyman for June 8, 1946.

The Hynes hay market is of such national significance as one of the outstanding merchandising centers for the marketing of hay and feed that the following article will, no doubt, be very welcome news to the dairying and hay interests of our Nation. It is self-explanatory. In addition, I have attended this fiesta in years past and the coming one will be the tenth such festival.

HYNES HAY FIESTA TO BE RESUMED

Plans are being made to hold the Hynes Hay Fiesta again this year. This important event was discontinued during the war years, but the dates for this year have been set for August 22, 23, and 24, and people from all over America are expected to be in attendance.

Committees for the various events to be held in connection with this fiesta are: Finance committee: E. V. McCracken, chairman, assisted by Betty Doheny and Gladys Hyde. Dairy show: Chas. Brinckley, chairman, assisted by Carl Allen, Tony Rocha, and Joe Telford. Horse show committee: Eddie Evitt, chairman, assisted by Al La Rue and Ed Olen Kamp. Hay show: Omar Suttles, Sam Cox, and Harold Wright. Parade committee: Louis Spane, chairman, assisted by Roy Lindsay. Entertainment committee: Chas. Brinckley, chairman, assisted by Al Spiers. Decorations committee: Ed Henderson and Sam Klein. Publicity committee: Paul Schwartz, chairman, assisted by Al Spiers. Committee on bands: Howard Tanner, Jack Robinson, and Glenn Starr. Hay and dairy show exhibits: Paul L. Schwartz, chairman.

Contact Paul Schwarts at the California Dairyman for your booth reservations.

Paul Schwartz, in writing me about it, says as follows:

THE CALIFORNIA DAIRYMAN,
Hynes, Calif., June 27, 1946.

Congressman CLYDE DOYLE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CLYDE: Upon my return to the office today, I was pleased to find your inquiry regarding our Hynes hay and dairy fiesta.

If a dairyman can live from year to year, I think he's got something to be thankful for and this is one of the means of expressing it. And particularly right here in the world's greatest dairy and hay center where we have something unique to brag about and even to do a little whistling in the dark.

I am going to see if I can get hold of either the Fox or MGM news reels to come down and shoot some scenes here, and also we may be able to get the editor of Life to give some national and international publicity on it.

The last time this show was held, 1941, I understand there was an attendance of nearly 100,000. This record will no doubt be broken with this year.

There will be the usual parades, horse show, rodeo, dairy-cattle show, educational exhibits, and the huge tent for the display of dairy machinery, equipment, supplies, hay, and grain.

Since the preponderance of population among the dairymen out here is Dutch, there is, of course, considerable Dutch atmosphere and Dutch type of festival and games, which are very colorful.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL L. SCHWARTZ.

As Congressman from the Eighteenth District, in which the important hay center of Hynes, Calif., is located, I am pleased to invite all vacationers and sojourners to be at Hynes, Los Angeles County, Calif., during the period of this unique and significant annual festival, which is this year being celebrated on the tenth occasion.

The reference by Mr. Paul L. Schwartz to the considerable Dutch atmosphere in his letter to me caused me to observe that there is also much additional Dutch atmosphere thereabouts. These splendid citizens of our Nation for many years have contributed items of lasting value, importance, pleasure, and profit to California.

House Concurrent Resolution 109 and the Poles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, nearly a year and a half ago I introduced before this House a resolution—House Concurrent Resolution 109—asking that the Government of the United States assume national responsibility for the results of what has been called by many the crime of Yalta, by opening the immigration gates of this country to admit the men of the Polish armies then serving alongside our own troops outside of Poland.

With very few exceptions, this general proposal has been supported by editorials and letters from all sections of the United States.

I also insert in the RECORD, as further evidence of the continuance of this sentiment, an editorial from the Washington Post of June 22, 1946, and a letter published in the same newspaper today. Legislators and the public alike are entitled to consider the deeply rooted desire for justice which inspires these demands for fair play toward our recent allies—now become our victims—the men of the Polish armies outside of Poland:

POLISH SOLDIERS

Even a warm sympathy for General Bor and for the gallant Polish army, on behalf of which he came to this country as a spokesman, does not give us any relish for his proposal that exiled Polish troops be employed as American occupation forces in Europe. The idea has found some champions in Congress and out. Their hearts, we think, are ruling their heads. The employment of foreign mercenaries is odious to a democratic society. The employment of them to discharge the tasks of occupation which we have solemnly undertaken would be an outright disregard of our responsibilities. And from the point of view of the Poles, this would be a sorry end to their heroic odyssey.

Nevertheless we owe to the Polish soldiers who have fought courageously as our allies all the help we can give in finding a solution for their problem. There are some 200,000 of them for whom General Bor speaks—more than 100,000 under the command of General Anders in Italy who are, by general acclaim of the British and our own forces in that country, the best and most-seasoned troops there today; about 20,000 in Germany; and the rest in England. They refuse to go back to Poland while the present government of that country is in power. Since they have been denounced as renegades and traitors, who can blame them?

The British Government, which armed and equipped the Polish army, has now ordered it disbanded and has made provision for enrolling a number of its soldiers in a special resettlement corps in England. They will, no doubt, be a valuable addition to the English community. We should do well to welcome some of them here as an accretion to the fine body of Americans of Polish ancestry already in this country. Perhaps Alaska, that rich and still largely unexploited Territory of the United States, could profitably be opened up for colonization by these hardy soldiers. They would need help, of course, in getting settled; and the feasibility of the project would require careful study. We think, in any case, if they come to us here or in Alaska, they should come as so many of their countrymen came, with the intention of remaining and embracing American citizenship. They would be an asset, and Poland's loss would be America's gain.

POLISH SOLDIERS

The recent visit of General Bor-Komorowski, the Polish hero, to Washington, seems to have received very little notice in official circles and in our newspapers. Aside of the warm reception extended to him by the few Americans of Polish descent residing in Washington, and two or three Congressmen, his visit passed completely unnoticed.

Poland, for centuries the champion of western civilization against the hordes of eastern barbarism, was enslaved in a nineteenth century by Russia and Germany to remove the danger of the growing spirit of democracy then developing in Poland. At the end of World War I, through the efforts of President Wilson, this historic wrong was rectified and Poland was reestablished into the family of nations.

The hundreds of thousands of Poles who escaped from Poland in 1939, after their country was invaded by Germany and Russia, fought along side of the American and British troops in Italy. They gained the general respect and admiration of their American buddies for courage in battle. The final, and almost suicidal assault upon Mount Cassino, with the tremendous loss of lives involved, and which made ultimate victory possible, was spearheaded by Polish troops under General Anders. Today at Mount Cassino there stands alone a simple and unpretentious monument in memory of the thousands of Poles who made the supreme sacrifice in that battle.

There are 200,000 more who survived and who, like their fallen comrades, fought for the principles of liberty; for a free, unshackled and democratic Poland, only to discover at the end of the war that their allies had deserted them; to find their country under the yoke of another tyrant oppressor. They fought this war along side of their allies with a promise of a free Poland, and what has victory brought to their country? Cruel disillusionment—worse conditions than experienced under the German occupation. In victory, they find themselves unable to return to the country they fought to free. Some of them are in England among friends, but away from their families—people without a country. Their hearts are in Poland and their eyes on the United States, wondering what their future holds in store for them.

I suspect that the majority of us realize the part the United States has played in the infamous game of postwar international intrigue and appeasement. Our recognition of the present quisling government in Poland, dominated by Russia, is an outrage upon humanity and international justice and calls for forthright and positive corrective action if America is to preserve its well-established reputation for fair play.

American History in the Making

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, very often we think of American history in terms of great men and their accomplishments. However, the course of this great Nation has been influenced to a great degree by the ready adoption of inventions and ideas.

Recently I read an article about a really simple invention which contributed greatly to the growth of the West.

It encouraged the growing of crops on grazing lands.

It encouraged the breeding of special types of cattle.

It encouraged land investment and improvement.

It saved millions of man-hours of labor.

It helped to bring law and order to the West.

I am referring to the invention called the barbed-wire fence.

An article recently appeared in the April issue of the Steelways. This is a publication issued by the American Iron and Steel Institute.

The article is entitled "The Fence That Made Cattle History."

THE FENCE THAT MADE CATTLE HISTORY

Barbed wire is as American as pumpkin pie, and its claim to a place at the family table is just as secure. Like Frank Fay's rabbit, you don't see it but there it is, an invisible strand of steel stretching out into the grazing country.

In our rise to agricultural preeminence, barbed wire has played a major role. Throughout the Nation more and better livestock, more crops, cheaper beef and mutton have resulted from its use. Without it we could not have fed so well the world's largest Army and Navy, nor had enough food left over for the starving in war-torn countries.

It grew up the hard way—surmounting early failures, lawsuits, and gunplay. It was probably born in San Antonio, Tex., during the Civil War out of one man's struggle to protect his orchard from wild herds of longhorns.

Ordinary wooden fence had been no bar to them. So the man laboriously sharpened small wire nails by hand, inserted them in twisted strands of galvanized wire, and strung the home-made fences on wooden posts. Not entirely sure of his invention, he climbed a tree to measure results.

The voracious steers didn't keep him waiting long. They eyed the newfangled enclosure disdainfully. Seconds later they charged. The wire held and the steers retreated, bellowing in pain. The man shouted so hard that he fell from the tree.

Naturally, the story was too good to keep. The orchardist hastened to nearby neighbors and with undisguised relish recounted every detail. He forgot he was actually a stranger in those parts. He didn't know the temper of Texans or the high regard they had for cattle, even thieving cattle.

Shortly afterward a delegation of thin-lipped citizens, toting impressive-looking hardware, called to inform him that unless he demolished that cruel and unnatural fence they'd run him out of town. Down came the fence and the inventor lapsed into obscurity.

Elsewhere and in less-hostile sections of the country others were working on a similar repellent type of fence. Chronologically, patents date back to 1867 with the crude invention of a man named Dabb. Then came Smith, Hunt, Kelly, Judson, and Rose.

Henry N. Rose really furnished the impetus for the barbed-wire industry. He devised a fence in 1873. It was a strip of wood studded with barbs. A sample of it was displayed at the country fair in De Kalb, Ill., that fall. Of the visitors to the fair, three local men—Joseph F. Glidden, Isaac L. Ellwood, and Jacob Haish—returned several times, struck by the future possibilities of the fence.

On October 27 of that same year Glidden applied for a patent on a barbed-wire fencing. Two months later Haish followed. Each claimed the basic patent applications. Their cases went to court. Lawyers battled for months. Finally, Glidden won. The fairness of his victory appears confirmed at this later date by the Patent Office in Washington where specially selected, epoch-making patents have been on display in the main lobby. Glidden's is the only barbed-wire patent included.

As head of the Barb Fence Co., Glidden began producing in 1874. He used an old coffee mill to fashion the barbs and the crank of an ancient grindstone to twist the wire. The barbs were set in by hand and hammered fast.

Haish remained in the picture, operating under a license from Glidden. So did Ellwood, who had bought a half interest in Glidden's invention and plant for $265. Having won their patent litigation, Glidden and Ellwood next acquired an interest in collateral patents held by others. This permitted them to make an improved fence "with prongs, spurs, or barbs applied to wire fencing."

During the spurt that followed, apparently every conceivable variation of twisting barbs around one wire or two was patented. Northwest Missouri State Teachers College in Maryville, Mo., has one of the largest collections of barbed wire in the country. It owns 105 varieties.

The manufacturers concentrated their sales efforts upon the Midwest. Steadily they broke down the conservatism and skepticism of the farmers. By 1880 they were manufacturing and selling 40,000 tons of the product annually.

In the mind of one youthful salesman of 25, ambitious to add a lot more to his weekly salary of $25, all of rural America needed this kind of cheap, efficient fencing. He saw the vast sales potentialities in the East, West, and in the grazing lands of Texas. Deciding to tackle the hardest sales job first, John W. Gates packed a valise and set out for the Lone Star State.

In San Antonio, Gates ran into a solid wall of skepticism and cattle reverence. Cattlemen did not believe that such frail-appearing wire could ever repel robust, wild, rangy longhorns. Furthermore, they were "derned" if they would have dumb animals hurt and their hides torn.

Gates finally won them to an experiment. He agreed to install a barbed wire corral on one of the city's plazas and they agreed to drive into it a herd of 25 of the roughest, toughest longhorns in the State. On the gala day the steers, herded by yelling, excited cowboys, roared into the arena. Tails raised and horns lowered, they launched a frontal attack on the barbed wire. As the Civil War orchardist could have predicted, they backed off, glared at the wire and tried again. Two setbacks were enough to convince them, and enough to convince the cattlemen, too.

Before sundown Gates had sold hundreds of miles of barbed wire at the prevailing price of 18 cents a pound.

Texas' ready acceptance of barbed wire generated a tremendous upswing in production. New machinery for its manufacture was invented and improved. Within that year of 1880 Bessemer steel was employed for making barbed wire, thus enabling manufacturers to produce better wire at cheaper prices. By the end of 1881 the price had dropped from 18 cents a pound to 8½ cents. Farmers and ranchers lined up at the bargain counter and bought generously.

For a long while cattlemen had been breed-conscious. They had realized that the strong, muscular, angular Texas longhorn was hardly an ideal beef animal. It could not command the price of a thoroughbred. It didn't have the weight or the docility, either. Furthermore, its food cost just as much.

With the advent of barbed wire the vast acreage of the grazing lands of Texas, as well as other beef-growing States, could be clearly defined and valuable breed cattle isolated. Only the die-hard cattle raisers sought to keep the old customs in force. These were the men who had come to look upon water and grass as free as the air. They were accustomed to herding their cattle wherever there were ample water and lush grazing. It didn't occur to them that the property might belong to somebody else.

Cowhands, carrying wire clippers in their holsters, would blithely cut barbed wire barriers. They got away with it for 2 or 3 years. When the epidemic became flagrant, the Governor of Texas, in 1884, called a special session of the legislature to make wire cutting a felony. With the passage of the law, property owners were encouraged to uphold it by pumping bullets into luckless cowboys who had the snipping habit. Fence-cutting, as of that moment, joined the lost arts.

Into the grazing lands now came experimental herds of Herefords, Durhams, Shorthorns, Polled-Angus, and Brahmas, all excellent beef breeds. One unit of the famous King Ranch, the Santa Gertrudis Ranch, erected 1,500 miles of barbed-wire fence. In this fenced-in area was developed one of the finest breeds of cattle the world has ever known, the Santa Gertrudis. It is three-eighths Brahma and five-eighths Shorthorn, combining the natural beef qualities of the latter with the hardiness of the Brahma.

Blizzards had once caught starving cattle and killed off thousands yearly. Barbed-wire fences permitted the ranchers to divide their stocks into small units that could be sheltered and fed during inclement weather. Crops could be grown in cattle country, safeguarded from hungry steers. Cattle thieving dropped into the minor brackets.

Barbed wire substituted law and order in many areas for the .44 pistol. It encouraged land investment and improvement. Although it took some of the romance and color away from the ranges, it brought in immense benefits to a country rapidly becoming civilized.

In recent years, demands of mass production have greatly simplified the number of barbed-wire styles. In 1942 a leading manufacturer reduced his styles of two-point wire from 12 to 6. More uniform spacing between barbs has simplified manufacturing operations, as well as conserving materials.

During World War II barbed wire formed protective enclosures for industrial plants, railroad yards, and military installations. It was employed in enemy concentration camps, and illustrations of Americans languishing behind it were widely and effectively circulated. Now its peacetime uses can be considered again.

In 1945 American barbed-wire production amounted to 234,000 tons, enough wire to erect a fence, three strands high, almost half a million miles in length. This was an increase of 100,000 tons in the past 10 years. Likely the peak in a postwar year will be around 300,000 tons. Today's price is approximately 3½ cents a pound.

Agricultural America probably has never had any other item that represented more utility for such a low price.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. J. LINDSAY ALMOND, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. ALMOND. Mr. Speaker, on December 31, 1945, with a brilliant record of achievement indelibly written through 23 successive years of distinguished service as an honored and beloved Member of this body, Clifton A. Woodrum, of Virginia, voluntarily retired from membership therein to assume the presidency of the American Plant Food Council, Inc. On June 24, 1946, I was privileged to hear him deliver an exceptionally able address before the first annual convention of the council at Hot Springs, Va.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this address, entitled "Mother Earth":

Members of the American Plant Food Council and guests, I extend to you hearty greetings and felicitations in this, the first annual convention of this organization. It is a momentous occasion. It marks a milestone along the highway of enlightened business leadership of which I am sure you, and those who follow after, may be justly proud through the years.

The organization of the American Plant Food Council was but the translation into action of a growing feeling on the part of a very large portion of the fertilizer industry, that the industry should have a positive, active, and enlightened national organization. That the fertilizer industry should have a new voice that would more fully and adequately tell its story and announce its objectives to American citizens as well as governmental agencies and legislative bodies. I think it might be said that many leaders in the industry felt that many of the ills that beset the industry, many of the hurdles it has been required to get over in an effort to render public service, was because of a very imperfect understanding on the part of the public of the industry—its accomplishments and its problems.

SMALL BUSINESS

I have spoken of the feeling that the industry should have an active and positive national organization. I should like to elaborate just a little on the importance of this. My experience in the Nation's Capital, in these recent years of alphabetical bureaus, departments, and commissions, has impressed me with the fact that the average small businessman out in the States is practically lost in a maze of regulations, orders, directives, edicts and policies, unless he has some contact in the Nation's Capital that knows what it is all about—that will keep him informed and look out for his interest. I have used the word "small businessman" advisedly. The big guy, the large operator, usually is in on the ground floor on what is happening. He knows how to take care of himself. Not so the small fellow. He usually finds out about the deal, after it's all cooked up. This applies, I think, with great force to the fertilizer industry. The American Plant Food Council has on its roster not only many of the large operators but many of the small manufacturers. We seek to fill a very special place in the needs of these small operators. We especially desire to have his cooperation and assistance in our efforts to serve the industry. We wish him to feel that he has a personal representative in the Nation's Capital.

This policy of the American Plant Food Council to show a special interest in the so-called small operator is clearly demonstrated in the fact that when we come tomorrow to the business session of the council, and to the election of members of the board of directors, or the transaction of any other business, each member of the council has an equal voice. That is to say, the smallest operator has equal voice with the largest in all decisions.

The basic thought underlying the formation of the council was to render service to American agriculture—a service which agriculture had a right to expect and which at times it had not received. Those responsible for this movement, subscribed to the fundamental idea that there could be no economic stability or solidarity in this democratic nation, unless there was a self-sustaining and prosperous agriculture. They also know full well that in promoting the welfare of agriculture they would be contributing to a sound American economy. A stabilized American economy would help us all, including the fertilizer industry. So you see, we were not only altruistic but realistic.

THE OBJECTIVES

To attain these objectives, the council has adhered to certain policies and principles which we hold to be fundamental and to which we dedicate our efforts.

1. Encourage the production and distribution of an abundant supply of plant food for all agricultural needs through private industry. (Includes farmer-owned and controlled cooperatives.)

2. Encourage the efficient utilization and conservation of our potash, phosphate, and other mineral plant food deposits, so that future national needs will be fully safeguarded.

3. Encourage the development and use of improved methods in producing, blending, and distributing fertilizers so that plant food will be available to farmers at the lowest possible cost.

4. Encourage and support the agricultural research, educational, and control agencies.

5. Cooperate with farmers and their organizations in developing policies designed to place agriculture upon a satisfactory, self-sustaining basis.

6. Urge fertilizer manufacturers, dealers, and agents to fully understand and support recommendations for crops, soil-management practices, and fertilizer use within their respective areas as developed in the recognized findings of scientific research.

MOTHER EARTH

Much is being said nowadays about soil building and soil maintenance. It seems to me that mankind is suddenly becoming very conscious of his obligations to Mother Earth. What a mother she has been. With characteristic unselfishness, she has fully given of her treasure for our health, our pleasure, and our progress.

We have trampled her ruthlessly under our feet. We have referred to her scornfully as "dirt"—a thing to be despised and detested. We have neglected her, robbed her, left her to be blown away by the desert winds and washed away by the flood—and yet, good old Mother Earth has gone right on, giving us from her womb the ores, marble, rock and timber, oil, and minerals with which we have built our agriculture, our cities, our highways, our transportation lines, our implements of peace and war. Giving us from her body food and drink that sustains life, and sending to us from her bosom the beautiful blossoms and foliage to cheer our weary footsteps along the way and to speak of life eternal in that last hour when we return "ashes to ashes" and "dust to dust." Ah, sirs, let us pledge anew our loyalty and devotion to so great a "Mother." Let us as we feast upon all of the good things she produces for our comfort and pleasure be grateful enough to bring back to her and to scatter her with those vital elements so necessary to her life, vigor, and continued productivity.

AGRICULTURE

I have said that the basic objective of the American Plant Food Council is to serve American agriculture. Let me elaborate a little.

The genius of American agriculture in the critical days through which we have passed, and through which we are passing has done a remarkable job in producing food not only for America, but for many unfortunate peoples of the world. Agriculture is America's first industry. Today our national welfare is largely dependent upon the progress and prosperity of agriculture. The American farmer occupies a position of great responsibility in our national economy. Agriculture will play a vital role in helping to restore a world which has been torn apart by a devastating war. The Government has a distinct responsibility to agriculture.

It owes to this great industry a specific duty in the field of research, education, regulation, and demonstration through its Federal and State departments of agriculture, its great land-grant college system, its great system of experiment stations, its Agricultural Extension Service, Soil Conservation Service, Vocational Agricultural Teachers, and other services which directly contact the farmer and gives him expert advice on his problems. I favor this procedure. These are legitimate and proper functions of Government. We annually appropriate huge sums out of the Federal Treasury for these services. This is a wise expenditure of public funds. No one knows the tremendous practical value of scientific research any better than the American farmer. Through his county agent, vocational teachers, his State Agricultural College, and various Government agencies he is constantly in touch with the findings of research in soil chemistry, crop production, and animal husbandry. Time and again, this research has guided him not only to improved methods but also to the production of new crops and new uses for old crops—opening new and expanded markets and greater rewards for his labor. It is a proper function of Government to exert its effort and expend its funds reasonably to help the farmer help himself. I subscribe to that philosophy—but there is a limit beyond which it should not go. I do not believe the time has come, or should ever come, when the Government should go into the farming business, or when it should undertake to regulate or regiment every action and procedure of the farmer even down to the point of doing his plowing, seeding, fertilizing, and harvesting for him. I cannot go along with the unsound philosophy that would put the American farmer sitting on the curb with a cup in his hand asking alms of every passerby.

Those who advocate such unsound principles are doing a disservice to agriculture. I think what the farmer wants is a fair, square chance in a free and competitive economy to live his life and conduct his business under circumstances from which he may reasonably expect to have a profit for his labors.

FREE ENTERPRISE

Another problem that confronts us is to preserve a free economy where the individual will have the right and the opportunity to live his own life, to make his own mistakes, and to achieve his own success. To the serious-minded citizen, this is a challenge. As we look about us and lend an attentive ear there are omnious rumblings of distant drums that warn us of more battles to come. This total war in which practically all of the nations were engaged has produced an absolutely unprecedented dislocation in individual liberty of action. The delicate balance which is so essential in a free economy has been completely disrupted. If we really want to preserve a world of free enterprise and initiative we are going to have to struggle for it. I lay down the challenge to you businessmen to unsheath your sword and enter the conflict. "He only is entitled to liberty who is prepared to win it for himself every day," said the poet. What are we talking about? Let us not lose the trend of our thought by becoming too oratorical. It's a simple proposition, namely, now that the war has been won and the dictators crushed—we hope—let us dedicate ourselves to the task of releasing governmental controls as rapidly as they may safely be released and letting the economic machinery run again under its own power.

Thomas Jefferson expressed it by saying "The best governed people are the least governed people." At another time he expressed it a little differently, "The people should support the Government and not the Government the people." I maintain we can have no economic solidarity in this country, no domestic tranquillity, no personal security, unless we maintain and foster individual initiative and a system of private enterprise. That means that the Government—State, and National—should not except under circumstances of extreme national emergency, undertake to order our lives or enter into competition with private enterprise. You will observe I have made a qualification to this broad statement. This qualification would indicate that in case of extreme national emergency it might be necessary for the Government to step in. Instances have occurred.

The necessity for greatly increased agricultural production during the war caused a great many farmers to turn to the use of fertilizer or commercial plant food in order to increase their crops. Many sections of the country who have never used a ton of fertilizer turned to its use in answer to the urgent pleas for more food.

Many farmers in these sections never accustomed to the use of commercial plant food suddenly begun to realize how much it would mean to their agricultural endeavors if, while they were taking large quantities of vitality out of the soil they would not overlook the important fact of replenishing the same. There has been and will be a demand for commercial plant food in many sections of the country where it has never been used before.

Recognizing that farmers should use larger amounts of commercial plant food and believing that increased consumption will be further stimulated through research and educational activities, the industry is planning to expand their facilities just as rapidly as materials are available and restrictions are removed. Surveys indicate that 30 or more new fertilizer plants were either started during the war or projected for construction by private industry. Most of the new construction is scheduled for the Midwest and west coast areas.

Recent reports issued by the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations indicate that the world demand for fertilizer during the next year will again exceed the supply. The production facilities in some nations which normally supply a large amount of plant-food materials were largely destroyed. The American fertilizer industry will use its facilities to the limit and present reports lead us to believe that a new high in the production of fertilizers and fertilizer materials will be reached. Many important plant-food materials will again be subject to allocation by the Combined Food Board so that those countries which depend upon their fertilizer supply from nations where production facilities were largely destroyed by war can be taken care of. This probably means that American farmers will not have all of the fertilizer during the 1946–47 year that they will want. Since fertilizer is so essential in meeting the food-production goals, we hope that our farmers will utilize their fertilizer materials wisely and that they will purchase their supplies early so that the industry can operate at capacity levels throughout the entire year.

THE CHALLENGE TO THE INDUSTRY

The American Plant Food Council is well aware of the challenge that faces the fertilizer industry today. Not only citizens of America but citizens of the world are fertilizer conscious. They are suddenly realizing that they can raise more crops, better crops, and more nutritious food by intelligent land management and the proper application of fertilizer. We expect to meet this challenge and we feel that private enterprise is quite able to do this job. Give the fertilizer industry a chance to do its job and I am perfectly confident that it will respond in the way that other American industries have responded whenever they have had a challenge to meet.

MY POSITION

In closing let me say that in voluntarily giving up a service in the United States House of Representatives that had continued for 23 years to accept the presidency of the American Plant Food Council, I was actuated by one important motive—I saw what I believed to be an opportunity to render an even greater public service.

DEMAGOGS AND BUREAUCRATS

In my 23 years in Congress I have seen a lot of things happen. I have seen administrations change several times—I have seen men come and go, all kinds of men—some able and conscientious, others frivolous, and opportunists. I have seen a globa' war pyramid governmental activities and controls. I have seen exigencies of war make many controls necessary almost to a point of a total loss of individual freedom of action. I realize how hard it is to get rid of these controls and on the other hand how dangerous it might be to release some of them completely until the economy is ready for the shock. Out of my experience I would bring to you businessmen this observation. Your Government in Washington, by and large, is just about what you have made it. If there be men there, either in the legislative branch or departmental service, whom you do not feel to be qualified or worthy it is usually because some constituency has been neglectful. Be vigilant. While it is appropriate to repudiate men who have served you ill, it is of equal if not greater importance to actively support those who are conscientiously serving you.

I wish to pay my tribute to the great body of men—the House, the Senate, and in important departmental positions—who are giving of their fine talents and at their own financial disadvantage that this great Government may continue in its high place of leadership, and that the baffling problems in this postwar period may be solved. Some of them are in this audience. Gentlemen, we salute you. Men of the business world, when you speak of "demagogs and bureaucrats" be a little discriminating. Remember, please, we couldn't have accomplished what we have in the war and so far in the peace without there being some very intelligent leadership in Washington. It wasn't just an accident. Someone has been doing a job.

THE STAFF

I wish to express my great satisfaction with the folks who surround me as my working staff. We have a fine team. We play ball together and we are going to get results. Harry B. Caldwell, our secretary-treasurer, with his wide knowledge and clear understanding of our problems; Dr. John R. Taylor, Jr., our popular and efficient agronomist; Louis H. Wilson, who recently joined our staff as director of information, our office manager; Diane Taylor, who came with me from Capitol Hill and the rest of the force. They are on the job—you may expect results.

I also wish to express my appreciation to the members of the board of directors for their support, and to the executive committee. I have drawn heavily upon the experience, time, and finances of these gentlemen, as we move out to increased activities and larger usefulness. I crave your patience and forbearance.

The American Plant Food Council has adopted a splendid program of positive action. To these principles we have dedicated our active and vigorous efforts. In this great task we invite the support of the industry.

Letter of Fishermen's Supply Co., of Jacksonville, Fla.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMORY H. PRICE

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

THE FISHERMEN'S SUPPLY CO.,
Jacksonville, Fla., June 26, 1946.

Representative EMORY PRICE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR EMORY: We have been trying without success to get catfish skinner's pincers for the fishermen for several years. A 5- or 6-inch cobbler's pincer is used. During the war Christ Pearson, of the Maritime Commission, worked around and got us a few but not enough to do very much good. Since then we have contacted the suppliers periodically trying to get some. The enclosed is a sample of the replies we receive.

The textile people have just discontinued putting twine up in balls due to the ceiling. It is a nice thing when a man has to take 30 or 40 minutes to ball up twine which would come already balled up if the mills were granted an increase to compensate for the increased labor costs of approximately 1 cent per pound. Just who does Chester Bowles think he is fooling, anyway?

There is no meat in Jacksonville except that which is slaughtered locally. The slaughterhouses will not handle it because they have a quota which they cannot exceed. As a consequence, what comes in is home slaughtered, and last week the Government inspectors poured kerosene on 13,000 pounds of meat simply because it did not have a stamp on it. The question of whether it was good or not did not enter into it. Have we enough surplus meat to afford to destroy that much of it in one town? Multiply that by all the towns in the country and it amounts to quite a bit.

Your continued good efforts to help the people and try to protect them from the starry-eyed theorists (who could not take over the management of a corner fruit stand and make a living) is urged and appreciated.

Yours,

W. H. ADAMS, Jr.

President of Association of World War II Pilots Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting herewith an address as made and as communicated to me from Chick Logan, head of the Association of World War II Pilots. This organization of former fliers in uniform for our beloved Nation has its national office in my home city of Long Beach, Calif., and I have had personal observation of the anxiety and ambition of this Chick Logan and his associates to the end that all the assets gained by these trained pilots for war purposes shall be preserved by being promptly put to use for purposes of enduring peace.

The two addresses follow in order:

ADDRESS BY CHAUNCEY P. LOGAN, PRESIDENT OF ASSOCIATION OF WORLD WAR II PILOTS, ON THE POSSIBILITIES OF AIR FREIGHT

AIR FREIGHT FOR NATIONAL SECURITY, PROSPERITY, AND HEALTH

A person would possess a short memory to forget the year 1941. Hell broke loose and we went to work with sweat on our brow and a prayer in our heart. We prayed: "Give us time to prepare." This meant building aircraft factories, expansion of existing industries, and the training of personnel. We started from scratch and built the greatest war machine in the history of the world.

Today, 1946, victory is ours. The war machine is breaking up. The United States Army and Naval Air Forces are in the process of virtual disintegration. Thousands of trained pilots and highly specialized and technical men are being released and thousands of aircraft are being stored and weather-beaten into uselessness. Our once indomitable air power is going to seed.

Atomic energy was not perfected in 1941. It is today. If there is another war our prayers will be one short thought. There will be no time. Our country will never be given an opportunity to prepare for war again. We will be the first to be attacked and in a short time our capacity to manufacture and organize will be irreparably destroyed.

Lt. Gen. James H. Doolittle, General Spaatz, General Eisenhower, Admiral Nimitz, together with the progressive leaders of our country, agree that air superiority is a must for national security. It will require a powerful air force and a backlog of highly specialized men. How are we to accomplish this necessity without forcing members of the Air Forces to remain on active duty?

PROGRESS

World War II was a struggle between the gangster aggressor and law and order. It was to eliminate forever the forcing of a will and philosophy upon a helpless people through the medium of power and fear. It was for the purpose to live naturally, to establish freedom from want and opportunity to work unmolested in a chosen field. For these inspiring and practical things our warriors fought hard and died easily.

Today we fight another war, the war of peace and progress. Our greatest enemies are the accepted methods of doing things. If these methods are out-dated through the medium of science they are our enemies in peace. They must be defeated but, unlike the aggressors of World War II, will be honored and admired for their contribution to the evolution of progress and civilization.

During World War II billions of dollars were spent by our Government for war. The greatest industrial expansion in the history of the world came into existence. Huge factories became massive and large factories became huge. New industry and enterprise mushroomed in every State. Ours was a war of materials and we won. This great and confederated effort was for war. What type of effort will we exert for security, prosperity, and peace?

POSTWAR JOBS

The Agricultural Research Administration, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., estimates there is approximately 5,000,000,000 ton-miles of fresh fruit and vegetables earmarked for air transportation. Oranges, lemons, potatoes, etc., and all fruits and vegetables found within the region of 750 miles from consumption have been eliminated for various reasons.

Commodities eligible to be shipped by air represent the majority of fresh fruits and vegetables available in California and the southern States. They include grapes, figs, tomatoes, fresh-shelled peas, carrots, lettuce, asparagus, celery, broccoli, peppers, strawberries, plums, apricots, peaches, pears, nectarines, cantaloups, Crenshaw melons, and other items.

If we may assume that this great tonnage will divert to air transportation in the future it will require 2,490 C–47's (standard airliners) or 1,140 C–54's (super airliners), and it is interesting to note we are considering only air transportation for the produce industry. The normal growth of tonnage for air transportation in the future, through the process of education, organization, evolution, and service, are not considered.

To keep one C–47 (standard airliner) flying on schedule to the manufacturing centers of the East from the west coast will require a minimum of eight pilots.

The C–54's (super airliners) will require six pilots. In addition to the aircraft's crew, there will be engineers, aircraft mechanics, labor to load and unload, supervisors, weight and balance officers, freight agents, bookkeepers, stenographers, and personnel pertinent to the successful operation of the business. For the sake of simplicity let us assume it will require five nonflying personnel for each aircraft. The total personnel which would be required is as follows:

1. C–47. Standard airliners:
Pilots	19,920
Nonflying personnel	12,450
Total	32,370
2. C–54. Super airliners:
Pilots	6,840
Nonflying personnel	5,700
Total	12,540

A. T. C. AND AIR CARGO

During the past 4 years the Air Transport Command of the Army Air Forces has hauled millions of tons of air cargo and flown billions of passenger-miles. In a press release of October 1, 1945, the War Department gave the following information:

On June 5, 1941, the Air Transport Command had no airplanes and a personnel of three—two officers and one civilian. As of August 31, 1945, Air Transport Command's strength was 41,520 officers, 166,026 enlisted men, and 23,752 civilian personnel. They were crisscrossing the earth with airways and flew 6,653,000,000 passenger-miles and 2,371,000,000 cargo-ton-miles.

The total mileage for the year 1944 was approximately 600,000,000 miles—equivalent to 25,000 trips around the world at the Equator. Their planes cross the Atlantic once every 19 minutes, the Pacific every 51 minutes. Redeployment operations make it necessary to bridge the Atlantic once every 6 minutes.

The problems pertinent to the development of the Air Transport Command's massive transportation system were evidently many. Each problem was met and eliminated at the time encountered. There will be many problems encountered in the commercial establishment of air freight transportation. These can be successfully eliminated as they arise. There has never been a time in the history of progress of the United States whereby the vision of industry was not equal to the task. The Air Transport Command's accomplishments during the past 4 years is an established reflection of what air freight will accomplish in the future.

AIR FREIGHT AND PRODUCE

Each year in California there are millions of tons of fresh fruit and vegetables which are thrown away. It is left in the fields, plowed under, or picked to make room for other crops. In addition to this tremendous loss of food there is a normal wastage on all produce that is shipped. It is estimated at about 40 percent. This second loss is brought about because of the time element of shipping long distances, ripening en route, handling, picking over by the customer, etc.

Most produce is picked green, packed, refrigerated, and shipped by rail. Ripened-on-the-vine fruits and vegetables cannot be shipped. Due to weather phenomena there are at times bumper crops. It ripens faster than anticipated; therefore the crop becomes a loss. Principally because of these reasons it is a fact that the produce industry is one of the most unstable industries in commerce.

Air transportation for fresh fruits and vegetables seems to be the answer to the produce grower's problems. It would make possible the shipment of produce ripened on the vine, thus salvaging for public consumption millions of tons of wasted foods and assisting to stabilize one of our important industries.

PRODUCE HAS FLOWN

The ground work for the launching of this potential air-freight industry is in the process of completion. The Ralph E. Myers Co., Salinas, Calif., published a fresh fruit and vegetable report pertaining to air transportation, dated October 26, 1945. This report covered 30 plane loads of fresh fruit and vegetables shipped from the west coast to 12 receivers in 9 terminal markets—New York, Cleveland, Detroit, Philadelphia, Chicago, Atlanta, Milwaukee, Kansas City, and Denver. Practically all shipments were made between March 1, 1945, and October 1, 1945.

In this report there were many problems encountered regarding equipment, airport facilities, carrier performance, packaging, market distribution, etc., which would have to be worked out in order to successfully handle this huge potential market for air transportation. It is gratifying to note that no problem was encountered of such magnitude which would make air freight for perishables prohibitive.

CONCLUSION

Air freight in the future offers the greatest possibilities for our country to provide a massive backlog of supertrained pilots and technicial aviation men. To develop this future industry in a commercial manner wou'd breach the gap between a perpetual, military air force and the democratic desire of all people to become and remain a civilian.

Our future progress must be teamed with national security and being prepared. Air freight transportation embodies each of these important necessities. Air freight transportation will provide jobs for these pilots who flew their war cargo over Africa, Europe, India, China, and the South Pacific, and for those indispensable crews who made these flights possible. It will provide a medium whereby the perpetuation of our leadership in aviation will be secure. It will provide a progressive air freight transportation system for our country and will assist the eastern manufacturer to be in the West's backyard. It will provide stabilization to the agriculture of the South and West. It will provide tasty fresh fruits and vegetables "ripened on the vine" and containing high vitamin content for national health. It will provide progress.

OUR HERO—"THE CAPTAIN"

(By "Chick" Logan)

A young captain in uniform stepped out of the office of a national air line. There was an expression of disillusionment and surprise over his features. He acted as if he had been hit on the head with a mallet. On his smart Air Corps uniform were the familiar shiny wings which identified him as a pilot. Over them were the coveted ribbons of service and distinction—three theaters of operation, Distinguished Flying Cross, a mass of Oak Leaf Clusters, and battle stars; over the opposite pocket was the Presidential Citation and a discharge button. He was swallowing the first dregs of civilian life. He had applied for a job.

"What do you know," he said. "I have flown the Atlantic, the Pacific, and 32 missions of combat. Been hit with shrapnel, served as a target for enemy fighters, flown on instruments in formation and in some of the worst weather ever known to man in the process of building up 1,000 hours of flying time, and yet they tell me I am not eligible to submit an application for pilot on their air line." He became a person of anger as he spoke, which finally ended with disgust. "And to add insult to injury, they told me I was too old."

"There must be some sort of misunderstanding about your qualifications, Captain," I grinned. "Surely there is something wrong, somewhere."

"You can say that again, brother," he flipped back with the dawn of definite understanding. "Brother, you can say that again."

"Captain!" I studied his young and clean features—there were lines about his eyes, appropriate to a person who had experienced a lot in a short time. "How old are you?"

"Twenty-six." The words slipped from his teeth without thought. "And too old," he added hastily, his teeth biting and clinging to the words, "too old."

"Perhaps there is something else," I offered apologetically.

"Hell! What can I do?" he shot back viciously. "I have never had a job. I was yanked out of school and qualified for the Air Corps. From then on it was study—study, practice, and study. I mastered flying, transitional flying, meteorology, navigation, engines, engineering, aerodynamics. I learned to fly by instruments, practiced battle tactics, formation flying, and survival if we were shot down. The only business I know is that of serving my country in war. I had thought——" he hesitated a moment, wetting his lips and drawing them tight against his teeth. "I was preparing myself for aviation in the future—commercial aviation."

The story of the "Captain" represents the story of the discharged Army and Navy air pilot. What place do they have in the civilization they were instrumental in perpetuating through combat? Are they to be discarded because victory is ours?

Several years ago the Army and Navy Air Forces selected this "Captain" with the greatest of care. They were ready to spend from $100,000 up, toward his aviation training. He passed a perfect physical examination and was screened and rescreened. He was watched by training personnel to determine if he could stand the "gaff"—what made him tick, etc. He was put through vigorous physical and disciplinary training and if he "stood up" was assigned to flight training. Records show about one-third of cadet trainees were eliminated in primary flight school. Smaller percentages were eliminated in basic and advance until, at last, graduation day represented the "cream of the crop" of American manhood. They had to be good to meet the experienced pilots of our enemies.

Today, in victory, they are still the "cream of the crop" of American manhood and records prove they are the "cream of the crop" of all pilots. Older, of course, but tempered with the fire of experiences which make them even better. Yet, the fact remains, they cannot find jobs in commercial aviation.

Is it possible that our country and private industry is "missing the boat" by not utilizing the skill of the World War II pilot? Will they allow their great investment, and skilled manpower, to die a nautral death and go to seed? I think not. I believe in the progress and vision of the United States of America too much. I believe in justice and the freedom of each individual to pursue the vocation in which he is best fitted and in industry appropriate to happiness and security.

This is the air age. Five or six billion tonmiles of fresh fruits and vegetables are waiting to be shipped by air. Billions of tons of sea foods, medicine, tools, parts, consumer packages are waiting for the operation of a massive air freight transportation system.

The creation of an air freight transportation system will provide jobs, not only for the captain, but for his buddies—the ground crews. It will provide and guarantee our country a backlog of super, skilled pilots and aviation specialists for national security. It will provide a medium through which the east and west coasts will be drawn into a small community of prosperity and fellowship. And, over all, will provide the mechanics whereby earth will be shrunk into a community of nations and assure protection against the would-be gangster of the future who would use the unbelievable atomic energy to destroy civilization.

The Lone Star Which Became a Bright One

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of those in this country who can see for us nothing but a dark future, I quote the following editorial about your great State, entitled "Texas," which was published in the Lexington Gazette, of Lexington, Va., on May 14, 1846:

This glorious country, according to a writer in the Charleston Evening News, is likely to turn out one of the grandest humbugs of the age. Nine-tenths of the whole country consists of prairie wastes, which must remain for centuries an uncultivated wilderness. The climate is wretched.

If there should be any of our readers who wish to settle in Texas we advise them to make their last will and testament before they leave Rockbridge.

We are acquainted with a region which we can recommend to those who desire a really valuable and permanent home. There are no Indians to arouse the settler at midnight. The climate is delightful. Every variety of production rewards the husbandman. The people are moral and lawloving. There are churches and colleges in abundance. Such is old Virginia, and we advise those who live there to stay, and those who have left her to come back, especially if they have gone to Texas.

That beautiful young republic is to prove a bad bargain to Uncle Sam. We have taken her for better, for worse, and with her a host of ambitious politicians, with Samuel Houston at their head, to swell the enormous catalog of our own insatiate demagogs.

Conditions in the Distilled Spirits Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, at a time when so many herrings are being dragged across the trail and smoke screens thrown up to confuse conditions, my attention has been directed to an address by Frank R. Schwengel, president of the Distilled Spirits Institute, which comes like a fresh breeze into a smoke-filled room.

Mr. Schwengel delivered this address at the national conference of State liquor administrators in Atlantic City, N. J., on June 17.

Because of its frank and open discussion of the liquor situation in this country and because of its informative nature I have asked the House permission to reprint it in the RECORD at this time.

It is an honest and sincere effort to keep the record straight. Those who are trying to sneak in the back door with another "noble experiment" under the guise and subterfuge of postwar exigencies could do well to profit by the open and aboveboard example set by Mr. Schwengel. Of course, that would be asking too much, so we will let the matter rest at this moment by rereading Mr. Schwengel's remarks which now follow:

Today, perhaps more than at any time since repeal, the distilled spirits industry needs an honest, objective appraisal of its position.

The relationship we establish with the public today, that will find its fruition—for good or for bad—in the future years, may be compared to the spirits we distill today and carefully guard through the years to maturity.

This business of distilling is so essentially one of looking ahead that I take it as the theme of my discussion.

Our position in the reconversion picture is not a happy one nor is it so for any other industries. Conditions are trying and fraught with uncertainties. But, just as sure as the world is on the threshold of a new era, so also is our industry.

This signalizes the need for shaping our thinking, not to the tempo of the past, but to today's fast-moving trend of public sentiment.

HOW DO WE STAND WITH THE PUBLIC?

In one of his debates with Stephen Douglas, Abraham Lincoln said: "Public sentiment is everything. With public sentiment, nothing can fail; without it nothing can succeed. Consequently, he who molds public sentiment goes deeper than he who enacts statutes or pronounces decisions; he makes statutes and decisions possible and impossible to be enacted."

These words of wisdom express the whole philosophy of the power of public sentiment. In its application to our industry, so dependent upon favorable public opinion, there is particular significance.

Therefore, we ask the question, "How do we stand with the public?" Unless we are realistic in the analysis, should there come a test, we may awaken to the fact that we do not enjoy the measure of public respect to which we are entitled. Also, we should include an appraisal of liquor control itself; for in the public mind liquor control and the industry are inseparably associated. Hence, to evaluate our current stature, we must consider the industry and liquor control on a parallel footing.

THE INDUSTRY HAS COME A LONG WAY IN 13 YEARS

With some degree of pride, you as administrators and we as members of the liquor industry may both point to the benefits that liquor control has brought to the Nation. First among these benefits is the economic value of the new multi-billion-dollar distilled spirits industry itself, which offers employment and provides income directly and indirectly to hundreds of thousands of men and women, and upon which tens of thousands of businessmen depend. Next, there is the social benefit of legal control, which has displaced the reign of national immorality and corruption of the "roaring twenties." Third, and not the least of these benefits, is the $18,000,000,000 revenue derived by Government, States, and municipalities, and which is only an index of what was lost to the public coffers during prohibition.

Incidental thereto but nevertheless important are the industry's dramatic war production record, its record in patriotic and charitable war-fund campaigns, its war bond drives, very often led in your State by you gentlemen of liquor control. Also should be cited the industry's byproduct feed production, which aided so materially the Nation's war and postwar food programs.

These benefits are basically attributable to the return of liquor control, when the present industry had its origin. This record of progress, within the brief span of 13 years, would seem to be ample claim to sustained favorable public sentiment, had not this impressive record been offset to some degree by bad public reaction to our shortcomings, not all of which are within our power to correct.

The industry's record of progress is proof that the foresighted men of the industry sincerely believe and demonstrate that good conduct is good business. Also that there is a general attitude among the great mass of thinking men and women engaged in the industry to so conduct their business as to win and hold public approval. Yet many are too sublimely tolerant of break-downs in their own good intentions and blind to resulting bad conditions that irritate the public.

IS THE INDUSTRY A FREE ENTERPRISE?

In a recent speech, Chairman John F. O'Connell, of the New York State liquor authority, raised this question, "Is the alcoholic beverage industry truly a free enterprise?" His answer was that "it is a free enterprise so long as its operations are confined to the area and meet the standards defined and delineated in the alcoholic beverage control law." Under this interpretation a law-violating licensee suspends his own right to engage in the business.

Are bad conditions an indictment of the industry or of liquor control? Without shirking our individual responsibilities, let us see what the public complains about and within whose province the corrective measures lie.

How does the public regard the industry's products? While the conditions under which they are made, labeled and, to a certain extent, advertised and sold are prescribed by the laws and regulations of the Federal Government and by some State rules, the Federal Government's interest through the alcohol tax unit is largely that of protecting this revenue. So, the matter of product quality, about which the public has probably had some instances for complaint during the period of shortage, is the responsibility of the individual producer.

Normally, the policy of the Distilled Spirits Institute is not to interfere with purely competitive trade practices nor with the type of products that producers offer. But, when in a period of emergency such as the present, practices arise that harm the entire industry and cause unfavorable public reaction, then, we feel, such a situation cannot be ignored.

Shortages of prewar standard products have drawn into the market a mass of substandard emergency concoctions that hoodwink the public and are a plague to the industry's reputation. To make myself clear, I need mention only a couple of shining examples bearing the ingenuous labels of "rye," or "bourbon liqueurs."

These are reminiscent of some of the low standard Caribbean and Mexican alcohol products which mushroomed in the market several years ago.

Against this new evil the Distilled Spirits Institute has filed a vigorous protest with the Alcohol Tax Unit of the Internal Revenue Bureau, contending that such labeling and advertising, when obviously designed to play upon the public acceptance of the words "rye" and "bourbon" as connoting whisky, is misleading and unfair to the public.

In the State of Connecticut, whose enforcement officials are aware of possible deception, regulations require that an additional label be attached to every bottle of such mixture warning the consumer that this is "not a whisky." Must other States follow suit? Also, those distillers who are primarily concerned with the maintenance of traditional American whisky standards look with considerable disfavor upon the use of potato alcohol, when the law defines whisky a fermented mash of grain.

The public is entitled to the highest in quality, particularly in view of the high excise tax involved in every bottle, whether good or bad in quality.

Excise taxes on distilled spirits, including the average State tax, have risen from $1.76 per proof gallon in 1933 to the present level of $10.21. Obviously, in the 12 years since repeal, the tax slice per bottle has gone up enormously. As recently as 1939 the tax on a quart of 100-proof, 4-year-old or more whisky was only 80 cents. Today the tax on this same quart is $2.55, a 219 percent increase.

I offer you this analysis to emphasize the point that the public which pays this heavy tax is entitled to know what it buys, because the difference in price of the contents per bottle is minor, tax taken into consideration.

Furthermore, there has been considerable public and official agitation over the allocations of brands to the trade and in turn to the public. Although many standard articles of trade, including clothing, toothpaste, and cigarettes, were off the dealers' shelves for long periods, and although the necessity for rationing has been fully justified in the face of stringency of supplies, especially today, the public seems to think that distillers' barrels are bottomless. Of course, the basis of the public's complaints might be the method or equity of individual instances of rationing, tie-in sales, or price, rather than the policy of conservation itself. These by no means involve liquor control, but are problems of the individual distiller, wholesaler, or retailer concerned. But to stop these evils the Government and some of the States have taken action.

The next, and perhaps the most serious, public complaint is the licensed nuisance where regulation or moral control is disregarded. Obviously, the continued operation of such permittees is solely the responsibility of the licensing authority and the law enforcement agency. The public is altogether too prone to indict the industry as a whole for the existence of every offending bad outlet and every abuse. Actually, these abuses are tolerated under license, the revocation of which is the only legal way of putting them out of business.

The third basis of public agitation against the industry is the chronic alcoholic, who is also the cause of concern to public officials and the industry. According to eminent medical men who already have accomplished much toward scientific research and treatment of alcoholism, it has been found that the excessive use of alcohol is more often a result of weakness of body and mind rather than the other way round. It is a fallacy to believe that the alcoholic overindulges just because he likes alcohol. Essentially he is the victim of himself—his frustration and his weaknesses—a case for medical or psychiatric treatment. Upon the basis of these findings, we may challenge the inference that the alcoholic is basically a product of the tavern, or even of alcohol itself.

The industry is by no means running away from the problem of alcoholism. For some years it has encouraged and helped to support medical research and studies. Distillers have recognized this problem in their advertising and have sought to enlighten the public about it. There is also a growing interest in the subject of care and treatment of alcoholics on the part of State liquor control boards. So, in answer to the alcoholic as a source of public resentment, we may say that the interest and cooperation of the industry and of control officials are akin to the public's. Only science can solve the problem of the weakling who resorts to overindulgence.

What I desire to convey mainly is that while the public may be critical both of the industry and of liquor control for shortcomings that are really due to human frailty, there is need for a greater consciousness on the part of every segment of the industry to the rumblings and ground swells of public opinion as manifestations of conditions that the industry, as a unit, should seek to correct.

COORDINATING PUBLIC RELATIONS EDUCATION

While the industry, through its respective trade organizations, has done some excellent educational work, and, through the power of trade opinion and with the aid of liquor-control authorities, has improved conditions in many localities, the long anticipated and much desired consolidation of the two industry public relations organizations has now been achieved. Under the title of Licensed Beverage Industries, Inc., the combined organization is at work outlining an integrated program that is to thread its way down through the channels of producers, wholesalers, retailers, and tavern keepers.

By this means it is hoped that progressive steps will be taken in a program of self-discipline and education. Some of the delays and failures of the past have been probably due to the lack of clear recognition of just what the problems are, and the lack of definite assignment of responsibility for meeting them. At best, whatever the industry might be able to accomplish in a housecleaning campaign can merely supplement the work of the liquor-control authorities who must be depended upon to tighten law enforcement with firmness, justice, and speed. To organize for more effective action may require the spending of a greater proportion of public revenues received from alcoholic beverages, the exercising of a greater degree of selectivity in the type and qualification of licensees, and even perhaps the limiting of licenses.

We realize that administrators are frequently held responsible for the acts and omissions of local enforcement officials. All too often the enforcement of liquor laws does not rest solely with the State liquor administrators. In fact, enforcement may be several steps removed; for beyond the control officials' jurisdiction are the local agencies charged with the enforcement of laws, and, beyond those, the judicial determination of violations.

DRY ATTITUDE

Under the threat of world famine, the drys see an opportunity; and an organized cry has been set up against the use of grain for beverage purposes "while starving Europe pleads for bread." Of course that premise is false; for the distilling industry, under its present grain allowance, processes only a negligible amount of grain suitable for bread. That fact, however, does not lessen the onslaught of these people, some of whom are well-meaning, but who do not know the facts. They likewise believe that the industry is responsible for the sugar shortage.

Even the drys do not hope to bring about prohibition constitutionally, but have gone about it this time by adopting a program of infiltration—that of drying up area after area by local option.

The local option map of the Distilled Spirits Institute reveals that as of December 1945, 30.9 percent of the country by counties is now legally dry, compared with 69.1 percent legally wet. Population-wise, the country is 18.9 percent dry, and 81.1 percent wet. This ratio represents a net gain by the drys of only one-tenth of 1 percent over 1944, or a net gain in 1 year in dry population of 311,293.

The drys have made their greatest headway in the traditionally dry South. The most pronounced gains were in Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, and Virginia, where the drys piled up 281,974 of their net gain of 311,293.

According to the most recent Gallup poll on public sentiment toward continuation of the legal sale of alcoholic beverages, 67 percent of those with definite opinions indicated a favorable vote. This was a gain of 4 percent in wet sentiment over 1944.

Many of us are too likely to dismiss honest criticism of the industry as having been inspired by professional drys. Such an attitude disregards the manifest suspicion and distrust of the industry by large elements in our population who are not dry in any sense of the term, but who are honestly interested in the success of repeal and the efficacy of liquor control.

WHY PROHIBITION DOES NOT PROHIBIT

In order to get a proper perspective on the question of uncompromising prohibition as against legal control, there are a few simple facts that must be kept in mind:

(a) Laws did not and cannot prevent the undercover production of alcohol.

(b) Laws did not and cannot prevent alcohol's use and sale. The desire to use and the will to supply are governed by inherent appetites and greed; these forces no law can wholly eliminate.

(c) As may anything else that is potentially harmful when used to excess, alcoholic beverages may be harmful when used immoderately. But excesses were more prevalent during the period before repeal than they have been since. Possibly more people drink now, but they drink more moderately and they drink better beverages.

(d) Therefore, prohibition does not and never did actually prohibit. It merely drives the production, sale, and consumption of liquor underground with attendant evils, and deprives the Government and States of large revenue.

THE PROBLEM OF PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY

In the realm of industry guesswork and discussion, the question of production and supply is currently in the limelight. Despite early postwar hopes for free, competitive production, the relief of world famine conditions has taken more and more of the Nation's vast reserves of grain, thus curtailing the use of grain for beverage distilling purposes.

While it is hoped that, as new and bountiful crops are harvested, the grain situation will ease, a realistic appraisal indicates that the industry may face restricted allotment of grain through 1946 and until the fall of 1947.

Despite the curtailment of use and inventory of grains, the industry, in response to an urgent appeal of Fiorello LaGuardia, Director General of UNRRA, pledged the contribution to the famine-relief program of 50,000,000 pounds of grain or the equivalent in cash. Each distiller's contribution was based on recent grain allocations by the Department of Agriculture. Thus far 19,000,000 pounds of grain have been shipped to UNRRA, practically all of which has been contributed by the historic beverage producers.

What is the supply situation? How does the present grain curtailment affect the supply? When may the public be able to obtain readily its favorite brands of properly matured whisky?

Here are the answers as I see them—

(1) As of April 30, 1946, the supply of mature whisky in stock in Internal Revenue bonded warehouses was only sufficient to last at the present rate of withdrawals approximately 2⅓ years. There was no whisky production in 1943, and the small amount produced in 1944 will not mature until the fall of 1948.

(2) The present famine diet of grain allocation, if continued for the balance of the year, will permit a production for the last 8 months equal to only about two-thirds of the amount produced the first 4 months of 1946.

(3) The public may not expect to obtain on call its favorite prewar brands at dealers until late 1949 or 1950.

These conclusions are based on simple arithmetic. Here are the facts:

During the 42 wartime months, October 1942 to August 1945, inclusive, the beverage distilling industry had a total of but 86 full days of beverage production. As you know, that production was surrounded by many restrictions.

From September 1, 1945, to June 30, 1946, a total period of 303 days, the industry has been permitted to operate a total of 64½ full days and is still under highly restrictive provisions as to kind of grain and as to feed recovery requirements. Also, approximately 40 percent of the grain allocated for beverage spirits production went to industrial alcohol plants or to commercial alcohol and war alcohol plants, which are not regarded as historic beverage distillers.

Based upon available whisky stocks, the output of individual company brands must be predicated upon their respective aged stock positions. For the industry as a whole, at the end of December 1941, stocks of domestic whisky were 510,930,000 original proof gallons. Production of whisky for the 4 years and 4 months ending April 30, 1946, was 250,068,204 gallons, while withdrawals during the same period were 304,219,400 tax gallons, leaving stock on hand as of April 30, 1946, of 370,268,246 original proof gallons.

Projecting these stocks for available use we must deduct the 1944, 1945, and 1946 production as immature, and deduct from the remaining inventory estimated losses by evaporation and leakage. Accounting for these deductions we have:

	Original proof gallons
Whisky stocks in warehouses Apr. 30, 1946	370,268,246
Deduct 1944, 1945, and 1946 production as immature	173,497,798
Total	196,770,448
	Proof gallons
Less evaporation losses (estimated 22 percent)	43,289,498
Balance available mature whisky Apr. 1, 1946	153,480,950

To assure a continuity of mature whisky, this balance must be spread over a period of several years or until the production of 1944, 1945, and 1946 becomes of age. Withdrawals from stocks during 1945 were 60,000,000 gallons, withdrawals during the first 4 months of 1946 were 22,000,000 gallons or at an annual rate of 66,000,000 gallons. It would appear that this rate of withdrawal cannot be increased, and to maintain continuity may have to be reduced. An alternative would be a change in whisky blend formulas and a further reduction in shipments of straight and bonded whisky. Any marked increase in withdrawals at this time would make more merchandise available only temporarily, and would cause a shortage before the present production is matured, a shortage more critical than that of 1943.

It is imperative that we bear in mind that the stocks on hand represent the backlog of the combined industry, and there have been, particularly of late, some heavy individual accumulations of inventory by other than historic beverage distillers. But, in the main, it becomes a problem for each supplier, upon the basis of his own stocks and continuities, to decide for himself the rate at which he can afford to dispense the lifeblood of his business and get the wherewithal to sustain himself in future years.

UTILIZATION OF FUTURE GRAIN SURPLUSES

I already have mentioned the industry's feed-recovery program, which contributed much to the Nation's food supply during the war.

Through the cooperation of the Distilled Spirits Institute, the Kentucky Distillers Association, and the Maryland Distillers Association, the Feed Grain Council was formed to explore more fully the potentials of the industry's byproducts.

Recently the Feed Grain Council was given the opportunity to unfold the industry's grain-processing program to a distinguished group of members of the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture and officials of the Department of Agriculture. The council is now planning to familiarize the trade and the public with this vital economic development.

Before the Senate Committee on Agriculture on May 14, 1946, Mr. Norris E. Dodd, Under Secretary of Agriculture, said: "When the present food crisis ends, American farmers fear a difficult job in readjusting their production to fit peacetime needs. This will be particularly true for crops, like corn, that were expanded greatly as farmers responded patriotically to wartime demands. As they enter this period of readjustment, farmers look to science and research to find new uses for their products."

The war and its urgent needs accelerated the application of science by the distilling industry to complete use of grains. This activity may well contribute to the salvation of the farmer when grain production abundance resolves itself into grain surpluses and a struggle to obtain fair prices.

Protest Against Un-American Government Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, I desire to incorporate in the RECORD a piece of publicity that recently came to my office. I commend the reading of this to my colleague, as it shows the beginning of what may become a Nation-wide protest against what the New Deal is doing to us.

CONSUMER PROTEST MEETING (NONPOLITICAL) AGAINST PRESENT UN-AMERICAN GOVERNMENT REGULATIONS

Are you able to obtain repairs for your machinery or to buy necessary new farm equipment?

Are you able to obtain building material for the necessary repairs of your buildings?

With more livestock on the farms in this community than ever before in history, are you able to obtain meat for your table or butter for your bread—what bread?

As a discharged veteran, is the Government fulfilling its promise to you or are you getting the run-around?

Are you able to buy overalls to work in or a new suit for dress wear?

In what condition is your automobile and tires?

Would you like to take the hay wire out of the bureaucratic Government boards and put it on the farms where it is needed?

Do you know there are 27,000 paid Government propagandists spending $75,000,000 to perpetuate their activities?

How long are you willing to pay 3,000,000 bureaucratic Government employees for creating one emergency after another to keep themselves in office?

If you are opposed to these things, attend the protest meeting at the Delano High School Auditorium, Friday, June 28, 9 p. m.

Compton (Calif.) Paper Editorial Different

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent so to do having been granted me, I take pleasure in calling attention of the Members of Congress to the following editorial entitled "Tomorrow's Leaders." It appeared in the Compton Journal, which is published at Compton, Calif., which important city is in the Eighteenth District of California, which I have the honor to represent in Congress.

The pertinency and appropriateness of this editorial is so self-evident that I am sure that all readers will immediately recognize same.

TOMORROW'S LEADERS

With the death during the past few weeks of a number of prominent California leaders, one wonders on whose shoulders the mantle of leadership will fall tomorrow.

The State has absorbed a tremendous population during the past decade, including vast numbers of children who have had to be crowded into schools designed for only a normal yearly increase in school population. So far as facilities of the various character-building agencies are concerned, as many of these children as could be attracted into the activities of such organizations have joined Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, Woodcraft Rangers, YMCA's, YWCA's, church organizations for young people, and other groups where training for leadership is emphasized.

How effectively the schools and the character-building institutions will do their work remains to be shown in due time. Leadership is an inherent trait that needs development by people versed in child psychology and training. Little or none of it can be instilled in a youth in which it is not germane. However, by teaching the essentials of leadership to all young minds, the ability to follow competent leadership can be developed, and there is no doubt that a little "followship" ability will be needed unless we want a citizenry made up entirely of leaders.

It is doubtful if any of our great national leaders from * * * turn prepared himself by learning everything that could be garnered about a lot of subjects, and in each case it was not only the education they gathered the hard way, but the self-discipline that came from getting their education, that made them the great leaders they ultimately became. So tomorrow's problems will find their own leaders to help solve them.

Profit Sharing Versus Industrial Strife

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, on January 14, 1946, I introduced House Resolution 481 on profit sharing. The following article from the Christian Science Monitor is interesting in that connection:

PROFIT SHARING ONE WAY TO LABOR PEACE
(By George Ericson)

While major strikes, at present, no longer threaten the country's return to some approximation of industrial normalcy, the need for a wise and firm labor policy is as urgent as ever. Other and less dangerous work stoppages will no doubt be numerous throughout the balance of the year but, since a temporary wage pattern has been set, they will probably be settled quickly on a basis comparable to that in the motor, steel, coal, and rail controveries.

It will be months from now before the full effects of the strikes are apparent. In the meantime, the search for proper legislation to minimize or prevent industrial strife will go on despite statements that industrial peace cannot be legislated. Laws, nevertheless, are the crystallization of what society regards as right and reasonable behavior under varying conditions, and laws can and must call for punishment when its directives are disregarded. The rise and fall of the Case bill and the passage of the Hobbs antiracketeering bill are halting steps on the road toward acceptable relationships between labor and management.

NEED OF UNDERSTANDING AND GOOD WILL

This column holds no brief for more laws to induce men or organizations to work together in amity or cooperatively. The true basis of labor peace is understanding and good will. And while efforts toward this end may be slow, progress is certainly being made.

There are a number of approaches today toward satisfying organized labor in its search for an adequate and stable income. Prominent among these is profit sharing, which has had sporadic trials for over 100 years. Then there is the guaranteed annual wage and the wage-incentive plan. Important, too, in aiding security of income are agreements which provide for dismissal compensation and for observing seniority when work slackens and lay-offs follow.

The guaranteed annual wage plans now in operation are being studied by a Federal group of experts under the direction of Murray W. Latimer, former chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board, and Arthur S. Meyer, chairman of the New York State Mediation Board. A report may be expected before long on methods of regularizing production and stabilizing employment. Working on the same problem are the Brookings Institution and the Harvard School of Business Administration.

It is understood that these two groups are interchanging information with the Government commission. Out of these studies should come authoritative data and analysis helpful in eliminating the insecurity which is held to be a leading cause of labor unrest.

EMPLOYEE SEEN AS PARTNER

Profit sharing is seen by many to be the answer to workers' dissatisfaction. Labor should not be treated as a cost of production, is the assertion, but the employee should be regarded as a partner. He should receive first a fixed amount keyed to the prevailing wage rate in the particular industry; and second, he should get, in addition, a share of the net profit after taxes and reserves, but before dividends. There are numerous variations of profit-sharing plans, but the basic idea is to induce workers to put increased or consistently effective effort into their labor, since they have a stake in operations which are profitable.

There are a number of things which militate against the success of profit-sharing schemes. The foremost of these is the fact that in a profit-and-loss economy there are scores of thousands of concerns which, in some years, have no profits to share, but are obliged to report losses. When this happens to be the case, the workers do not share in the losses, but often, nevertheless, are disgruntled because they get only their regular wage when they had hoped or had been led to believe that profits would be divided.

UNION LEADERS' OBJECTIONS

Dissatisfaction here, of course, results from lack of understanding. Workers employed in an industry strongly affected by the business cycle must be made to see that unless hard times can be eliminated, there just will be no profits to distribute. The fact that a considerable number of union leaders are not enthusiastic about profit-sharing plans is due to their belief that such plans are used to keep wages and salaries at lower levels than they could gain through organized unionism.

One leader stated that often such a plan creates the mistaken idea in the minds of employees that such plans make them partners in industry and divert their attention from unionism. It seems to become a substitute for collective bargaining. Another said, "Profit sharing, as practiced by a number of corporations * * * has created suspicion and distrust because the workers know nothing about the basis upon which the profits were distributed."

Another weakness in the profit-sharing idea is the presumption that profit fluctuations are largely determined by efficiency of labor. But it can readily be seen that the level of profits in any given year may be due to various factors, in which often labor has no part or control.

PRODUCTION, NOT PROFIT, KEY

Still another misapprehension is the notion that extra pay should be apportioned regardless of production results. This has been emphasized by T. Dwight Williams, president of the American Institute of Accountants, who said recently that "a plan which will provide incentive to greater production by promising labor a fair share in the increased wealth it creates is wholly desirable, but such compensation must be tied to production, not profits."

A survey of profit-sharing plans just completed by the National Industrial Conference Board reveals that out of 161 true profit-sharing plans, 60 percent had been abandoned. Reasons assigned for discontinuance were dissatisfaction by labor or management, lack of profits, concerns changing ownership, and others going out of business.

An illuminating observation was the statement that if all companies had been on a profit-sharing basis in the years 1936–39, most of the plans would assuredly have been junked, since Revenue Bureau returns showed that in that 4-year period 60 percent of all firms reported no taxable income.

PLANS THAT ARE SUCCESSFUL

There are, however, profit-sharing programs that have been eminently successful. One such started by Procter & Gamble Co. has been operating for 52 years. The plan is not strictly related to profits, since the employee makes a contribution too. He receives a profit-sharing credit of 5 to 15 percent of his wages, dependent upon length of service.

A profit-sharing plan called unique in American industry was announced last week by L. H. B. Klotz, president of the Luscombe Airplane Co., Dallas, Tex. It calls for the distribution to nearly 1,000 employees of one-third of the company's net profit before taxes. Luscombe's head said that this bonus would be paid at the close of each quarter, provided that such bonus is 1 percent or more of the total pay roll for that quarter. If less than 1 percent, no bonus would be paid for that quarter, but the unpaid balance will be added to the next quarter's bonus account. All earnings, including overtime, shift differential, and vacation pay, are included in the gross pay roll for purposes of calculating bonus.

SHARING SUPERIOR TO UNIONISM

An outstanding plan is that of the companies controlled by Eric A. Johnston in the State of Washington, in which 25 percent of net profits before taxes is allotted to employees. Another variation, something in the nature of a wage-incentive plan, is the Kaiser-Frazer scheme, by which the company is to pay a bonus of $5 a car, which is to be put in a fund to be paid periodically to employees who have stayed on the job 90 percent of their scheduled time and who have refrained from joining in any proscribed labor activities.

The fact that many profit-sharing plans have been allowed to lapse is no evidence that they do not have much to commend them. It must be emphasized that they are an approach to a desired end: industrial peace based on equity. There should be no cessation of the advocacy of the thesis that labor and management have a common goal: increased production at ever-lower cost. As more companies find a way to share the benefits of expanded output with the workers, the latter will more and more think of themselves as partners. This is a goal superior to unionism.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to place in the RECORD an article written by David Lawrence appearing in the Evening Star under date of June 26, 1946, discussing the failure of the administration to control prices:

LABOR-UNION STRATEGY VIRTUALLY KILLED OPA—FAILURE TO HOLD THE LINE SOUNDED DEATH KNELL TO PRICE CONTROL

(By David Lawrence)

These are days of strange paradoxes. Labor-union leaders are crying out that the OPA must be saved, when the truth is that labor-union strategy in major industries has virtually killed the OPA and brought on an unparalled wave of inflation.

The moment one economic group in the community insisted on forcing up costs and threatened to paralyze production and distribution unless its wage demands were met and the moment the President of the United States failed to hold the scales even and granted wage-cost increases, the death knell of effective price control in America was sounded.

The form in which OPA is now continued is secondary. The effect of the amendments made to pending legislation is to permit producers to add wage costs to their prices. So all the hullabaloo about saving the OPA is academic. Price control for all practical purposes has been killed by the President of the United States through his policy of wage inflation.

READS ONLY OF CONGRESS

The country reads only what Congress is doing at present. The defenders of the OPA program are criticizing Congress and stirring up a propaganda from coast to coast to give the impression that chaos will result if the OPA bill is killed. There was a time quite recently when many observers, including this correspondent, believed that run-away inflation might follow the abolition of the OPA. But the events which the Nation has witnessed on the labor front, where wage costs were officially boosted by the White House and prices necessarily increased, make the OPA and price control of much less importance.

The OPA should, of course, be retained, but only as part of a national program of fighting inflation by freezing wage costs. But the President is too timid about restraining the labor front from forcing run-away prices, and he has thus contributed by his policy to the inflationary trend. Hence, OPA cannot prevent the price level from rising any more

The black markets, which are flourishing, might have been broken up by a sensible program combining wage and price control.

The effort to increase production by means of subsidies has not been as effective as its sponsors predicted. Shortages are still prevalent and scarce goods find their way to black markets. Production in many lines is retarded or stopped altogether because of OPA rulings. Enormous losses have resulted.

The President will soon have to decide whether to veto or sign the OPA extension bill. He doesn't like the measure, but if he wants a semblance of price supervision and if he wishes the OPA to remain as a going concern in a small way, he might better sign the proposal. If he does veto it, the measure probably will be passed over his veto. If it isn't, there is little chance for a resolution to pass continuing OPA as is. This has been the last resort hope of the administration manipulators of the OPA bill, but they will take a big risk if they persuade the President to veto the bill with that move in mind.

ECONOMIC GROUPS FIGHT

The problem is, to be sure, a contest between economic groups, and recent developments deserve to be studied as an example of what happens when a politically dominated democracy tries controlled economy. In the first place, the whole success of any program of restraint on prices or wages depends on a bit of self-denial by all economic groups, but it depends mostly on a leadership that has the trust and confidence of the groups themselves

Whatever confidence the management groups had in the President was gradually dispelled by his relinquishment of virtually all controls over wages while he insisted on price controls. Then, instead of balancing the economy by holding wages down, the President capitulated to the cause of political expediency. If there had been in the White House a man who could have retained the confidence of all economic groups, there would not be any debate on OPA today. Public opinion would have supported a constructive program. But the President's own friends—the labor union leaders who demanded substantial wage increases above prewar levels—really destroyed the OPA.

No matter what diminished controls are permitted now through an extension of the present law, price control is on the way out altogether. The conscientious work that many men did to fight inflation through the OPA has been rendered virtually useless by politics in the White House, and, of course, by counterpolitics in Congress.

Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable James A. Farley, chairman of the board, the Coca-Cola Export Corp., on a program sponsored by the Community Committee of New York To Aid the United Jewish Appeal, over Station WNYC, New York City, June 27, 1946:

Fellow New Yorkers, we who live in the greatest city of the world have always taken pride in our town, and for many just reasons. Seven million people demonstrate from day to day that it is possible for people of all faiths and creeds, from every walk of life, to work together and to live together in harmony and in the spirit of good will. For this reason, I feel privileged to speak to you this evening on behalf of a problem which concerns us all.

This month there have been celebrations in various parts of the world commemorating victory in war. It is true that in many war-torn countries help from the rest of the world still is needed, but the people of those nations are confident of rebuilding their lives and their homes on their own soil. Yes; for most of the world the war ended a year ago, but for one small group of people the battle for survival continues. I speak of the one and a half million Jewish people who are alive in Europe today. Six million of their friends and relatives were exterminated in one of the most inhuman programs of cruelty in world history. These one and a half million who survived are objects of wonder to the rest of the world. Miraculously they survived years of physical torture, years of horrible experiences. But their survival has only been a reprieve, because these are people without homes, without families, without a country, without a hope. They still wander throughout Europe searching pitifully and hopelessly for some remnant of their families, knowing only too well that those they seek are in the ash heaps of the gas chambers.

The most pitiful of all are the children—2,000,000 killed, 150,000 left. These children are considered the strong ones; they, too, survived the terrors of concentration camps; they, too, spent the greatest part of their young lives living in constant hiding. Today these youngsters, going to school for the first time, run in fright when they hear the school bell ring. They remember that the ringing bells were the signal for them to be herded off into cattle cars to the gas chambers. They remember, too, the sight of their mothers and fathers being killed, sometimes before their very eyes.

Yes, they are a pitiful sight. But, as we pity them, we must remember that these Jews who survived Hitler's mad plan of mass murder are a symbol today of what Hitler had hoped to do to the rest of the world. These Jews were merely the steppingstone to Hitler's desire to conquer the world and rule all people of all faiths. And that is why the fate of these people must be the concern of the rest of the world.

As a New Yorker, therefore, and as an American, I feel privileged to be a member of the Community Committee of New York To Aid the United Jewish Appeal. Other leaders in civic and religious life, under the chairmanship of Nelson A. Rockefeller, have organized this nonsectarian group to assist the United Jewish Appeal raise the funds necessary for the rescue and rehabilitation of Hitler's victims.

This is no matter of charity, it is a "task of simple humanity which must enlist the support of Americans of all faiths."

Your support will do more than provide mere physical relief—it will give hope to the survivors. * * * It will give them back their faith in the rest of the world.

I hope you will respond to this call in a very concrete way—by sending your contributions to the Community Committee of New York, at 30 Rockefeller Plaza. Your gift will be the most effective demonstration of American democracy and good will.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the Marquette (Mich.) Mining Journal of June 17, 1946]

MORE TIME AT HOME

The Senate, by a vote of 49 to 16, has passed and sent to the House a bill to reorganize Congress. It appears doubtful whether final action will be taken on the legislation in the current session, but one of its provisions deserves wider discussion than it has thus far received. It is the section which would permit Congress to adjourn every year on June 30, except in times of national emergency, and reconvene on the second Tuesday in October.

The Constitution requires that "neither House during the session of the Congress shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than 3 days." The present measure, popularly known as the La Follette bill, is so worded as to get around the restriction. Under its provisions, Congress could be called back in session by the Presiding Officer of either House, or by the joint action of majority and minority leaders. As written, therefore, the bill actually provides for "conditional adjournment," which means that Congress would exercise some control over Presidential acts even while away from Washington. At the same time, the President, acting through congressional leaders, could call Congress into session.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, chairman of the joint committee which drafted the bill, contends that representative democracy cannot remain truly representative if elected Members are required to remain away from their constituencies for long periods of time. In recent years, Congress has been in almost continuous session. LA FOLLETTE insists that because of this condition Congress and the people have been denied the interchange of ideas so necessary to our system of government.

Senator TAFT has argued that fixing a definite date for adjournment might encourage filibusters. He fears also that if Congress adjourned over the summer months its Members would go on vacation outside their own States.

The issue is important because it has a direct relation to the provision in the same bill which would provide for 50-percent salary increases in Congress. That recommendation has been defended by some on the ground that Congress now has to spend more time on the job than it did when the present $10,000 salary was adopted in 1925. Twenty years ago the average time spent in session was less than 200 days a year. Since 1940, however, congressional sessions have run about 350 days a year, although Congress recessed for 68 days in 1943 and for a total of 104 days in 1944. The 1945 session covered 353 days, in which time the House was in recess for 45 days and the Senate for 35 days. It is pointed out that adoption of the adjournment provision would limit congressional sessions to about 250 days, which would tend to weaken the argument for the salary increase.

Quite apart from other considerations, the point made by LA FOLLETTE that Congress does not have enough time to spend at home is a valid one. The Members serve as representatives of States and districts and they should have the benefit of first-hand knowledge of what is going on in those places. Whether that can be guaranteed through the proposed legislation is something that Congress probably is in the best position to decide.

[From the Lansing (Mich.) State Journal of June 14, 1946]

STREAMLINING CONGRESS

A measure to overhaul and modernize the Nation's lawmaking machinery is regarded as having a fighting chance of becoming law during this session of Congress following its surprising and overwhelming approval by the Senate.

In addition to providing a blueprint for modernization of Congress, the legislation provides for a 50-percent pay boost for the legislators, plus pension privileges.

As approved by the Senate, the bill would—

Reduce the number of Senate standing committees from 33 to 15 to lighten the burden of lawmakers, some of whom serve on eight or nine committees.

Increase congressional salaries from $10,000 to $15,000 a year.

Expand the Congressman's technical and administrative assistance, with each committee being assigned four experts and each lawmaker an $8,000-a-year administrative assistant.

Create a pension system which would allow Members of Congress to contribute voluntarily to a retirement fund.

Eliminate many of Congress' routine tasks.

Tighten fiscal controls by requiring Congress to go on record in favor of an increase in the national debt each time estimated appropriations are above income anticipated for the next fiscal year.

In some respects, including the provisions for a 50-percent pay boost and pension system and administrative assistants, the legislation has the appearance of a means of making the lot of a lawmaker a happier one. Some of the modernization contemplated seems to be in step with the modern trend toward higher living standards and more pay for less work.

Many persons have greeted the legislation with cheers, however, pointing out that it will do away with cumbersome procedure and enable Congress to render better service to the Nation. If the measure does have that effect, few Americans will begrudge the additional tax dollars which the streamlining program will cost them.

Some of the provisions, such as the reduction of committees and the abandonment of outmoded practices which have taken too much of the Congressmen's time, undoubtedly will pay dividends in the form of better service from Congress.

There is, however, another aspect of the matter which should not escape the attention of the people. It is the fact that when Congress fails to serve the best interests of the Nation, it is more likely to be due to personal defects than to defects in the lawmaking machinery. No matter how streamlined the machinery becomes, Congress won't give the best possible service as long as the personal faults remain.

Whatever laws may be enacted to modernize lawmaking machinery, the primary requirement will continue to be for a deep sense of responsibility to the Nation's welfare. No modernization of Congress can legislate into Congressmen who do not possess it such a sense of responsibility or willingness to put the Nation's present and future welfare ahead of their personal political futures. There are, of course, a considerable number of lawmakers who do have this sense of responsibility.

Thus, while Congress busies itself with modernization of the lawmaking machinery, the voters must concern themselves with personal qualifications of the lawmakers, realizing that no matter how modern the machinery is, the Nation still must have capable and responsible Congressmen at the controls. The modernization measure is described as tradition shattering. The tradition that Congress should sincerely and courageously serve the Nation is one that must not be broken.

[From the Marquette (Mich.) Mining Journal of June 17, 1946]

TOWARD A BETTER CONGRESS

Congressional reorganization, long talked about, took a big step forward when the Senate approved the La Follette bill. Raises in the salaries of Senators and Congressmen need not monopolize attention when the measure contains many fundamental changes in procedure aimed to create a more effective legislative body.

Chief among these is the joint session of the four revenue-raising and appropriations committees of the two Houses to estimate revenues and expenditures and give Congress and the Nation a comprehensive view of Federal finances. If the new joint committee estimates at the beginning of the session that expenditures will outrun receipts, a concurrent resolution by both Houses raising the debt limit would be required.

Congress under this procedure would not stumble by separate appropriations into an unbalanced budget, but would face the issue from the start. Many Members of Congress who vote for appropriations so willingly would hesitate to commit themselves at the opening of Congress to an unbalanced budget.

A reduction of the number of committees is accompanied by giving each one of them an economic staff. Too frequently Senators and Representatives have been at the mercy of experts employed by special interests. Individual Members of Congress cannot be authorities on most of the matters that call for their decision. The public interest is served by having experts at the elbow of Congressmen to give them guidance through the maze of complicated problems they are called on to solve.

Is Our Government Going To Destroy the Future Economic Welfare of the Rice Industry?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herewith copy of a statement under the above caption by the Honorable Frank A. Godchaux, of Louisiana, who has large interests in my district in the rice industry.

Mr. Godchaux is regarded as one of the leading authorities on the rice industry in the United States.

The article follows:

Authorities in Washington have now had several years of experience in trying to control the price and the distribution of the United States rice crop by Government order. They have established ceilings on rough and clean rice prices and they tell the millers where they can sell their output. They have up to now acted contrary to the recommendations made by the members of the Rice Industry Advisory Committee.

One result has been that Blue Rose rice, with a mill ceiling of $6.50 per hundred pounds in bulk form, is now retailing in some sections of the country at as high as $30 per hundred, when the maximum retail price based on the mill ceiling should not be more than $12 or $13 per hundred, even in package form. Black markets in long grain are being operated in proportion.

Another result which seems to have been entirely overlooked by Washington authorities has been that the American public is now forced to turn to other foods than rice. Those interested in the rice industry have been working for years toward increasing the per capita consumption of rice in the United States. Naturally, whatever progress has been made toward this end is now being lost. We get numerous letters from all over the United States from institutions, hospitals, individuals who have been placed on rice diets by doctors' orders, and many others who just plain like rice and can't get it.

Dietary habits change slowly. It is not surprising that in the heavy rice-eating sections of this country, buying pressure is so strong that black-market operators can get almost any price they ask for rice, thus making it highly profitable to those who are inclined to evade Government price regulations, and it is obvious that the experience of the past year or two has served as only a rehearsal for full-scale evasion during the coming season unless some change is made in Government regulations and/or enforcement machinery. This will mean that the rice program will break down completely, and industry leadership will be shifted from the efficient to the unscrupulous.

It is surprising that apparently no one in authority in Washington has thought of adopting a rice program that would remove the profit and the incentive from price evasion. It would be a simple matter to make the black market in rice unprofitable. We now produce more than twice as much rice as we consume in this country. If it were known that the domestic trade would be allowed to purchase whatever rice it needs from the coming crop, buying pressure would be removed, and there would be no incentive for speculators to obtain rice at above ceiling prices by underhanded methods.

We should likewise allocate an ample supply of American grown rice to our only remaining natural Western Hemisphere markets in Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Hawaiian and Virgin Islands. If and when it is necessary, these off-shore shipments could be controlled by licensing. Ample allocations to these markets would make it unnecessary and unprofitable for buyers to offer secret premiums. Orderly merchandising in these markets would go far toward retaining them as customers when conditions are normal and when we will need them badly.

The authorities in Washington seem to think it is necessary to cut down on our continental rice consumption in order to obtain food for export to the Far East. They don't seem to realize that whatever rice is retained for use in this country will release an equivalent amount of some other food. Since 95 percent of the world's rice production is in the Far East, and since they are normally heavy exporters of rice, it is obvious that we could never hope to create a regular demand for United States grown rice in that part of the world, but we could hope to create a demand for other good food commodities which we might supply them at this time in the place of rice.

We get daily reports from sources that are supposed to be reliable, showing very unfortunate mishandling of the food-supply situation in the Far East. According to this information, it is believed that in Siam alone there are hoards of old rice amounting to, at least, 1,000,000 tons. Rice experts are convinced that there are also hoards of between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 tons now in the interior of Burma. Placing these estimates at the minimum of 2,000,000 tons would mean that they now have approximately 45,000,000 pockets of exportable rice in rice-producing areas of the Far East. Until recently, Great Britain was supposed to get all of Siam's surplus rice on a reparation basis at no cost to Great Britain, and even now the highest price we have seen offered by Britain for these oriental rice surpluses is approximately $2.28 per 100 pounds.

It seems unbelievable that the United States Government is paying more than $8 per 100 pounds for rice grown in this country to be shipped half way around the world at tremendous additional transportation costs, and that even on the basis of these prices they have moved during the season now closing less than 5,000,000 pockets when all reports indicate that they have around 45,000,000 pockets of rice in hiding in the same areas that our Government is trying to serve.

This policy seems even more unbelievable after reading in the Washington Daily Reporter System of June 12 that the continued practice of using rice for fuel in Siam has contributed to the slowness of getting Siamese rice out to needy neighboring nations. If our Government and Great Britain would offer a reasonable price for this local rice, and if they would offer these orientals the machinery, tools, and other goods they want, all this rice would be available, and it would not be necessary for us to pay four or five times as much for our rice as they now offer for the local rice.

Another result would be that our own rice would be released for the domestic market, and for natural Western Hemisphere markets which would automatically eliminate black markets in rice, and would at the same time be cultivating our domestic rice consumption and our natural markets so that we would have a ready outlet for our rice surpluses when conditions are normal again. This policy would help our economy now, and for future years, and our friends in the Orient would also be better served.

Or will the Government aid the industry by:

First. Allocating sufficient supplies for the domestic market.

Second. Supplying natural Western Hemisphere markets in Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Virgin Islands.

Third and last. Exporting remaining surplus to foreign markets.

Then the economic welfare of the rice-producing sections of the United States will prosper and not be destroyed when the country becomes normal again.

Inter-American Military Cooperation

REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the inter-American military cooperation proposal, which has been unanimously approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee, must be looked upon as a danger, rather than a support, to the principles of American and pan-American democracy. I say this because it is clearly and generally recognized that many of the Latin-American countries do not now have democratic forms of government. The placing of weapons of war in the hands of any such countries, dominated by undemocratic and in many instances antidemocratic regimes, runs exactly contrary to our expressed interest in the spread of peaceful and democratic ideals. What insurance do we have that such weapons would not get into the hands of existing Latin-American dictatorships for the purpose of retaining their dictatorial powers? What is the excuse for a military alliance with countries avowedly opposed to the principles of democracy?

My colleagues may be interested in a brief report, prepared for the National Committee To Win the Peace, reviewing the present political situation in a number of Latin-American countries. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a portion of this report and respectfully urge that its contents be kept in mind when the question of an inter-American military cooperation act comes before the floor of the House:

During the last days of the siege of Berlin, Herr Doktor Joseph Goebbels addressed the German nation and the world over the radio—warning that the Russians were ringing an iron curtain down upon Europe.

The phrase has caught on. Winston Churchill did his bit to popularize it. The iron curtain is not only the common currency of the American and British press these days, but has also become a cliché of Anglo-American diplomacy.

Perhaps it is time to give an old adage a new twist—something about people who draw their own iron curtains not insisting that their neighbors live in glass houses.

What goes on behind the iron curtain which screens the American sphere of influence from the rest of the world—and hides the dark secrets of Latin America even from the people of the United States?

We don't pretend to have the X-ray vision to answer that question. But here are a few undisputed facts which suggest that it is a pertinent one. The facts have to do with matters of major concern to the United States, if one is to judge by our Government's preachments to the nations of eastern Europe.

FREE ELECTIONS

In the Dominican Republic there have been no free elections since 1930, when President Generalissimo Doctor Raphael Leonidas Trujillo y Molina seized power. Trujillo abolished all opposition parties, set up his own Partido Dominicano. After ruling, from 1938 to 1942, through a stooge, Trujillo put himself back on the presidential throne by running as the candidate of two parties of his own—the Dominicano and the Trujillista. The only neon sign in the capital of the Dominican Republic, renamed Ciudad Trujillo, reads: "Trujillo Forever." Every school and public building bears the words "Era of Trujillo." Every automobile license plate carries the phrase: "Viva Trujillo!"

The benefactor of the fatherland, restorer of the financial independence, liberator of the nation, and protector of beaux arts and letters rules in the name of God and Trujillo.

In Paraguay the people's choice, Gen. Higinio Morinigo, succeeded to the Presidency in 1940 and retained the brutalized, tyrannical regime of his predecessor. Morinigo reelected himself in 1942 by preventing opposition parties from presenting candidates. He seized power as an army man and has retained power through the army ever since the Paraguayan National Congress has been dissolved.

Bolivia's President and Argentina's tool, Col. Gualberto Villaroel, took office after the coup d'état of December 1943. Nazi complicity in this coup is fully described and documented in the State Department's Argentine Blue Book of February 1946.

By using terror against his opponents and rigging the 1944 elections, the MNR Party won control of the new Congress, which continued Villaroel in the Presidency. The official electorate in Bolivia is so limited by property and educational restrictions that less than 13 percent is permitted to go to the polls.

But Villaroel and his MNR fear even that 13 percent. On May 30 they clamped down a state of siege, under which all constitutional guaranties have been suspended and a rigid press censorship prevails.

In Nicaragua, where President Anastasio Somoza has held office since 1930, there are neither elections nor candidates. Somoza at one time talked of leaving the Presidency, but on August 25, 1945, announced that he would not retire at the end of his term in 1947, since "my reelection is necessary, because there is no other man able enough to replace me." On March 28, 1946, he magnanimously declared that he was thinking of promulgating a new law providing for minority representation in the Government.

In Honduras, President Tiburcio Carias Andino came to power in 1933 through some very dubious "elections." Since then there have been neither elections, candidates, political parties, nor a national congress.

El Salvador finally ousted its bloody dictator-president, Maximiliano Hernandez Martinez, last year. He was replaced by a new Government headed by Salvador Castaneda Castro. The new Government, like its predecessors, took power without the formality of an election. Although it has talked of holding a constitutional convention it has not yet taken any steps toward doing so.

Haiti's president, Eli Lescot, called off the scheduled Presidential elections in 1943 and ruled by decree until he was overthrown early this year. The possibility of a democratic evolution existed in Haiti briefly, and a host of political parties sprang up to contest the June elections. But the military junta, recognized on the eve of the elections by the United States, rigidly controlled the voting and imposed economic restrictions on the electorate, which made vote buying the rule and prevented any free expression of the popular will.

In Ecuador, where President Jose Maria Velasco Ibarra came to power through a popular revolution against dictator Carlos Arroyo del Rio, the democratic trend was short-lived. Velasco Ibarra has suspended the constitution and abolished all constitutional guaranties. He also dissolved the Congress and now rules without a national representative body and without a constitution. Under these circumstances the opposition parties—Socialist, Liberal, and Communist—declared their intention to abstain from the scheduled elections, which in consequence were postponed.

Brazil was moving toward a fuller democracy during the war years with dictator Getulio Vargas reluctantly granting concessions to the Brazilian people. Last October Vargas was ousted by a coup d'état, and the popular forces demanded the right to elect a constituent assembly which would draft a democratic constitution and supervise the Presidential elections.

FREEDOM OF PRESS AND ASSOCIATION

Internal press freedom does not exist in Paraguay, Bolivia, Haiti, Honduras, El Salvador, or the Dominican Republic. It has recently been severely restricted in Ecuador and is maintained in Brazil only under great difficulties and by the vigorous struggle of the Brazilian people.

American correspondents can go to the Dominican Republic, but it is as much as their lives are worth to attempt to send out any news of what is happening in that unfortunate land. A few, like Quentin Reynolds and Bert Hicks, have told their stories from the safety of these United States after their return.

American correspondents travel freely throughout the rest of Latin America, and so far as we know, Latin-American authorities seldom put obstacles in the way of their reporting the full truth. Even during the most repressive days of the Farrell-Perón dictatorship in Argentina, Arnaldo Cortesi, of the New York Times, and Ray Josephs, of PM, were free to tell all, and few of their stories ran into censorship trouble.

But it was not until May 30, 1945, that Cortesi hit the front page of the Times with his startling discovery, All Freedom Ended in Argentina, and began to reveal the plight of political prisoners who had been suffering persecution for almost 3 years.

The free press of this country tells the American people very little of what actually goes on behind the iron curtain in the Western Hemisphere. United States officialdom maintains the elaborate pretense that all is well with democracy in our South American bailiwick and the big wire services exercise a kind of voluntary self-censorship.

As a result, the impression is all too current here that Argentina is unique among Latin-American countries for its antidemocratic practices and that the sporadic revolutions and upheavals briefly reported in the American press are comic opera affairs without political or human significance.

We have heard no suggestion that Yugoslav, Polish, Rumanian, Hungarian, or Russian correspondents plan to penetrate the iron curtain in the Western Hemisphere to make a comparison of the postwar fortunes of democracy there and in their own lands. No doubt the United States would insist on their being granted full freedom to move about at will and file their dispatches without interference. In that case we might get some real Latin-American news—if our own papers cared to pick it up from the press of eastern Europe.

International Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following memorandum from the Department of State replying to protests by consulting engineers concerning H. R. 4982:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
June 24, 1946.

Memorandum to: William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State.
From: Haldore Hanson, executive assistant.
Subject: State Department reply to protests by consulting engineers concerning H. R. 4982.

A number of letters have been received from American civil engineers, protesting against provisions in H. R. 4982, which would authorize:

1. That officials of the United States Government may be detailed temporarily abroad to advise other governments;

2. That the United States and another government may undertake technical projects outside the United States, jointly financed by this and another government for their mutual benefit; and

3. That agencies of the United States Government may perform technical services in the United States for another government.

The engineers who protested believe that these governmental activities would offer competition to private consulting engineers. They believe that private American engineers should be employed directly by foreign governments or employed by the United States Government for service abroad.

This program of technical collaboration with governments of Latin America is now 7 years old. President Roosevelt personally suggested the program of loaning United States officials to other governments and received regular reports on this program for its first 5 years. Part of the program has been extended to countries of the Near East and Far East during the war. H. R. 4982 would give the Secretary of State the discretion to extend this program to any country.

The letters received from engineers have not cited any specific example of a Government mission which was considered to be in competition with private consulting firms.

If the following facts are given to the engineers, I believe that most of their fears, and possibly all of them, will prove unfounded.

DETAILING UNITED STATES OFFICIALS TO LATIN AMERICA

Under authority of the act of May 25, 1938, the State Department has arranged for the detail of 102 United States officials to other governments in a period of 8 years. Only seven of these were engineers.

Four were civil engineers advising on highway construction back in 1939–40. Another engineer, John Savage, of the Bureau of Reclamation, has made trips to Mexico, Australia, and China to advise on hydroelectric power projects. In each country he served only a few months and was asked when he left to arrange for the employment of a number of private American consulting engineers. Thus, Government service led to private service. TVA sent to Latin America two electrical engineers, Oren Reed and Julius Krug. That accounts for the seven engineers sent abroad in 8 years. During that same period there were scores of private American engineers employed directly by foreign governments, in some instances on the recommendation of the State Department.

The 95 other United States officials detailed abroad under this law were largely in the fields of agriculture, fisheries, public health, and such governmental services as child welfare, tariffs, and immigration.

UNITED STATES SPECIALISTS LOANED TO CHINA

Among 25 United States specialists sent to China by the State Department during the war, 7 were engineers. Six of the 7 engineers were hired from private life specifically for the foreign assignment. One was a consulting engineer who is vice president of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers. Another is one of the principal communications engineers of the International Telephone & Telegraph Co. Timken Roller Bearing Co. released to the State Department one of its supervising engineers for a year of service in China. The chief sanitary engineer of the City of Detroit was another of those sent by the State Department.

The other 18 United States specialists sent to China were chiefly engaged in agriculture, public health, and public information.

MISSIONS TO LIBERIA, ETHIOPIA, INDIA, THE PHILIPPINES, AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES

In the past 4 years this Government has sent technical missions to a number of other countries, including an industrial group to India (1942), a rehabilitation mission to Ethiopia (1944), a health group to Liberia (1945), an agricultural group to the Arab countries (1945), and an agricultural group to the Philippines (1946). These missions were handled jointly by the State Department and other agencies. As far as I have been able to learn from records now available, all the engineers on these five missions were employed from private life. None were permanent Government employees.

JOINT TECHNICAL PROJECTS IN LATIN AMERICA

Since 1939, by authority of Congress, the United States Government has entered into agreements with governments in Latin America for the joint operation of a number of technical projects of mutual benefit to this and other governments. For example, the United States and Mexico are jointly operating several weather stations in Mexico which serve United States aviation and merchant vessels. The United States assists 14 other governments in operating tidal survey stations, which is a direct service to the United States merchant marine. Joint agricultural experiment stations have been established in five countries.

Last year there were 103 United States officials serving abroad on these joint projects. Of this number, 52 were agricultural experts, 12 were geologists, 5 were in public health, and others were working on child welfare, fisheries, and library science. Only 2 were engaged in engineering, and these were mining engineers advising on production methods of strategic minerals. Their work was undertaken by formal agreement between the United States and another government. It is doubtful whether a foreign government would employ private American engineers for such a confidential assignment without the formal backing of the United States Government.

UNITED STATES AGENCIES PERFORMING TECHNICAL SERVICES IN THE UNITED STATES FOR FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

The laboratories of the Public Health Service have occasionally made special water analyses for the public health services of other governments. The Department of Agriculture has made difficult soil analyses in Washington for other governments when the necessary equipment was not available abroad. Both the Bureau of Reclamation and the TVA have provided practical training services for young engineers sent to this country by foreign governments.

H. R. 4982 would authorize the continuation of this type of service.

GOVERNMENT POLICY IS NONCOMPETITIVE

It has been the policy of the Government to engage only in those technical activities for which the Government is especially qualified, and to employ private technicians for foreign assignments wherever possible. I believe the above brief outline of the program during the past 8 years will bear out this policy.

The loaning of United States technicians to other governments has become an important instrument of foreign relations. Its purpose is not merely to assist other governments in technical matters, but also to build a friendly working relationship between two governments which will be useful when political and economic agreements are to be discussed.

This program was not undertaken with a profit motive, but it could easily be demonstrated that the United States as a whole—including some of its private consulting engineers—have benefited financially from this Government program. To cite a single example: The Civil Aeronautics Administration recently sent to a country in the Near East a mission of several Government aeronautical specialists and several private electrical experts. The private representatives returned with orders for $8,000,000 worth of American goods, and the Near East government asked to send at its own expense 100 of its technicians for training in United States universities and factories.

In any program of this type there are bound to be border-line requests, where foreign governments ask for the detail of specialists, and this Government must decide whether to refer the request to a private consulting firm. Some mistakes are bound to be made. I think the record to date will show that few, if any, mistakes have been made. The State Department has always been ready to discuss such instances with individual engineers or with the American Society of Civil Engineers.

H. R. 4982 authorizes, in addition to the technical activities outlined above, a broad program of informational and cultural activities abroad—short-wave broadcasting, official libraries, exchanges of students and professors, translation of United States books, distribution of educational films. I do not see how any engineer can urge the defeat of this bill (as a number have) unless he is advocating the complete withdrawal of the United States from the international exchange of ideas, which this bill is designed to promote.

Overseas Outposts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address recently delivered by Mr. Foster Hailey, before the national security committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, on the subject Overseas Outposts. Mr. Hailey is a member of the editorial board of the New York Times. He is an author, foreign correspondent, and world traveler, and his address will be of general interest to Members of the Senate and the public.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Before I get over to the subject of the day, I would like to talk a while about the general picture of national security, because it is so important. In worrying about the trees, I think so often we forget the forest, which the general public looks at.

Three times since we settled our own internal difficulties in the Civil War, the United States has stripped itself of the weapons of war in the belief that its geographic isolation and its peaceful intentions were enough to insure its national security.

At the end of the Civil War we were probably the nations' first sea power, which is not very often appreciated, and I don't think it is an important question, but at that time we also had the world's finest army trained in war.

The army, of course, was disbanded as soon as the war was over, as the army generally is, and the navy sank into such a state of innocuous desuetude that it was correctly described in the Army-Navy Journal as being a heap of junk.

We had a little trouble with Chile in the late seventies or early eighties, and the Chilean Navy told our commander to go roll his hoop, and we couldn't do anything about it, because the Chilean Navy, while small, was a lot better than anything we could send against it.

It wasn't until the administration of Grover Cleveland that this Nation started to build up its sea power again, although still ignoring its Army, under Secretary of the Navy Whitney, who saw that you could not have a great army and great navy unless you had the industrial machine behind it that was skilled in the art of making the weapons of war.

Up until that time we had bought all our ships and most of our weapons from the British and the French, or some of the other continental powers, as South America, and the other small countries now buy them from the British and from us.

One of the first things Secretary Whitney did was to pool appropriations for several years and grant a contract to the Bethlehem Iron Co. for the manufacture of armor plate steel.

Then came Mahan's great book on sea power in history, which was studiously studied in Tokyo and in Germany even more than in this country. The Kaiser made it a required reading for his army and navy officers, and started at that time to build up his navy to challenge Britain on the seas.

So that under the influence of that book and the impetus that had been given our industry, our shipbuilding industry especially, when the Spanish persecution of the Cubans reached such a state that this country couldn't stomach it any more and after a study of the events leading up to that war I am quite convinced that the popular conception that Hearst and Pulitzer drove us into it with yellow journalism is incorrect, we were partially prepared. It was deep-seated resentment of the American public against anyone being treated the way the Cubans were being treated, especially in our own backyard, that led finally to that war, and led us into an imperialism with which we are still saddled, the major portion of which we will, of course, get rid of on July 4, when the Philippines become independent.

But, as I say, Cleveland and Whitney and Mahan, and then later the first Roosevelt, when he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, prepared us for the Spanish-American War.

But after that was over the Army, of course, was again immediately disbanded, and the Navy, although it prospered for several years after it returned from its trip around the world, was again allowed to slip back, not as far as it had after the Civil War, but certainly we were not a first-class power at the time of the First World War. Germany was far ahead of us, and even Japan was pretty close, if not ahead of us in efficient ships.

Then, after the end of that war, we again had the power to be the world's great sea power, the world's first sea power. We had the ships under construction that would have made us that.

Then came the Washington Disarmament Conference, and again we stripped ourselves of everything except good intentions, and we didn't even live up to the provisions of the Disarmament Conference. We had a paper Navy and that was about all. We never built up to parity until the second Roosevelt came to power—well, "came to power" is a little inadvertent, but I guess it is not too far wrong, either—until he was elected in 1932 and started building up the Navy—but it still wasn't built up when the war came—and also seeing the gathering storm perhaps more clearly than many people did in this country, starting also to build up and train an army, and trying to build up an air force. Even he didn't realize the great need or the extent to which this present conflict would spread.

So now we are faced again with the same problem that we have always been faced with: Shall we again strip ourselves of our Army and our Navy, and our Air Force, and again rely on good intentions?

I just don't believe this country is stupid enough to again repeat the mistakes that we have made three times before, to believe that good intentions are enough in a world as we know it today, or to believe that you can get the rest of the world to disarm at this time, and that we think a good example, as a lot of people seriously urge at this time—we have had several letters to the New York Times again and again arguing against a big Navy, arguing against a big Air Force, arguing against what they call conscription, selective service, arguing against universal military training, anything that has anything at all to do with the Military Establishment, they would abolish on the grounds that that is the only way to lull Russia's suspicions and satisfy the rest of the world and set a good example.

To get down to specific cases. As General Marshall, said, certainly national security is a three-legged stool.

One is the Army and Navy and Air Force, in a unified department, strengthened by or provided with the manpower through selective service.

Another is a trained reserve, which will come through the National Guard and its air component and a strong Naval Reserve and universal military training.

And, third, research and development and a plan which this time shouldn't be put on the shelf to gather dust as the plan did that was drawn up after the last war when we saw all the mistakes that had been made in preparing for that war and fighting it, and appointed a committee headed by McNider, as you may remember, which spent several months drawing up a program for industrial mobilization. So far as I know, the McNider plan was never even consulted by anyone in the days leading up to this war.

So that it is not enough to draw up a plan, but we must keep it alive and keep changing it as conditions change.

For instance, we had in this country in 1940 hardly any fighter plane production. At the time of Pearl Harbor the world's best fighting machine had only just then got into production—the Grumman Wildcat—which I will still take against any fighter plane; on its record it is ahead of the Spitfire in the Southwest Pacific.

As I say, we didn't have the production or the plans for that at all, and the only reason we were so far ahead, I think, on the big bombers was because the commercial airplane people in this country had produced the basic plane and the basic engine—at least, they had started forward and were on the road to it—whch gave us the head start on bomber production.

So that we need research and development to keep up with the developments of other countries, to perfect our own weapons, to look into the future and correctly assess the weapons that any war of tomorrow will be fought with, and it has got to be a continuing thing. It has got to be an expensive thing, and it is something, I think, that has to be sold to the American public.

Perhaps the American public at the moment would not have to be sold, but it has got to be kept before them for the next few years much more clearly than it was kept before them after the last war.

If I may go back a moment myself to my early days with the Veterans of Foreign Wars in the twenties, I don't recall that we were very seriously concerned, in the State conventions, about this country's military position, at least, we weren't out in Missouri. We were more worried about a lot of other things affecting ourselves and affecting the wounded of the last war. We were thinking more about it than we were about the future, or about how the peace was going to be kept.

To get around to the island outposts and the island bases, which I understand is your special consideration today, and perhaps I will get again into a rather controversial situation.

As you know, a lot of the air generals say that the navies are obsolete anyway, so talking about Navy bases might seem like I was talking about the last war instead of the next one.

I don't believe that for one thing, and I also don't believe that even if we don't have a Navy in the next war, that surely we need a Navy for the next few years to prevent that next war coming on us before we are prepared for it. And before we can marshal our forces, perhaps, to stop it.

Now, as to the need of those island bases, a Navy isn't worth a d—— without a base, and a base isn't worth a d—— without a Navy. I will give you an example of that: Hong Kong was a distinct liability to the British, since they had no fleet based there. Instead of that, it made a beautiful anchorage for the Japanese as soon as they had taken it.

Once the Prince of Wales and the Repulse were gone Singapore was a liability to the British, because they had to surrender to the Japanese a base which was one of the big bases of the war, as soon as the fleet was forced to withdraw from it.

On the other hand, a fleet must depend on its base. The first thing that our Navy did in the Pacific, whenever it got into an area, was to set up some sort of a front-line base.

The refueling at sea and reprovisioning at sea can be carried only so far, and it is a delaying operation, and it is also a very dangerous one, in the days of air power, when you might get caught refueling at a very bad time, as some of our people almost got caught a couple of times.

I was with Halsey on the first raid against Wake Island and Marcus, and we ran, that time, into what always after that was called Halsey weather.

We went in in lousy weather and came out in bad weather. The "Bull" kept looking until he found a nice bank of fog about halfway up toward the Aleutians, and it was just cut as clean off there, as if with a knife. So all day long we refueled right on the edge of that fog area. If any Japanese force had got out there and found us—they were sure out there chasing us for awhile—but if they had found us, Halsey had the fog area to run into.

But you can't depend on that. You have got to have a good base that you can go back to and that is well protected.

So that, if we give up the bases that we now have in the Atlantic and in the Pacific, we had better know that we have no more need for them before we do it.

Now, I don't think, and I don't believe you can sell it to the American people, that we should take over those bases and establish our sovereignty over them, or whatever you want to call it.

The Japanese didn't even do that in the Marianas, Carolines, and other islands she took over from Germany. She went through the motions of taking them over as a mandate through the League of Nations.

But it seems to me our people can work out some formula that will satisfy the rest of the world as to our good intentions, that we don't intend to take over these islands and extend our own actual physical boundaries clear over to Okinawa, a few hundred miles off China, and clear down into the South Pacific, a short distance north of Australia. But we have got to keep them under some sort of a United Nations control. And I also believe that one of the arguments that we should establish our sovereignty over them—that that is the only way we can keep anyone else out—is a continuance of the Navy Department's fetish of secrecy which has done them more harm than it has ever done good, and I have good authority for saying that, Admiral [turning to Admiral Berke].

I spent the day with Admiral Yarnell recently. He said that he had always thought that the Navy made too much of secrecy and that since he had retired that he had gotten a new perspective and he thought now a lot of it was just plain silly. You could let people in freely to see a lot of stuff that before had been kept very secret, and which they eventually, if they had a good espionage service, they found out about, anyway, and that he saw no reason why we should not take those islands in the Pacific under some sort of mandate from the United Nations and allow the United Nations' inspection parties to come in once in a while, as the Japanese were supposed to do, and as they, of course, never did. That was largely, I might say, because we never insisted on it.

For one thing, a former naval attaché at Tokyo told me at the time he was pressing to be allowed to visit the mandated islands, that he was called off by our State Department on the grounds that we might hurt the Japanese feelings. I think if anyone else, any other country—Russia, for instance—wanted to get in to see these mandates, under whatever conditions we want to set up, they wouldn't hold back on the ground that they might be hurting our feelings. Now, I don't believe we are going to have to fight Russia. I hope not. But a lot of people are talking about it. A Canadian the other day said, "Do you realize Canada is now a buffer state?" If you look at one of these new maps of the world you will see what he means.

In the paper this morning it was just announced we were signing a new Arctic defense pact with Canada. This "Operation Musk-Ox," of course, we have our finger in that.

But I do think the condition in which Russia is in today, and the frame of mind of her leaders—the best description I have heard is that Russia is a kid from the wrong side of the tracks, who has been pushed around by the boys who lived upon Diamond Hill or Diamond Head, and that now she is herself strong, she is walking around with a chip on her shoulder, daring someone to knock it off—I do think we can stop Russia, and counteract her influence only by remaining strong, militarily. That is the only thing she understands, strength. That is the only thing most of the world understands.

If the countries which have good intentions don't remain strong, then we are just asking for whatever the other countries want to deal out for us.

I hope that the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and all the other veterans' organizations, will set that as one of their main objectives, because I think you people, of all the people in this country, can be attacked on the basis of motives less than anyone else can, because anyone who has seen war, who has seen a lot of fine American kids who might be the future Presidents of this country, go out and get killed for no good reason, merely because of the stupidity of older generations, must hate war as I do. I think the veterans of the war are always the ones who are the greatest partisans for peace.

One of the encouraging things I have seen about the war, as I was talking to Mr. Wolman and Neilhere, during luncheon, is that so many of these kids come back from this war of disillusionment full of idealism.

We went into this war with no illusions.

I remember I was a 17-year-old kid when I enlisted in the Navy in the last war and served for 2 years on a transport in the North Atlantic. We didn't see much action, but we sure saw a lot of weather. The North Atlantic winter, I think, is the worst winter any place in the world except, perhaps, in the Arctic, or in the Bering Sea.

But I went into the war last time feeling that it was a war to end all wars, a war to spread democracy around the world, and we came back and after a few months were completely disillusioned and said, "What the Hell? Let's stay at home and have a good time and let the rest of the world take care of itself."

Now, these kids are coming back with no illusions. They weren't kidding themselves about trying to save democracy. They were out trying to keep Hitler and the Japanese from coming over to this country and imposing upon us the government they had imposed on Europe and were trying to impose on Asia. But they are coming back with a desire to do something about what they have seen wrong.

I have got a 40-page document in my brief case which proves at least one of them has been working for several weeks on a large project that we hope to put over together with the help of a lot of other people that we will tell them about later.

Let's Face the Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be reprinted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very stimulating address delivered by Mr. Edward R. Place, an able political commentator and experienced publicist of over 20 years' experience in public relations. The address was recently made before the Washington (D. C.) Northeast Businessmen's Association.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The best protection men of substance have ever had has been a free citizenry and free enterprise—American institutions which like almost everything else are getting scarcer, and more restricted.

Under a system of free enterprise which has enabled poor boys to get ahead in the world and make the big jump from a log cabin in Kentucky or a haberdashery in Missouri into the White House, our citizens have enjoyed a better standard of living than any other land. Predatory class warfare is un-American and a dangerous political course, as our people are finding out.

We fought a frightful and expensive war for peace, freedom, security, and prosperity, and we are not getting them. Here and throughout the world selfish men strive to be dictators and little Hitlers and seek to exercise all sorts of controls over their fellowmen from the cradle to the grave.

Chaotic conditions in the United States are largely due to the continuous industrial strife that has been waged since VJ-day. It is a sad spectacle to see the once greatest country in the world being steadily weakened and divided by costly strikes and shutdowns to the point where a failure to solve labor-management problems in the very near future will inevitably bring a depression and suffering that will make previous crashes seem like booms. Congress provided a remedy—the Case bill—but the President spurned it. His veto will encourage communism which thrives on bickering and unrest, as David Lawrence recently said in the Star.

"By his veto," Congressman VURSELL of Illinois told the House yesterday, "the President has indicated that he is willing to follow the CIO-PAC labor leaders of the Nation. This is the responsibility he must accept before the bar of public opinion of the Nation. His action has proved that he has not and does not want any corrective legislation that would help to bring about industrial peace."

The pattern of strikes, both in wartime and since the close of hostilities, strongly suggests, even to the man on the street, that they are part of a cleverly conceived, ably organized, and well-financed plan. The threatening maritime strike has been agitated on a world-wide scale, and so we are justified in concluding that there are international planners behind the industrial conflicts we have been having. My latest information is that the strike will be called off until after the fall elections, due to Joe Stalin's concern over the American political situation. Let us see what happens. The line could change.

Lack of production and distribution can wreck this country just as completely as atom bombs dropped by enemy planes or guided missiles launched from distant points. Economic warfare can be as disastrous in many respects as a full-scale military conflict.

During the late war we heard a lot about pincer movements as great armies maneuvered for advantage in large-scale military operations. This nutcracker strategy has been perfected in the United States by the Communist master minds for the purpose of bringing about the downfall of a free nation. John Q. Public is in the middle, being squeezed.

One arm of the pincer is the OPA, which creates a crisis and conflict within an industry through ruinous price ceilings and other techniques. The other arm of the pincer is the CIO, which takes advantage of the crisis and confusion created by the OPA to agitate for phony remedies and promote industrial strife and chaos. Smear and scare propaganda are weapons common to both OPA and CIO, and their output bear a striking similarity.

Holding key spots in the Government as a result of an unholy alliance with the New Deal, the troublemaking Communists are able inside and outside Government to pull the strings that make the issues, that contribute to strikes, that bring about shortages, that lead to hunger and destitution, that stir up hatreds, and ultimately provoke serious disorders and outbreaks of violence.

Considering the state of disunity and famine in the world, and recent expressions of popular sentiment for nationalism, "one meat ball" might prove a better political slogan for 1948 than "one world."

More than 6 months ago, the Republican Members of Congress in a statement of their principles, policies, and objectives, stated the major domestic issue. They declared:

"Today's major domestic issue is between radicalism, regimentation, all-powerful bureaucracy, class exploitation, deficit spending, and machine politics, as against our belief in American freedom for the individual under just laws administered for all, preservation of local home rule, efficiency, and pay-as-you-go economy in Government, and the protection of the American way of life against either Fascist or Communist trends. We believe that genuine social and economic progress can be achieved only on these American constitutional principles and it is our purpose to give our citizens this clean-cut choice."

More recently, the Honorable CARROLL REECE, chairman of the Republican National Committee, stated the main issue more briefly as Republican versus communism.

WRECKING BY OPA

Congressman DANIEL A. REED, New York, charges that until the OPA, with its press agents, left-wing propagandists with their program of limited production, is destroyed, root and branch, there will be continued and ever-increasing price inflation.

"OPA regimentation is wrecking America," he says. "It is significant, is it not," he asks, "that every Communist, every red leader in the CIO and PAC, and every un-American radical is lending its aid to the drive."

Mr. REED observes further that "if the CIO had put the energy it has used in an endeavor to aid private enterprise that it has to destroy it, the people of this rich United States would not be drifting toward a starvation level."

Congressman RALPH W. GWINN, of New York, calls OPA a moral scandal, political corruption.

He says, "It deceived the people with propaganda favoring Government as the only honest source of food, and the citizens as unworthy of trust and full of greed and selfishness. This is the Communist line we ought to hate. Every freedom-loving family in America needs once more to crusade for freedom in the faith of the forefathers. They learned the hard way that freedom is the practical source even of butter and beef and houses at the lowest cost."

It is costing the taxpayers to maintain OPA $180,000,000 per year, in addition to unknown and untold billions for subsidies. Now what difference does it make if we pay increased prices until production catches up with demand, or keep maintaining OPA and the expensive subsidies? And, remember, we are paying for OPA and the subsidies to produce commodities, but not getting them. We are merely paying for the privilege of being regimented and being denied the necessities of life.

Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, has declared that OPA has admitted spending $2,500,000 a year for publicity, and has charged that OPA has "repeatedly violated the law against spending Government money to pressure Congress."

After hearing so much talk about high food prices after the First World War, Congressman GERALD W. LANDIS, of Indiana, decided to check the ads in the Indianapolis newspapers for the month of April 1919.

He found that market-basket items that cost $5.36 in 1919 will cost you $6.84 in 1946.

Of course, some of the food items in 1919 were slightly higher, he points out, as for example, sugar, but you could buy sugar in 1919 without a sugar stamp. You could also buy bread without standing in bread lines.

Mr. LANDIS comments: "We are told that unless OPA is continued, wild inflation will result. But we are also told that OPA would hold prices in line and assure an equitable distribution of essential goods. It has accomplished neither. We are in the midst of inflation now, an inflation resulting from the artificial scarcity of many articles. The consumer is becoming more convinced daily that price ceilings mean nothing if goods are not available. Full production is our best guaranty against inflation. When supply is built up to a parity with demand, prices will adjust themselves without the necessity of OPA. The consumer will be getting the things he needs at prices he can afford to pay."

Instead of permitting employers and employees to work out together enlightened and practical working arrangements of mutual benefit adaptable to each particular type of business, the New Deal has intruded itself, and has set back the cause of labor (the common man) at least 50 years through its political manipulations, dictation, and intimidation motivated by selfish desires for votes, power, and ultimate complete regimentation.

Deception is the stock in trade of the subversive elements seeking to change our economic and commercial systems, take away our freedom and enslave us to their selfish purposes. It is difficult to cope with adversaries who will not come out into the open. Some of the most dangerous foes of individual freedom get away with their treacherous activity by wrapping themselves in the American flag and glibly quoting patriots and saints by way of winning friends and influencing people.

Allow me to give you one example which I know about intimately, since I was a close-hand observer for nearly 2 years.

THE STORY BEHIND THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT COMMITTEES

During the war one of the most idealistic and high-sounding win-the-war programs launched in Washington, was the war-production drive of the War Production Board. The announced purpose of the drive was to promote harmony and cooperation between labor and management in war plants as a means of getting greater and better quality war production more quickly and efficiently so that the war might be won sooner and thereby save lives.

President Roosevelt asked for something of this sort early in 1942 in order to attain the huge production goals he set for ships, planes, guns, and tanks. WPB Chairman Donald Nelson responded immediately to the President's wishes by appealing to labor and management in a series of Nation-wide radio broadcasts to bury the hatchet for the duration and form labor-management production committees composed of an equal number of representatives of labor and management to sit around the conference table regularly and discuss mutual problems and objectives for appropriate action.

Assured by the Government that there were no deep, dark designs behind the scheme, leaders of industry and organized labor joined the Government in signing a labor-management charter, or basic endorsement of the labor-management war-production committee plan. The plan stated among other things that it was not a device to increase the power or position of any union, that it was not designed to conform to any scheme that contemplates a measure of control of management by labor or labor by management. Summing up, the charter declared "It is the war-production-drive plan to increase production by increasing efficiency through greater management and labor cooperation."

Strangely enough, however, the personnel entrusted with the responsibility for promoting harmony and teamwork between labor and management was recruited mainly from the ranks of professional unioneers who had devoted their lives to labor propoganda and organization techniques. Many of them had Communist or Socialist associations and backgrounds. They were the kind you might expect to encounter on a soap box in a park but never behind an executive desk in a Government agency.

The man hand-picked for the important position of administering the program on an impartial basis was a New Dealer who came from the International Labor Office at Geneva by way of the Department of Labor. Instead of an industrial relations or public relations expert of standing, the Administrators selected as information chief a former labor publicist from the New York garment center, where union leaders Sidney Hillman and David Dubinsky head 100-percent New Deal political parties, American Labor and Liberal, respectively. It is true that there were two industrialists named on an advisory committee at the beginning, but they did not waste their time around Washington very long when it became obvious that the labor-management scheme was intended to be lopsided in favor of the CIO, which was destined to play such an important part in the fourth-term campaign.

In fact, some CIO unions became so enthusiastic over the fourth term that they high-pressured labor-management committees into endorsing it. PM gave a picture spread to a New York labor-management committee that endorsed the fourth term, although the basic endorsement of the war-production drive failed to mention political activity as a war-winning function of joint production committees.

Toward the end of 1943 the war-production drive, whose policy makers included Roy Reuther, one of the trio of brothers of Detroit sit-down strikes and recent General Motors strike fame, tried to put the heat on Ford and General Motors to permit the agency to organize labor-management committees in their plants. But the drive officials could neither fool nor scare Henry Ford. The Ford Co. in a reply to an unjustifiable attack published in the Labor-Management News, the WPB weekly, termed the labor-management program a "political vehicle designed a long time ago in an effort to push labor farther into the management of industry." Incidentally, the master minds here in Washington wasted a whole day trying to compose an answer to that charge, but they gave up the attempt as a bad job and never did deny it to my knowledge.

So this Government-sponsored experiment in labor-management cooperation turned out to be a tragic farce, a fraud and a deception which cost the taxpayers millions of dollars to maintain in Washington what amounted to a CIO-PAC political headquarters supporting several hundred CIO propagandists and organizers here and in field offices who traveled far and wide spreading their anti-employer poison. It is hard to believe that Government higher-ups did not know that the CIO used the war production agency as a cover-up for double-crossing industrial and business employers who had been sucked into the lofty win-the-war plan that Mr. Nelson offered them in the President's name.

How radical the crusaders for "labor-management cooperation" were may be judged by the fact that they openly branded Eddie Rickenbacker, Public Enemy No. 1, because the flying ace of World War I urged greater production for the sake of the G. I.'s in the fox holes, while the agency blacklisted many companies flying the Army-Navy E flag from receiving publicity for record production achievements because these companies were not in the good graces of the CIO for one reason or another.

It might be added that the labor-management scheme was being promoted on a world-wide basis by the New Deal and the CIO, Sidney Hillman and the World Federation of Trade Unions, Earl Browder and the Communists in the months preceding the San Francisco Conference. War production drive gleefully reported the spread of these committees to Canada, England, Russia, France, China, and so forth, and Madam Perkins wanted the committees continued permanently in peacetime. After the tragic death of the President, however, and the failure of the Communist World Federation of Trade Unions to capture a major role at San Francisco, the labor-management movement lost its angel and its momentum and subsequently the war production drive went out of business. Businessmen had a close call—closer than they may know. How many of the 5,600 wartime committees that were claimed are functioning today in industry, I don't know. My guess—zero.

If the labor-management committee plan had been on the level, one wonders how much of the labor-management dissension since VJ-day could have been avoided. The truth is though that the labor-management committee plan put the CIO unions in a stronger position to wage their campaign against American industry and the American people.

Surely the union and political leaders must have a low opinion of the intelligence of leaders of business and industry, as well as the public in general, to imagine that they can get away with their deception indefinitely. As Abraham Lincoln said, "You can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time." The American people are beginning to wake up, thank God.

Hon. EUGENE COX, Congressman from Georgia, has said that the political endorsement of the CIO-PAC was "the kiss of death." Recent political primaries seem to bear out his statement.

In California, a Republican Governor last week not only won renomination in the Republican primary but also defeated his CIO-PAC opponent in the Democratic primary. Even with millions of dollars extracted from the pockets of working men and women, to spend to purge the people's representatives, the PAC is becoming the victim of its own vicious propaganda.

COMMUNIST SUBVERSIVE TACTICS

A Communist leader recently voiced some concern lest the rank and file of American workers discover the truth that they are being used by persons more loyal to a foreign power than to the United States. Traitors, that is.

Joseph Starobin warns the Communists in the columns of the Daily Worker, January 2, 1946. He said: "What the bourgeoisie fears most of all is that the connections between domestic and foreign policy will become nakedly clear to the common people. If a million American workers on the picket lines suddenly see that they are being put in their places as part of a move to put Manchuria in the imperialist pocket, that is dynamite!"

This reveals unmistakably the Communists' aim to link strikes in the United States to international affairs in order to put pressure on the United States Government to go along with the Soviet.

The commandments of communism were recently inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Congressman NOAH M. MASON, of Illinois. Let me mention three of them pertaining to workers:

1. "Educate workers, especially the young ones, to be intolerant of any and all authority, especially police authority."

2. "Encourage workers to participate in disorder, to use brute force, to revenge, and not to have a fear of bloodshed."

3. "Be at the forefront in rendering small services to workers; speak loudly and make yourself heard in their behalf; impose yourself in their midst; hide the good which others do for them and make it appear as if you did it; and, to enlist such workers in your cause, be in the forefront of all labor movements and organized opposition to parliamentary proceedings."

In their creed, the Communists further state: "It is the duty of each Communist to give the working man and woman the illusion that only Communists are free and that only Communist membership and action can free him and her."

CONCLUSIONS

As leaders in business and community life, you can accomplish much to save America, yourselves, and your children, by tearing away the masks of the conspirators against all we hold dear, who all too long have been feeding on the fat of the land while working for famine and chaos and preaching a Utopia they wouldn't know how to bring about even if they wanted to.

Let's face the ugly facts of planned international communism that no amount of propaganda can hide—we've got to get going in the old-fashioned American way to win the peace. The phonies have had their day. Now have your say. America needs your leadership and voice.

Big Business, It's Up to You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Big Business, It's Up to You," published in yesterday's Philadelphia Record.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIG BUSINESS, IT'S UP TO YOU!

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS.

GENTLEMEN: You win!

Your campaign to kill OPA has succeeded.

Your association is more responsible than any other organization for ending price control.

According to the testimony of your president, Robert R. Watson, you spent $400,000 for a series of newspaper advertisements denouncing OPA.

You conducted a high-pressure lobby in Washington. Your officers appeared before committees of both Senate and House. They professed to speak for 15,000 manufacturers who produce 85 percent of all goods manufactured in this country.

You summarized your position in your advertisement of April 18, "Remove price controls on manufactured goods and production will step up fast * * *. Within a reasonable time prices will adjust themselves naturally—as they always do when production goes up."

Now it's up to you to make good on your theory of free enterprise and increased production.

You have taken President Truman and his administration off the spot.

The President had no other course but to veto the conglomeration of confusion and contradictions which Congress sent to him as a pretense for an OPA bill. The President's veto message is clear and sound. He shows that the proposed law is unenforceable, in the first place—and if it could be made to work would give sanction to unjustifiable price increases.

Now the ball is in your hands, NAM, and for the sake of your country we hope you don't fumble it.

If your theory works out in practice, if your 15,000 members, big and little industrialists, speed up production promptly and thereby counteract disastrous price increases, the country will give you full credit. The whole country will pay tribute to its enlightened industrialists who asserted themselves under your vigorous leadership, and then delivered the goods.

Not only will your association be vindicated but you will be recognized as the leading business organization of this country. More important, the success of your system will insure a conservative victory at the polls next November.

Under those circumstances, we predict an overwhelming Republican landslide.

But if you have guessed wrong—if you do not make good on your predictions—if prices and wages start mounting at such a rapid rate as to paralyze our economy, then watch out for the tornado.

You will have done American business a lasting disservice. The people will demand much more stringent controls than those you have just destroyed.

Our system of free enterprise will be in jeopardy. We'll be lucky if we can avoid socialization of the larger industries such as has already occurred in Great Britain.

We take it for granted that you have thought out all the consequences of your campaign against price regulation and are fully prepared to meet your momentous responsibility. We trust that wires are going out to every one of your 15,000 members demanding their full and immediate cooperation in stepping up production and keeping prices down.

The whole country is counting on you to make good—or else.

Favoring La Follette-Monroney Reorganization Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 29, 1946

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the press of the Nation is practically unanimous in favoring S. 2177, to provide for increased efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government.

Under leave granted, I submit herewith an editorial from the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, of Fort Worth, Tex., commending and urging passage of the bill:

LONG-NEEDED REFORM WITHIN CONGRESS

The creaky machinery of Congress will get a needed overhauling if the House follows the Senate's lead in passing the so-called congressional streamlining bill. Its enactment would step up the speed and capacity of the cumbersome nineteenth-century machine and gear it for the heavier loads of present-day lawmaking.

One of the principal design changes would come through stripping down the present unwieldy congressional committee structure, reducing the number of standing committees in the Senate from 33 to 15 and the number in the House from 48 to 18. These committees, and individual Members of Congress, would be equipped for better performance by giving them increased expert and technical aid.

The modernization of operations should prove a great congressional time-saver as well as an aid to efficiency. Members would be restricted to service on two committees, instead of the prevent average of six, enabling them to divide their time more effectively between committee work and sessions on the floor. Better and speedier legislation could be expected from this change, since efficient handling of a bill in committee cuts down the time required for its consideration on the floor. With some of his half dozen committees meeting simultaneously under present conditions, a Congressman or Senator is forced to flit from one to another, participating fully in none and causing delays while he catches up with what has taken place during his absence.

Except in a few cases, each of the reorganized committees would be the "opposite number" in Congress of a department or principal administrative agency of the Government. This system would gather the threads of all related measures into the hands of one committee, give it constant oversight over the agency for which it handles legislation, and enable it to maintain continuous watchfulness over exercise by that agency of the power delegated to it. Guarding against an agency's misuse of delegated power has been a responsibility of Congress all along, but one it has lacked the means of discharging effectively.

The work of the Member of Congress would be lightened by providing him with an $8,000-a-year administrative assistant, who would do many of the chores every lawmaker is called upon to perform for his constituents. These time-consuming chores often are performed at the expense of a Congressman's legislative efficiency and his opportunity to acquaint himself fully with pending measures.

Tighter fiscal controls could be expected from a requirement that the revenue-raising and Appropriations Committees of both Houses meet jointly early each year and draw up an estimate of Federal receipts and expenditures—in effect a congressional budget. Failure of actual receipts to come up to expenditures would place upon the President the duty of whittling appropriations to balance income and outgo.

To help the Member of Congress to balance his personal budget, he would be granted a pay raise from $10,000 to $15,000 a year, the first increase in congressional salaries since 1925. The strain on congressional pocketbooks has grown so heavy that financial independence has become almost a prerequisite to service in Congress. As another alleviation of this situation, Members of Congress would be admitted to a pension system allowing them to retire at 62 if they have 6 years of service behind them. The proposed pension set-up has been subjected to the valid objection that the rate of pension for Members of Congress would be higher than for other Federal employees making equal contributions to the fund.

Coupled with these changes would be the creation of majority and minority policy committees in Congress, establishment of closer liaison with the White House through a joint legislative-executive council, a requirement for registration of organized groups and their agents who seek to influence legislation, and other minor but needed improvements. Together they constitute such a major step toward reform of congressional procedure that it is impossible to cavil at the refusal of Senators to renounce the time-honored patronage privilege of appointing congressional employees. In the words of Senator LA FOLLETTE, a moving spirit in drawing up the streamlining bill and guiding it through the Senate, the "keystone of the arch" of congressional reorganization has been preserved. It should be well worth the $12,000,000 a year it is estimated to cost.

European Experiences With Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a portion of an editorial entitled "Folding Money," published in the editorial section of yesterday's New York Times. The editorial gives some idea of the inflation which in the past has occurred in other parts of the world.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOLDING MONEY

Inflation is nothing new in Europe. In the week ending November 17, 1923, it was estimated that the cost of living for a family of four in Germany was 13,000,000,000 000 marks, compared with only 4,000,000,000,000 the preceding week. By the end of the month, it took six and two-thirds trillion marks to equal $1.

That was 5 years after World War I, and nearly 23 years ago. Last week the printing presses were rolling in Europe once again. Millions of people were facing the tragedy of inflation. The causes were numerous—failure of industrial recovery, gigantic budgetary deficits, lack of popular confidence in the financial stability of governments. Hungary was the worst example, but inflation was present in Greece, Italy, and many another European country.

In Hungary a 100,000,000,000,000 pengoe note was issued, worth about $18,000,000,000,000 at the prewar exchange rate, but worth about 20 cents today. The average Budapest worker was receiving 800,000,000,000,000 pengoes last week—but prices were changing daily and wages twice weekly. It was reported that the Hungarian Government was planning to establish a new currency, called the forint, to supplant the astronomical pengoe.

In Greece before World War II a drachma was worth about three-quarters of a cent to a cent. Last week the New York quotation for the drachma was about one-fiftieth of a cent, or nearly 5,000 to the dollar. The average white-collar government employee in Greece must now spend his entire monthly earnings on food, with no allowance whatsoever for clothes, transport, or shelter—not to mention entertainment—if he is to maintain a reasonably healthy diet.

Since 1939 the cost of living for a typical workingman's family of five in Italy has risen 22 times, but wages and salaries have not moved so rapidly. With the lira now worth a little less than a half-cent, a plumber in Rome makes 2,800 lire a week instead of 180 before the war.

Our Challenge in This Atomic Age

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE F. ROGERS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. ROGERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech given by Kent Hurley, of East Rochester, N. Y., a graduate of the East Rochester High School, entitled "Our Challenge in This Atomic Age":

As we of the class of 1946 step up to receive our diplomas tonight, we shall, officially, be entering the future. This future is perhaps more insecure than that of any earlier graduating class, for we are now living in the atomic age. On August 6, 1945, this new age was born.

When that first cataclysmic holocaust enveloped Hiroshima, few of us fully realized the significance of the incident. Probably most of us here thought of it only as a means of bringing the Pacific war to a welcome end. Tonight, I want to point out the potential consequences of that release of atomic energy, for in such consequences, lies the challenge to our generation.

Atomic energy can be used both constructively and destructively. Let us first consider its constructive uses in the fields of health, leisure, and education. In health, take the matter of the common cold—we know but little about it today. Then there are all those fearful maladies such as heart disease, cancer, and poliomyelitis, just to mention a few. Perhaps even old age may be vigorously restored by the proper application of this new energy and power to medical research.

Man's leisure time activities can be revolutionized, also, to develop both his mind and his body. Over the last 50 years, there has been a marked reduction in man's working hours. This trend can be accelerated. Not more than half of each week need be spent for earning a living. Man will have more time to think, and to increase his educational and recreational interests. The world might know again a golden age as in the history of Greece and Rome.

With its application to education, man should be prepared not only for the opportunities and responsibilities of his chosen work, but for the business of living itself. His primary aim should be the development of a critical intelligence. It is even possible to visualize formalized education until the twenty-fifth or thirtieth year; but it must not end there, as education, like the capacity of the mind itself, has no rigid boundaries.

Envisioning, then, this new kind of man, developed through the wise use of his leisure time, and through regard for health and education, we see him emerge from the stature of a national man to that of a world man, prepared, wisely, to handle world problems.

This brings us to the consequences of ignoring world problems. We have indicated how atomic energy can be used for peace; let us look at its threat in war if its use is left uncontrolled. Warfare would no longer be dependent upon armies, but would be waged by push buttons, releasing radio-controlled planes, carrying cargoes of atomic explosives. There is no comfort to be derived from the war-is-too-horrible theory. There is one way, and one way only, to achieve effective control of atomic energy, and that is through centralized world government. There is no need to talk of difficulties in the way of good government; there is need only to ask whether we can afford to do without it.

We hear, and have heard, the statement that war is inevitable. Man interprets this from the past, which reveals that in all of recorded history there have been only 300 years when he has been free from this great scourge upon mankind.

Yet it is a curious phenomenon of nature, that only two species practice the art of war—men and ants—both having complex social organizations. Many animals of the same species kill each other, but only men and ants practice the science of organized destruction.

In the most primitive sense, war in man is an expression of his competitive impulses. Darwin called this the survival of the fittest. We have just come through a war where some countries were the "haves" and some the "have nots"; another fight of competition. If man continues this competitive instinct, of which war is the inevitable result, he will undoubtedly destroy himself. We see, then, that the need is for man to turn from being competitive, and instead become cooperative. This leads us back again to national man becoming world man. Not only does he have to create the first world authority, but he shall have to make sure that this authority is wisely used. Too often, the best ideas have fallen into the hands of the worst men. A great idea has often been perverted or exploited by those who were looking for the means to a selfish end. The greatest idea ever to be taken up by the mind of man, Christianity, was for centuries violated by its very administrators. Alexander's vision of a brotherhood of man fell victim to its own force—a force based on might makes right. It was in the name of socialism and social progress that fascism came to Italy and nazism to Germany

This, then, is our challenge. To bring about world government and to keep it pure. It is a challenge that has become necessary because of that power released August 6, 1945, and we are the first class to face it. The time has come at last for America to take its place in shaping the world for good or for evil, in this atomic age.

Price Control in Spartanburg, S. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, from Sunday's Washington Post I clipped the following article indicating that Spartanburg, S. C., one of the principal cities in my district, situated in a most progressive county, upon the action of Congress Saturday, immediately voluntarily pledged itself to continue present ceiling prices:

SOUTH CAROLINA STORES HOLD PRICES DOWN

SPARTANBURG, S. C., June 29.—Spartanburg merchants took time out in the midst of a busy Saturday afternoon to pledge continuance of present ceiling prices pending the Government determination of policy.

After learning that price and rent controls would come off at midnight, Sunday, M. G. Browning, vice chairman of the retail merchants bureau, telephoned other directors.

All agreed to keep the ceiling prices in effect in Spartanburg. A meeting of directors was called for Monday to ratify the agreement.

Spartanburg is in the midst of a prosperous peach harvest, and 25,000 textile workers are starting week's vacation with pay.

In response to telegrams and letters I have received from my district today, I have dispatched the following answer:

Like you, I agree price controls necessary at least for a while. I voted for recent measure and to override President's veto, feeling with Democratic Leaders BARKLEY and RAYBURN that provisions of proposed act were best Congress would pass. The House by sustaining President's veto has seriously jeopardized price control. Am urging passage of resolution today extending present price-control law.

Fur Farming Must Have Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, fur farming, by nature of its pursuit and products, is a basic part of American agriculture. This was recognized by the Congress not long ago when its activities were transferred from the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture.

The beginning and growth of fur farming parallels the history of other pioneering achievements in the field of agriculture. Though still in the infant stage, it has now developed to the point where it is a sound agricultural resource with unlimited possibilities for expansion and growth if protected and properly nurtured at this critical point in its development.

This new agricultural industry is now facing a crisis caused by unusual conditions created in the world market by the war. Because of the threat to this growing and thoroughly American industry, I am today introducing a bill which will provide for fur farming that protection which we have always afforded to our growing agricultural industries.

Let us consider the nature of this problem as it concerns the American fur farm.

Contrary to popular belief, fur farming is not a natural resource but an industry built by private enterprise. Silver fox, for instance, is raised entirely on farms, and the production of mink raised in captivity far exceeds the number produced or taken from the wilds. The average size fur farm is owner-operated and is built around a family unit similar to the small dairy, livestock, or produce farm. Approximately 70 percent of the products used in feeding fur-bearing animals consist of byproducts from the farm.

The success of the fur farmer is measured by his knowledge of scientific breeding, feeding, and farm management, much as in the raising of domestic livestock, and experience has shown that the most successful fur farmers are those who have had experience or training in animal husbandry. Those who have succeeded in this industry have done so, too, after years of pioneering, hard work, and aggressiveness.

The industry, particularly the farming of silver fox and mink, has made rapid strides since the early twenties. For instance, in 1923, 6,000 silver-fox pelts were put on the market, while in 1940 this number had grown to 261,000. A similar upswing in production is noted in the sale of mink pelts. Today there are approximately 9,000 fur farms, of all types, scattered through 38 States, with an estimated investment of $130,000,000. Products sold from these farms during this year will total approximately $25,000,000.

We should not lose sight of the important contribution fur farming makes to the economic stability of our rural communities. It is providing a much-needed diversification in the agricultural field. Property taxes are assessed and paid on domestically raised fur-bearing animals much as they are on other domestic livestock. The building of this industry will help stem the steady migration of young men from the farms to the industrial centers. The industry has already proved its ability to weather successfully the storms of economic ups and downs.

Now, however, the threat to this typically American small business comes from without.

Huge stocks of pelts are piling up in foreign countries. Production of fur-bearing animals overseas is increasing. Foreign exporters are hungarily eyeing the great American market, denied to them during the war by the lack of shipping facilities. Within the next few years, we can expect to see the United States made the dumping ground for a vast quantity of war-accumulated furs. This can only lead to the ruination of the American fur farmer's logical market—unless we preserve a portion of that market for domestically raised pelts.

The American industry would have to meet this abnormal competition at an extremely unfavorable time. Basic factors in the cost of production in this country far exceeds those in any other, and it is evident from the general economic trend that the costs of wages, feed products, and general overhead expenses will continue to rise. These factors make it impossible for our fur farmers to compete equally on the open market with foreign countries.

It seems vitally important to me that at this time we should take steps to insure for this small but important American industry a portion of the American market. We will be following a time-honored principle of protecting and encouraging small agricultural industries during their adolescent periods, particularly when they show promise of adding to the stability of our agricultural economy.

It is for this reason that I am introducing a bill to restrict the importation of mink skins and fox skins, with the exception of red fox skins, to an amount not to exceed 15 percent of our own production during the preceding import year. This will place the fur-farming industry in the same position as many other domestically produced agricultural products in the matter of quota restrictions and should provide a sure protection for the industry during the critical years ahead.

I urge its early consideration.

Bureaucratic Extravagance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Herald Tribune Sunday, June 16, 1946:

BUREAUCRATIC EXTRAVAGANCE

Representative EARL WILSON, Republican, of Indiana, was a Hoosier schoolmaster. His background explains certain of his legislative proposals. A while ago one was that girls employed by the Government in Washington be subject to a 10 o'clock curfew. His idea was that if the girls went to bed at decent hours they would have time each morning to put on their make-up and eat breakfast before they were scheduled to work for the taxpayers. Not a bad idea at all, but in a day and age when Victorian principles, not to say feministic surrender, are anathema, we can't give it pragmatic endorsement.

Nevertheless, we welcome his latest contribution to the cause of economy in Federal service. He figures that the Government's work in Washington could be done with 75 percent fewer employees, both men and women. This may be an excessive estimate, but not so far from the mark, even so. Few of us realize, for instance, that there has been a net gain of civilian employees at the Capital since VJ-day, though hostilities are over and the need for administrative control and paper work should have been reduced correspondingly. The phenomenon is like a snowball rolling down hill which halts for no sensible reason, if at all.

Mr. WILSON has a theory to explain the phenomenon. In illustration he picked up a nicely bound handbook put out by the Children's Bureau of the Labor Department, quoting subtitles telling how to play the games, This Is My Nose, Teakettle, and White Men and Indians. "This book," he said, "if published at all, should be put out by private concerns."

He is everlastingly right in this particular. Whether he is right in thinking that the "only excuse * * * for keeping three or four times as many employees as are needed is that the administration wants to use them for propaganda purposes" we are not so sure. How about the old explanation, namely, that any department or agency in a bureaucracy seeks survival by expansion?

No Work, All Play, Costs "Jack"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Indianapolis Star of June 26, 1946:

NO WORK, ALL PLAY, COSTS "JACK"

Would an efficient boss allow an employee to read 500 books during working hours? Would a good manager allow a department to continue functioning after it had no more work to do? An efficient boss, and a good manager, would not. But a government bureau head would—in fact did, according to reports from Indiana Representative EARL WILSON'S investigation of the United States Civil Service. A shocking lot of time wasted on Government jobs has already shown up. Civil-service employees themselves, disgusted with overmanned Federal departments, managerial inefficiency, and just plain loafing, are supplying Mr. WILSON with more and more evidence of the tremendous and costly waste in the operation of many Government agencies.

No private business could long survive if it ran its affairs with such disorder and confusion. It would go bankrupt if it maintained overstuffed and unproductive bureaus for any length of time. But Government agencies are subsidized by the taxpayers. They do not go broke unless Congress refuses to appropriate more money to continue. So they go on their merry way, tossing around the money the people cough up each year and trying to look busy by hiding their mystery novels in desk drawers. If we are not careful these lazy leeches will obtain squatter's rights to their easy chairs and, like the poor, will be always with us.

Representative WILSON'S house-cleaning job will be a big help to the American taxpayer if it helps clear away the underbrush from our wasteful Government departments. We earn the money we pay in taxes. Is it too much to ask that Government experts whom our taxes support try to earn theirs?

Tribute to the Memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, so long as there are men who cherish freedom, the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt will never die. He has left to all mankind a legacy of faith and courage—faith in democracy and courage to fight for its survival. Tested in the fires of great crises, his high courage was personal, national, and international.

Whether one agrees with all his policies or not, history will undoubtedly recall Franklin D. Roosevelt as one of the great men of all time and perhaps the greatest President of the United States. About one thing there can be no question: he filled the high office at one of the most crucial times in the history of the world. How well he filled his office and discharged his duties history alone will judge. The present generation is too close to evaluate properly his contribution, but his place in history is secure.

He was a tower of strength in days of threatening chaos. He entered upon the scene in a day of national crisis; he died in a time of international crisis.

He was a moneyed aristocrat, yet one of the most democratic in his attitude toward the common man, the downtrodden. He was a strong leader and an astute politician. Through four national elections, he was chosen by the will of the majority, who felt that democracy was safe in his hands. He was the embodiment of courage. Though physically handicapped beyond the average, he towered above the average man. He was hopeful and optimistic to a high degree. When others feared, he calmed their fears. His was a period of great changes and it called for sweeping decisions. These momentous decisions in the domestic and foreign realm gave rise to some of the greatest controversies in American history. But no amount of controversy can obscure the greatness of the man. When he met failure in one direction, he attacked the same problem in another direction. This, too, is the mark of the statesman. Little wonder that millions around the world looked to him as their spokesman, their source of strength, their leader.

The terrific strain of his duties as Chief Executive of the Nation through more than 12 critical, violent years took its toll. The nature of his death, by cerebral hemorrhage, tells its own story. He had unusual abilities as an executive, and his world-wide perspective was rare.

To our human understanding it seemed tragic in the extreme that he should pass away upon the eve of the triumph of the cause for which he fought. However, a wiser, better Providence allowed this sudden end. Let us not say that Franklin D. Roosevelt did not see victory. He saw it clearly; his faith in the outcome of the struggle was never blurred by temporary set-backs. He died secure in his conviction that the forces of aggression would soon be driven against the wall, to go down to utter defeat. His faith was greater than most people knew.

Today as we honor his memory, we must resolve as well to continue to fight for the ideals in which he placed his trust and for which he gave his life. If he were with us today, he would exhort us to strive to make secure the peace we have so lately won and which we appear in jeopardy of losing. Franklin D. Roosevelt knew that the struggle would not end with the termination of hostilities. He died for a continuing ideal, an ideal which was, and in a larger sense still is, threatened by forces of an incredible greed and brutality and the destruction of the right to worship, think, live, and work as freemen.

America has always developed leaders. Out of desperate necessity came Washington, Lincoln, Wilson, and Roosevelt; to each was given the task of leading the Nation in time of great crisis. The demand for leadership is as strong today. Already the world stands in fear of another war, a war so terrible in its implications that it should shock the leaders of the world into a determination that such a catastrophe shall never come to pass. It need not come, if in our internal affairs and international relations we evidence the same determination, intelligence, and patriotism shown by those who, with Franklin D. Roosevelt, died that we might meet here today in peaceful and fearless assembly.

The real tribute that we can pay to Franklin D. Roosevelt involves more than words of praise and eulogy. It involves a determination to rededicate ourselves to the cause for which he and our soldiers sacrificed their lives. We must determine not to lose the peace through greed, ignorance, or indifference. We betray his memory unless we make certain that the principles for which he died shall not be forgotten or abandoned in a world which seems even now more concerned with profiteering than reasonable profits, power rather than service, and personal gain rather than high principles.

Early in the war he gave expression to American objectives in the following words: "The true goal we seek is far above and beyond the ugly field of battle. When we resort to force, as now we must, we are determined that this force shall be directed toward ultimate good as well as against immediate evil. We Americans are not destroyers—we are builders."

Franklin Roosevelt believed that nations can and must learn to understand and trust each other. He knew that "if civilization is to survive, we must cultivate the science of human relationships—the ability of all peoples, of all kinds, to live together and work together, in the same world, at peace."

He was a man not easily discouraged by difficulties. Just the day before he died, he wrote into a speech to be delivered 2 days later this reference to the American people as a whole: "I measure the sound, solid achievement that can be made at this time by the straightedge of your confidence and resolve," and he went on to declare that "the only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith."

It was by confidence, resolve, and a strong and active faith that he himself overcame a great physical handicap. It was by confidence, resolve, and a strong and active faith that America grew to be what it is today. And it is by confidence, resolve, and a strong and active faith that this Nation, in cooperation with the rest of the world, can build a decent and lasting peace—the most urgent necessity of the modern age.

The memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt is an unspoken appeal to all of us to carry on this spirit, in the traditional spirit of our land, to make this a better world in which our children and our children's children will be free, free from want and free from fear.

When the impartial historian writes of our era, he will record Franklin D. Roosevelt among the highest places in the history of American statesmanship.

Stalwart warrior for peace,
Stanch friend of the oppressed,
Franklin Delano Roosevelt,
In every land thy memory blessed.

Voting Record on Major Legislation Affecting Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include a letter from Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, enclosing my voting record on important legislation affecting agriculture in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

According to the Farm Bureau tabulation of 13 important roll calls, I have a batting average of 0.923 percent on farm legislation—with 12 votes supporting the AFBF position and 1 vote against.

Mr. O'Neal's letter, together with a record of my farm votes, follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1946.

Hon. GEORGE W. GILLIE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GILLIE: It is a pleasure to respond to your request for your voting record on important legislation affecting agriculture in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

I am enclosing your record on some of the outstanding measures on which the American Farm Bureau has had a position during this Congress. The record shows that you have been a good friend of the farmer.

Sincerely yours,

EDW. A. O'NEAL,
President.

Voting record of Representative George W. Gillie, of Indiana, on major farm issues, 79th Cong.

1945—1ST SESS.

	A. F. B. F. position	Gillie vote
Commodity Credit Corporation (H. R. 2023): Mar. 12. On passage of H. R. 2023, to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation and increase its borrowing power from $3,000,000,000 to $4,750,000,000.	For	Yea.
Farm labor: July 13. On motion that House recede and concur in Senate amendment eliminating Lea amendment to H. R. 3368 (National war agencies bill). The Lea amendment required that the War Labor Board observe the definition of agricultural labor contained in the Social Security Act. (A vote of "yea" is a vote against the Lea amendment.)	Against the motion.	Nay.
Food and agriculture organization: Apr. 30. On passage of H. J. Res. 145 to provide for membership of United States in Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.	For	Yea.
Agricultural extension work: May 14. On passage of H. R. 1690, providing for the further development of agricultural extension work	For	Yea.
Reciprocal trade agreements: May 26. On passage of H. R. 3249, to extend the authority of the President to make foreign trade agreements	For	Nay.

Wrecking OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therewith an editorial from the June 27 edition of the Jefferson County Republican, of De Soto, Mo. The editorial is entitled "Wrecking OPA" and expresses the desires and convictions of that great group of average citizens which I have the honor to represent. Without effective price controls, inflation will bring to the common citizen of the country a lower standard of living which to many will be a near approach to poverty, with unavoidable privation and hardships. Citizens of the district I represent and of the entire Nation are looking to Congress for vigorous action in extending adequate and effective price controls. I will continue to use my vote and influence in that direction.

The editorial follows:

WRECKING OPA

Up and down the land the common people, who are not always loud enough to say what they think, are wondering if they are not getting sold down the river in the virtual dismantlement of price control now taking place in the Halls of Congress.

The National Association of Manufacturers and a lot of other gentlemen who are set for a killing have done their best to destroy all semblance of price control. They welcome inflation, because they know they are in a position to take cash and goods and property of people not prepared to meet a tidal wave of increased living costs.

The country's industry is again nearing full production, and the return of merchandise, particularly from warehouse hoarding for higher prices, is becoming noticeable. It seems unwise to limit and kill OPA just when the plan could do its best job for the people of ordinary means.

Another wave of higher prices is coming upon us, and if OPA is done away with, we predict there will be shift of property from the small owner to the big the like of which has not been seen before in this country. The end of that cycle is not a pleasant contemplation, for it could mean the disappearance of democracy as we know it.

OPA has made plenty of mistakes, and the situation in meat, bread, and livestock feeds is no credit to Chester Bowles and his office, but these are not enough reason to destroy an agency which has given good protection to the pocketbooks of the American people.

As long as we can see what happened in real estate, which has had no control, and as long as we can buy newsprint at 5 cents a pound instead of 14 cents a pound, which W. E. Crow paid for it following World War I, we are ready to stay with OPA until there is enough of everything to go around.

Bring on the Proof

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the Framingham (Mass.) News:

BRING ON THE PROOF

Government workers should not be criticized unfairly, but it is important, in view of the current tax rates, that efficiency prevail in the various departments. It has been said often by commentators that Government bureaus are vastly overstaffed.

Now, Representative EARL WILSON, of Indiana, asserts that he is gathering statistics to show that the taxpayers are not getting their money's worth from Government employees.

"When they get 52 Sundays and 52 Saturdays, and a month's vacation plus a lot of sick leave, they only work about half the 365 days of the year," he stated. He added that the "only excuse I find for keeping three or four times as many employees as are needed is that the administration wants to use them for propaganda purposes."

Government employees, he said, are "indoctrinated" with alien philosophies they learn from the economists and professors for whom they work, and are expected eventually to return to their own communities and sell these theories to their parents and friends.

This is a serious charge, and if there is evidence to uphold it the entire matter should be investigated. At any rate, it is the sole explanation offered so far for the retention of 2,000,000 employees on the Federal pay roll now that the war is over. The ways of government are not so mysterious that the facts cannot be obtained in this case.

It may be difficult to prove inefficiency on the part of Government workers—that is, to show that any department is overstaffed. But the taxpayers' representatives at Washington have the power to initiate inquiries into efficiency as well as indoctrination.

Shortage of Poultry Feeds in New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps one reason why President Truman failed to answer the Macedonian cries of the junior Senator from New Hampshire when the latter beseeched the President for action which would send more feed for poultry into New England was his knowledge that the present activities of Government agencies in the distribution of food supplies has worked a grave injustice to the poultry raisers and dairy farmers of New England.

Only a few short months ago the people of New England were beseeched to raise poultry and to secure a high production of eggs. Today it is interesting to note that the official record of the State of Massachusetts shows that in a table covering more than 1,240 flocks of hens there has been a percentage of decrease in number of layers in the five months from January 1 to June 1, 1946, of 50 percent; decrease in the number of pullets raised for replacement between June 1, 1945, and June 1, 1946, to the extent of 19 percent; and a percent decrease in the number of broilers raised to June 1946, to the extent of 57 percent.

At a time when our Nation is sending huge shipments of foodstuffs abroad, it is impossible to secure any reasonable explanation of Federal action or inaction which has resulted in such a serious loss to the potential supply of most valuable poultry products in one of the most populous sections of our country.

For the benefit of the Members of the House, I am pleased to present a letter which I have received from Ellsworth W. Bell, extension economist, and a table setting forth a poultry survey by counties in Massachusetts prepared by J. C. York, extension technical assistant.

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS,
STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Amherst, Mass., June 25, 1946.

The Honorable CHARLES R. CLASON,
Springfield, Mass.

DEAR SIR: The farm survey of decrease in poultry numbers in Massachusetts made during June has been completed with a tabulation of the percentage decreases by counties of the State.

I know that you have an extreme interest in this prevailing situation caused by a lack of feed supplies coming into the area and would appreciate receiving this additional information which completes the analysis of the survey.

There are not any definite signs that the current need for feed supplies has been relieved and the trend as expressed in this survey is currently continuing.

Contracts made with the principal poultry counties of the State recently lead me to believe that poultrymen generally are striving to conserve what little feed is obtainable for use in growing out their replacement pullets for the purpose of maintaining their laying flocks this fall and next winter. To do this they are sacrificing the present laying flock and egg production and current demand is dropping at a very sharp rate.

The most disconcerting element of the current supply situation is that no established poultryman is in any way certain that he will be able to carry present plans to save his replacement pullets to fill his laying houses this coming fall.

Sincerely yours,

ELLSWORTH W. BELL,
Extension Economist.

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS,
STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Amherst, Mass., June 13 1946.

To County Agents et al.:

At the request of the Massachusetts Poultry Association, the extension services in the counties and the State conducted a farm survey of poultry numbers the first week in June 1946. This information was of great interest and need, not only to the poultrymen and the marketing cooperatives of poultry products, but also to the feed supplying agencies who are striving to maintain the flow of feed grains into this area to keep the poultry industry until new crop supplies are available. Over 100 farm reports were received from all counties in the State with the exception of Plymouth. The Brockton Cooperative Egg Auction cooperated in this survey and circularized its membership which covers the five southeastern counties of Massachusetts.

Six questions were asked which would give the decrease comparisons as of the present time in number of layers on hand, replacement pullets being raised, and the number of broilers being raised. The averages for the total survey for the State showed that on June 1, 1946, poultrymen had decreased tneir laying flocks by 50.6 percent from January 1. A normal decrease in layers during this 5-month period is about 20 percent.

The number of replacement pullets being raised on June 1, 1946, was a decrease of 18.5 percent from June 1, 1945. The number of broilers raised in 1946 was a decrease of 57.5 percent from tne number of broilers raised in 1945.

The following table gives an analysis of the percentage for the flocks over 200 and the flocks that were 200 and under.

[1] 2 counties did not separate returns by large and small flocks. Survey covers 10 of 11 counties in Massachusetts.

Surveys similar to this were currently made in the other New England States and reports received indicate that the decrease in Massachusetts is in line with the trends in the other New England States that have suffered the same shortages in feed supplies. Through the office of the Commissioner of Agriculture, Mr. Cole, the results of this survey were placed in the hands of high officials of the Federal Government on Tuesday, June 11, with the urgent request that the situation be recognized and such action as can be taken be activated to relieve the very serious grain supply situation which is threatening the poultry industry of the New England States.

Official figures from the United States Department of Agriculture for the country as a whole do not recognize this serious depletion going on in poultry numbers in the New England States. A report from this office on June 11 stated that "disappearance of layers from flocks since January was about average." This refers to the average numbers for the country as a whole and does not give weighting to the circumstances existing and developing in the respective States of New England which the survey just made clearly indicates.

Reports from cooperative egg-marketing associations during the first week of June are bearing out the results of the survey by a sharp drop in the receipts of local eggs coming in from members. With the continuation of the liquidation trend at this rate since May 15, layers in flocks can be expected to drop even lower than the present survey indicates, with the possibility that the number of layers after July would reach levels substantially below those of prewar II.

FEED

Reports from the feed supplying trade clearly indicate that the next 5 to 6 weeks will be even more difficult than the last 3 weeks. Hard grains to feed poultry are practically nonexistent with small hopes that supplies will reappear before the 1946 oat harvest. There are some encouraging reports that the milo crop in Texas is coming along in good shape and might appear for feeding in this area if we are fortunate to buy it under existing price regulations before the first of July. This will be good and will help to grow out a reduced number of replacement pullets for 1946-47 production on our poultry farms. The arrival of grains now expected during the next 6 weeks can by no means be expected to maintain all of the present poultry on hand in New England which has even now suffered serious depletion.

Interpretation of Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, to complete the legislative history on the Missouri River paragraph in the flood-control bill, H. R. 6597, recently passed by the House of Representatives, under permission heretofore granted, I place in the RECORD the following letters which are self-explanatory:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1946.

The Honorable WILL M. WHITTINGTON,
Chairman, Flood Control Committee,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WHITTINGTON: A party connected with the Bureau of Reclamation has asked me informally whether or not a word which you used in explaining the amendment to strike the words "of the initial stages" from the authorization in section 17 of the new flood-control bill might be interpreted to defeat the amendment.

The phrasing he questions is "previously authorized for the Department of the Interior" feeling that this might be regarded as an interpretation of the amendment and throws the new authorization back to the "previously authorized" of section 9 (a) which was "for the initial stages."

I have told him that I do not see how such a construction could be placed upon the action, because that would be tantamount to saying that the amendment meant nothing. That is, section 17 as reported limited the authorization to "the initial stages." Your amendment very definitely lifted that limitation by removing those words and makes it an "authorization for the prosecution of the comprehensive plan." I have said to him I was sure you used the words "previously authorized for the Department of the Interior" as meaning the program "previously approved for the Department of the Interior" to prosecute or "assigned to the Department of the Interior."

It has occurred to me that if you cared to write me a letter to that effect, it might be useful should that question ever arise. However, on the fact of the action itself, I cannot see how your remarks could be construed to deny the very thing the amendment was doing. I certainly understood the use of the words "previously authorized for the Department of the Interior" as referring to the division of projects as between those authorized for the Army engineers and those authorized for the Department of the Interior to undertake in the division of responsibility for carrying out the program.

In conclusion, I want to compliment you on the statesmanlike way in which you handled the bill, both in its preparation and its consideration.

Sincerely yours.

FRANCIS CASE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1946.

Hon. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CASE: I have your letter of the 23d. Your understanding of the words I used "previously authorized for the Department of the Interior" is correct. These words refer to the division of projects as between those authorized for the Army engineers and those authorized for the Department of the Interior.

Very sincerely,
WILL M. WHITTINGTON,
Member of Congress,
Chairman, Committee on Flood Control.

Gold Sells Abroad at From $40.53 to $75 Per Ounce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a matter which might well receive more attention than is being given to it is the price that gold commands in the markets of the world when it is permitted to reach them.

The present gold situation is reviewed by J. H. Carmicheal in the New York Times of yesterday with information of considerable value to Members of Congress. Therefore, under permission granted, I place it in the RECORD at this time:

GOLD PRICES VARY WIDELY IN WORLD—OFFERINGS OF METAL BY MEXICO AT $40.53 AN OUNCE FOCUS NOTICE ON OTHER MARKETS

(By J. H. Carmicheal)

With the Bank of Mexico now offering gold freely for export at the equivalent of $40.53 an ounce, attention again has been drawn to the world gold markets where the metal is being offered in steadily increasing quantities at prices of $75 an ounce and higher.

At present, the Bank of Mexico is the largest seller of the metal in the world. It is reported that sales in one day amounted to over $5,000,000. So far as can be determined it is the only central bank that is offering gold for export to any purchaser.

Largely from purchases made in Mexico by the United States Government in the war years and from domestic production, Mexico has accumulated a sizable gold reserve. According to the Federal Reserve bulletin for June, the Bank of Mexico at the end of April held $254,000,000 of gold which, valued at $35 an ounce, represented about 7,260,000 ounces. At the end of 1942, the Mexican gold reserves were only $39,000,000, but at the end of November 1945 they had reached a peak of $296,000,000.

In the war years, Mexico's gold output has averaged about 550,000 ounces yearly, all of which the Bank of Mexico offered to buy at $35 an ounce. Provided all this has been purchased by the bank, the increase in reserves would have approximated 2,000,000 ounces valued at $70,000,000.

Because of lack of faith in paper currency, there is a heavy demand for gold in every country and the price is above $35 an ounce at official exchange rates. At present, the main distributing markets in the Near and Far East are Cairo, Bombay, and Shanghai, where the metal commands the equivalent of $70 to $75 an ounce.

NEW MARKETS DEVELOPING

A market in gold is reported to be developing in several countries of Latin America. At Buenos Aires, where a market is said to be thriving, the price of gold is around $50 an ounce, but the exact figure is difficult to determine because of Argentine exchange restrictions.

Last week, the United States Government agreed to release to Argentina some $600,000,000 in gold in payment of dollar balances it had accumulated during the war. If Argentina should adopt a policy similar to Mexico with respect to gold, a further large stock of the metal would be made available to the world market.

A considerable volume of United States currency is held in nearly every country as a result of our war expenditures. Because of the inability to purchase American goods, part of this currency is being used for buying gold, the quantities purchased depending largely upon export controls.

In recent years, the Bank of Mexico has been most successful in obtaining gold from the United States Treasury for its dollars. In 1944, the net exports of gold from the United States to Mexico were $109,695,000. Whether the Bank of Mexico will be able to continue this practice now that it is selling gold previously obtained at a profit of $5.50 an ounce will depend upon the attitude of the Treasury Department.

In the past the United States Treasury on many occasions has refused to settle dollar balances in gold. This, however, was on the theory that the gold might find its way into enemy hands. To most of the South American countries, however, gold transactions were carried on throughout the war. Argentina was an exception.

OWNERSHIP IS RESTRICTED

The private ownership of gold except in fabricated form is not allowed by individuals in the United States, and the gold owned by the United States Government is not sold except under severe restrictions and then only to other governments or central banks. Consequently, the redemption of American currency abroad in gold can be only through a central bank and with the approval of the Treasury Department.

So far as is known, there is no move under way to stabilize the world price of gold. The United States Government will buy all gold offered at $35 an ounce and many other nations offer a similar price at current rates of exchange. However, this is only a floor under the price of the metal, since no country will sell it freely at that price.

After the Napoleonic wars, England reorganized its monetary system and offered to purchase all gold offered through the Bank of England at £3 17s 9d a standard ounce and to sell in unlimited quantities at the same price plus a handling charge of 1½d. This was the equivalent of $20.67 an ounce delivered at the United States Mint.

The First World War threw Britain "off gold" temporarily, but it went back to gold in 1926. However, in 1931, Britain was forced to abandon it as a monetary base and in 1933 the United States also "went off."

When the United States raised the price of gold to $35 an ounce in 1934, much of the European metal came here in payment of its balance of trade. Despite the loss of some $2,500,000,000 in gold during the war, the reserves of the United States at the end of April amounted to $20,251,000,000, or nearly two-thirds of the present monetary gold stocks of the world, excluding Russia.

Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following letter relative to H. R. 7646, legislation which I recently introduced:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., June 27, 1946.

Subject: Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation (H. R. 7646).

The Honorable PAT KEARNEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It has recently come to my attention that you have introduced a bill in Congress for the purpose of creating a corporation which will have as objectives the granting of loans to various concerns throughout the Nation in order to create nonexisting or expand existing facilities which will aid the disabled as well as nondisabled veterans achieve a proper mental attitude and a healthier social and economical standing by fostering continuous employment throughout the country.

We cannot establish proper mental and physical development for our returned American veterans, who so valiantly sacrificed so much during both wars for the preservation of democracy as we know it, unless this Government assures through your proposed legislation that opportunities be created for continuous and profitable employment.

This country has and is still disbursing millions of dollars in a form of subsidy to unemployed veterans. This subsidy is, of course, in my opinion most admirable and for a few people quite useful, but a great majority tend to believe as I do that it is degenerating, demoralizing, and it retards the natural development of the individual. This subsidy is but a temporary contentment which will soon terminate and action must be taken to provide constructive, logical, and practical legislation such as you have proposed which can be equally beneficial to the individual as well as to the Nation as a whole. In brief, let me state that subsidizing unemployment on a national scale is, in my opinion, unjustifiable when the same funds could be used to subsidize constructive enterprises leading to full employment in this country.

Congressman KEARNEY, I extend my sincere congratulations and you are to be commended for legislation that should have the support of all and the opposition of none. It is a tragedy that legislation such as you proposed was not passed after the last World War.

I sincerely hope and pray that your bill will be adopted by Congress in the near future, and you may with my permission use part or all of my letter for any purpose you desire or see fit. You may if you wish publish this communication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD if you think it will help. Will you advise me if this is done by forwarding copy of insertion.

I remain,

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE H. LECLERC,
President, LeClerc Miniature Furniture Exhibits.

Distribution: One copy to the following:

Senators: Walsh, Guffey, Morse, Saltonstall, Tunnell, Radcliffe, Briggs, Green; Congressmen: Edith N. Rogers, Forand, Fogarty; Assistant Attorney General J. Howard McGrath.

For your consideration, please.

John Stelle, Commander of American Legion, Pleads for National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include herewith an article from the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal, containing inspiring quotations from an address delivered by John Stelle, national commander of the American Legion, at a homecoming for World War II veterans sponsored by the East St. Louis Legion Post on June 28, 1946.

I have personally known John Stelle for more than 15 years. He is an outstanding American who courageously fights for the principles for which he believes his country stands. His remarks on this occasion were forthright and honest. I am particularly impressed by his appeal to Americans to avoid the "specter of isolationism," lest they play into the hands of Communists, and I was equally impressed with his warning that the United States has only a short space of time to help the world in bringing about an enduring peace.

The article follows:

STELLE AGAIN RAPS REDS—LEGION NATIONAL COMMANDER RENEWS DRIVE ON COMMUNISTS IN SPEECH HERE

Appealing for national unity as a means of bringing about an enduring peace, John Stelle, national commander of the American Legion, declared in an address here Friday night that the Communists are in the midst of a great recruiting drive in an effort to revive the specter of isolationism.

Stelle bitterly attacked what he termed "un-American groups" that play into the hands of Communists, and warned that this country has only a short space of time to help the world in bringing about an enduring peace.

The national Legion commander was the principal speaker at the East St. Louis American Legion homecoming program observed here Friday with an all-day program of entertainment and Legion activities.

PLAYING THEIR PART

"In the campaign of world communism on the march, American Communists are playing their puppet part," Stelle declared. "They do not want an America united in international collaboration for peace. They are trying to revive the specter of isolationism, to break the ranks of American unity. They are trying to enlist Americans to go it alone again.

"American 'Commies' are in the midst of a great recruiting drive. Their leaders are swarming throughout industrial areas seeking to fan labor-management controversies into flames of consuming communism. They are trying to enroll disgruntled veterans. They are infiltrating into every strata of American society.

"In their subversive efforts they have on their sides numerous other un-American groups. All these groups have one thing in common; they plant seeds of distrust and suspicion, of prejudice and hatred, of bigotry and intolerance. They seek to pit class against class, creed against creed, and race against race."

ATTACKS SMITH

Gerald K. Smith, head of the America First Committee, was branded by Stelle as one of the most infamous hate peddlers in the country. "He is the generalissimo of the Nationalist movements in this country," said Stelle. "Smith and his ilk overlook no bets. He invites national disunity. They are quick to move into any area where trouble is brewing."

"The Ku Klux Klan," Stelle said, "is the most despicable un-American organization in the country, because it is of native origin, fostered by men bred in this country." The Klan, Stelle asserted, is raising its masked head again.

"A united America is and must be essential in our progress toward enduring peace," Stelle declared. "The outlawing of war forever is a job which demands the wholehearted cooperation of every American. It is a national partnership undertaking," Stelle asserted.

Stelle declared that the American Legion strongly condemns the Klan and like organizations, and challenged them to emerge in the open.

Stelle's speech was made before candidates prior to their initiation during ceremonies on the corner of Eighth and St. Louis Avenues. Approximately 200 spectators witnessed the ceremonies. The address was broadcast.

Dr. Ernest Hatch Wilkins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from Lorain (Ohio) Journal of June 26, 1946:

DR. WILKINS SAYS FAREWELL

Ernest Hatch Wilkins has said good-by to Oberlin College to which he came 19 years ago as president.

His retirement is cause for regret not only to Oberlin, but to Lorain County. Dr. Wilkins was not conspicuous in affairs outside the college. Nevertheless, the very presence of a man of his standing as a liberal and an intellectual was an influence that reached far beyond the college president's office.

Dr. Wilkins did more than preserve Oberlin's well-known traditions. He added to them. As the Cleveland Plain Dealer pointed out, Dr. Wilkins leaves quite as notable a mark on the character of Oberlin College as any of the great presidents who preceded him. His regime will always stand out in the institution's history as one in which new high standards of scholarship and deep respect for intellectual leadership were added to Oberlin's emotional and spiritual heritage.

Jesse H. Jones Versus British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to extend the editorial which appears in the Houston Chronicle under date of Friday, June 28, 1946, in which the views of Mr. Jesse H. Jones relative to the proposed loan or gift to Great Britain are expressed with his usual logic and clarity. No man in the United States is better qualified to pass judgment on this transaction than Mr. Jones. The taxpayers of our Nation, loaded down as they are with national obligations amounting to over $650,000,000,000, direct and contingent liabilities, "cannot," as Mr. Jones stresses, "afford to lend $3,750,000,000 without security to a borower who has previously defaulted on its obligations."

Under leave to extend, I am inserting the editorial:

STILL TIME TO REVISE THE BRITISH LOAN

The House of Representatives will devote 4 days next week to debate on the proposed British loan. This is more time than the lower House of Congress has given for floor discussion on any other legislation at this session. It is by no means too much time, for no more important issue faces the National Legislature.

The proposed British loan is of great importance to the future of the Nation. It is of great importance to the future of the Members of Congress who are called to vote upon it. It is important to the Nation because we cannot afford to lend $3,750,000,000 without security to a borrower who has previously defaulted on his obligations to us. It is important to the Members of Congress because they will be judged by the electorate this fall, and polls show that all over the country the American people are against the loan. Two important primaries have been held in the last few weeks where the British loan was one of the main issues, and in both instances the candidate supporting the British loan was defeated.

The important thing for the House Members to consider is that they do not have to approve the British loan in the form presented. They can authorize a loan made on different conditions. If the British really need the money they will take it under any reasonable conditions proposed. There is nothing unreasonable about the British pledging collateral for a loan, as the Chronicle has suggested in this instance. They have already pledged collateral to the RFC for a loan and, with administration approval, could get another $1,000,000,000 on the same collateral without congressional action. They could easily get still another half billion from the RFC on additional investments and operations in this country from which they are making large profits. That would be enough cash to give them to spend in other countries. So what can be the objection to our requiring collateral to the extent that they are in a position to give it? In addition, we can, if necessary, sell them some farm commodities and other products on credit.

Aside from the absurdity of making this large loan without any collateral whatever, we get absolutely nothing definite from the British in return. They make certain vague commitments, but they are in the future. They agree to undertake to amend their imperial preference tariff system, but that is indefinite. They agree to impose no further discriminatory quota restrictions on United States products, but they do not pledge themselves to abolish existing restrictions. They agree to unblock current dollar exchange and when possible (if ever, in their opinion) to free the many billions of sterling credit that will still be blocked. There is not a specific, binding, enforceable pledge in the lot.

Our negotiators have tried to create the impression that these impediments to free trade which the British may now revise grew out of World War II. As a matter of fact, British quota restrictions are a relic of World War I. The system of United Kingdom imperial tariff preference was adopted in the early 1920's. The United States now proposes to pay the British to alter policies which they adopted after World War I and not because of the pressure of World War II.

It would be well also for the House Members to consider what has happened since our representatives concluded the loan agreement with the British. There has been no progress whatever as to the future of island bases in the Pacific or the Atlantic. There has been no determination as to our rights with respect to air bases which we built with American men, money, and materials. The British Government has dragged its feet as hard as it could on the settlement of the Palestine question agreed to by a joint Anglo-American commission.

And of most importance, the passage of time has demonstrated that the British financial position is nowhere near as grievous as was pictured by their representatives when they were insisting upon the money. According to the testimony of W. L. Clayton before Congress, the British estimated that they would have a deficit of $3,300,000,000 in the balance of payments during the first year of transition from war to peace, that is, that their imports would exceed their exports by that amount. Actually in the 10 months since VE-day, for which figures are available, British imports have been approximately $1,000,000,000 less than was estimated by the loan negotiators, and British exports have been running at a rate of approximately $1,000,000,000 more than was estimated. So that the adverse balance of payments will, in all probability, be in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000 less than our negotiators were given to understand.

Obviously, a difference of $2,000,000,000 in the first year demonstrates that the British do not need $3,750,000,000 to meet the adverse balance of payments over the first three postwar years, although this was the specified purpose of the loan.

Under these circumstances the loan, if for no other reason, should be revamped and reduced. The people of the United States, who are the lenders, cannot in the interest of their own economy and solvency, afford to let the British have one dollar more than is necessary to give them immediate relief. If the British only need $2,000,000,000, or $1,500,000,000, or $1,000,000,000 to carry them over the next 2 or 3 years, that is all we should lend them, and that should be on security.

They can easily leave the collateral now with the RFC as security for an additional $1,000,000,000. Accepting their own representations, that would seem to be the amount which they need for the first year. If more is needed later, the Congress will be here to consider an application.

Obviously, Lord Keynes convinced our State and Treasury Department officials that the loan was necessary, and upon that assumption administration representatives have done all they could to high-pressure the loan through Congress. But, call it what you will, the loan in its present form is a subsidy to the British Empire and bodes no good for the American people.

The Senate has approved the loan and the responsibility is now entirely with the House of Representatives, which more nearly represents the current will of the people, and which should reflect that will in its vote on the British loan.

Raymond W. Miller, Top Public Relations Man of 1945

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I have known Raymond W. Miller for many years. He is my friend and constituent. For some time he has been engaged in public-relations work. He was selected as the outstanding man in that field of work for the year 1945. At the time of receiving the 1945 award given by the American Council on Public Relations, Mr. Miller delivered a most inspiring address, which I hope every Member of Congress will read. It gives an entirely different concept of public relations than is ordinarily held by persons not in that work. The speech is a reflection of the broad, tolerant, and constructive approach which Mr. Miller utilizes in carrying on his public-relations work. The Island Press Cooperative, Inc., published the address, which follows:

KEEPERS OF THE CORPORATE CONSCIENCE

Public-relations techniques are largely based upon a careful study of the causes and results of human behavior. The commerical corporation exists in a world of human plans, passions, and prejudices. To adjust itself to these, is the goal of its public-relations program. Before analyzing the public-relations problems of corporations, it is important to clinically examine the corporation itself.

Nearly every corporation in America began its existence after the enactment of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution. This legislation was aimed to give the Negro certain legal protection. Whether it did or did not, and to what extent, is a matter of personal opinion. It did, however, become the Magna Carta of the modern corporation, particularly insofar as State interference therewith is concerned. The Supreme Court of the United States, in interpreting the language of this amendment to the Constitution, ruled that it gave corporations the rights of persons.

Corporations are children of the legislative assembly, purely creatures of statute. Neither by natural nor common law can corporations be created. They cannot sit on juries, but are often tried by them; they do not vote, but voters many times have things to say about them; they cannot bear arms in time of war, yet they arm others who fight for national existence. They are persons in the eyes of the law.

As persons, corporations must assume the responsibility that goes with the grant of power. With every right, there is a corresponding obligation. When a group of men acquire a legal prerogative to form a corporation, they simultaneously become obligated to an analogous moral responsibility in advising that corporation to keep its actions within due bounds, as do the parents of a child in regard to its relations to the community.

The child will grow up and, on his twenty-first anniversary, become an adult, but a corporation always remains a person of limited capacity. Since it is an artificial, intangible person it must always be directed by human hands. Those who control the sphere of action in which it operates should exercise as much reasonable care in preventing it from becoming a moral offender in its area of activity as do the parents of children in their field of control. This duty of guardianship is affirmative as well as negative. Corporate action should be guided so that it will contribute to general welfare.

Following the legal establishment of the corporate idea, corporations increased from a mere handful until today they exist for service in nearly every form of human endeavor, public, private, and cooperative. When our United States Supreme Court ruled that corporations were persons under the Federal Constitution, it did not, however, and could not, breathe the spirit of humanity into them. A corporation per se has no conscience.

These invisible, intangible, and inanimate beings, existing only in contemplation of law, filled a national need and grew prodigiously in size, number, and influence. The breath of life in the form of human touch, however, is needed in the administration of the corporate structure, unless it is to become a robot Frankenstein. If corporations are to be of the greatest good to the greatest number, they must possess a humane personality as well as a personal identity.

Unless those in control of corporations furnish them with consciences whose dictates are followed by corporate action in the interest of general welfare, the Supreme Court of the United States could logically alter its trend of decisions and no longer consider corporations as persons. Those charged with corporate responsibility must recognize that corporation privileges are not protected by the Constitution, except by judicial interpretation thereof.

Today, many corporation executives have recognized this and are beginning to give the company the advantage of their own social consciousness. Public relations consultants are being called upon by an increasing number of managers to assist in translating their thinking into an active public-relations program.

The public relations of a corporation is the end product of this team activity. The public relations consultant himself does not create public relations. That is the final result for good or evil of the combined activity of all in the organization. As members of such corporate teams, let us examine together this evening some of the public relations problems of the present-day business or commercial corporations.

The operation of corporations, devoid of interest in the humanities, can lead only to statism, which will mean first, the restriction and ultimately the abolition of private enterprise. Conversely, if corporate actions are guided by the "human touch" with a conscience, they will serve the people's needs and thus make their position more secure.

Mankind is ruled largely under one or the other of two great systems of jurisprudence. One is the common law, which developed in England throughout the centuries as she metamorphosed from a land of serfdom into a nation of free men. But, eventually, common law became ossified. Human progress accordingly became subservient to such a mass of archaic writs and slow-moving court procedures that, finally, the Lord Chancelor was called upon by His Majesty to grant relief, based upon equity and good conscience, in cases where human rights were challenged by property rights. The King did this as the executive head of a corporation—a corporation sole—meaning the state itself, which, like any other corporation, continues as a legal entity irrespective of the death of individuals. "The King is dead. Long live the King," expresses this legal phraseology in common form.

Equity jurisprudence, which injected the human equation into the system of common law, grew from the pronouncements of the Chancelor. His equitable decrees insured personal and group welfare wherein the rules of the common law were inadequate to provide it. Equity came to be based upon a multitude of precepts, which are largely the expression of man's groping toward equality with other men. Two of these old precepts of equity are:

"If you want equity, you must do equity.

"If you yourself want justice, you must come to ask for it with clean hands."

Similarly, the counsel of the public relations adviser should aid business to instill human values into the cold yet necessary calculations of operations for efficiency.

Those early Kings of England, as the reigning executives of a corporation sole, looked to the Chancelor, who was considered the keeper of the King's conscience, for humane advice and counsel. As the King and the Chancelor worked together for the welfare of their corporation—the State, and the people as a whole—so do the modern business executive and his public relations adviser work together for the welfare of their corporation and of the people of the State from which the corporate power was granted. This is accomplished by guiding corporate actions so that they are done in "good conscience."

The other great system of law, known as Corpus Juris Civilis, comes down from the ancient Roman statutes, having been put in code form during the reign of Emperor Justinian. This is the basis of criminal law in nearly all the countries of the world, with the exception of the Anglo-Saxon nations. Under the Code of Justinian, the accused under an indictment is deemed guilty until such time as he proves himself innocent. By the common law rule, however, all accused men are considered innocent until proven guilty beyond reasonable doubt by the State. In the practice of public relations, it is well to follow the philosophy of the Romans rather than that of the Anglo-Saxons. "The customer is always right" is a practical way of expressing this principle.

The public relations technician looks upon a charge against his client as something that he must examine and evaluate rather than forthwith suppress or destroy. Perhaps in the criticism will be found that which may save his client from ruin. Something which, by adjusting practices, may enable the corporation to better serve its stockholders and the public at large. Having taken this attitude, it is easier to make a friendly suggestion that the critic explain his point to clear up any misunderstanding and, if the criticism is warranted, to remove that cause for complaint. He does not thereby relegate his client's interests to the background, but rather pushes them forward when he assumes the spirit of fair and tolerant examination of criticisms.

Herein lies one of the greatest fundamental differences between the formal practice of law and the informal practice of public relations. A lawyer is an advocate, but a public relations counselor is a constructive critic. Both have their places; both are devoted to the cause of the client. Just as a psychiatrist and a diagnostician, though differing in techniques, may combine their efforts to save a mind and a life—so the public relations consultant and the attorney may unite to pilot a client unerringly in the fields of material things and of spiritual values.

America, founded because of a desire to escape from the mental slavery of established customs in Europe, is today in a position to influence materially the lives of all men. Will the Nation revert to the instincts of the caveman and decide to dominate the world by force of military power and economic pressure? Or will America view its present position as an opportunity to develop and encourage its interest in man as a spiritual individual?

Never before has such a momentous challenge been hurled at a nation. Can human selfishness, diabolical arrogance, and asinine conceit be subjugated to needed generosity, Christian humility, and sublime understanding?

American leadership, together with that of its allies will influence the course of human events for immediate generations ahead. Will American business play its part with the Government and the people in this new era?

The United States encourages enlightened corporate business enterprise, whether by corporations for profit or cooperative corporations not for profit. International contacts of the future should be made not alone by the military or the diplomatic corps. Unless American business misses its opportunity, it can play a noble part in the world's drama. It is imperative that this part shall be one of justice, untainted by any shadow of villainy.

The immediate world need for goods and services is so great that it bewilders the imagination of statisticians and daydreamers alike. Will commercial representatives look upon this as a bonanza, or will it be envisioned as a fruitful field for fair dealing and honest service for buyers and sellers alike?

Both foreign and domestic commerce and industry beckon to the professional public relations adviser, who is interested in man as a dignified individual human being, and not as a slave to either a political or an industrial tyrant. Our present capitalistic society can endure only if those in control of capital recognize that the hard, steely facts of business must be alloyed with the humanities.

The well-considered public relations program is designed to act as a catalyst to help clarify the muddy thinking of a strife-torn economic and social world. Just as scientists with the atomic bomb took a little of the power of nature to destroy other material objects, so can man, if he desires, appropriate a small share from the sublime love of the universe and bring about social, political, and industrial understanding among men.

It is said that the nucleus of the atomic bomb weighs fewer pounds than can be counted on the digits of the human hand, yet, properly applied with precision and timing, it is able to destroy with a vengeance comparable to the Biblical wrath of Jehovah. The scientific application of the technique of public relations, applied to the troubles of the world, will have as great an effect in clearing away distress, alleviating suffering, and dissolving economic and social chaos as did the atomic bomb in vaporizing or disintegrating matter.

No man should embark upon a public relations career without realizing that he is dealing with a fraction of a key power even greater than that formerly held by the disrupted atom. His is an enormous responsibility. The public relations practitioner deals with man's relation to man. He must couple pounds, dollars, acres, and cubic feet with social consciousness, health, full education, common understanding, and simple faith. His duty is to help men to learn to live together amicably and justly.

In the fourth century before Christ, Hippocrates, the "father of medicine" in Greece, paved the way to elevate the practice of healing into a profession by his Hippocratic Oath, still given to medical graduates today. By this, physicians bind themselves to look first to the welfare of society. Were this not done, medicine might never have evolved into a profession.

Public relations practitioners today need a Hippocrates to bind them to a code by which they will dedicate themselves first to the welfare of mankind.

The individual public relations person cannot aid materially in making public relations a profession if he allows himself to be a kept part of a business organization in administrative concubinage, or help brighten a shady background unless he knows that the basis of such off-color situation was an error and not intentionally done. If public relations is to be recognized as a profession, it must earn and demand the respect due a profession. Accordingly, corporate management must take into consideration this fact, rather than expect to call in a practitioner of economic abortion. Ethical businesses hold such practice in contempt.

Public relations plans must be looked upon as an integral unit of the business rather than as a mascot subject to the whim of a more or less benevolent executive. As the family Bible is often one of the most conspicuous, yet least used, parts of the household equipment, so is the public relations program in those organizations that fail to recognize the need for spiritual values in business. As the worn pages of a Bible, however, show the way of family growth toward nobility of soul—so does the used conscientious public relations program reflect itself in corporate action worthy of good will.

The little paperhanger from Austria and the god of Tokyo believed that the world could be ruled by a philosophy of hate, cruelty, and persecution. Evil for good, brute force for mutual agreement, and tricky diplomacy instead of adherence to international law, furnished the combination of precepts upon which they built their program. The implementing of this philosophy into action left a trail of broken men, shattered places and things—a devastated wilderness where once had been the seat of progressive culture; a pile of rubble where sculptors and artists and architects had left their translations of beauty and justice into material things. Much of the world is now a mass of homeless people with unstable ideas and ideals, who wonder where truth and virtue and justice are to be found.

Into this area of moving emotions our military is bringing hope for the future. History is replete with stories of bloody atrocities under the "heel of the conqueror." During these past years this unbridled brutality has brought sorrow to millions. Today, however, the American Army and Navy is winning puzzled populations by feeding the hungry, by playing with little children, by sharing hospital facilities with wounded aliens, by extending psychiatric help in human adjustments, and by giving intelligent attention to the helpless—the old, the weary, and the impoverished.

If, when the businessman begins to trade with these people, his practice of public relations is as sound as that of the military to date, then will we experience a new age in the commercial relations of mankind.

"Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re" (gentle in manners, but resolute in deed) is an ancient Latin expression that should be indelibly transcribed in the minds and on the hearts of all men who have been entrusted with economic, political, social, or industrial power.

Mother Goose and her progeny were well versed in some of the fundamentals of public relations. She taught her children to say "Thank you," "Excuse me," and "If you please." Kind words are small keys to big locks.

Words are the chief tools of the business world. Too often, they are chosen only to express an idea without connoting the niceties of common courtesy. As the well-managed industrial plant has its custodian of the tools, so should the public relations adviser to business help control the flow of its word tools. The old adage, "* * * the kingdom was lost—and all for the want of a horseshoe nail," is often true where business contacts, nurtured through the years, are often destroyed by careless use of a tool word.

Executives are realizing that, as oil lubricates the fast-moving gears of mechanical industry and keeps them in efficient operation, so does the lubricant of courtesy and honest endeavor, coupled with decent motives, keep the public contact of a business organization smooth and efficient. Understanding executives look upon a public relations program not as flavored honey to spread on moldy situations, but rather as essential economic vitamins to give life and vigor to an organization.

"Divide and rule" is the formula for dictator-controlled statism. Tolerance and an active common interest in general welfare is the antidote. It is yet to be proven that a democracy can withstand concerted peacetime pressures generated by internal blocs, each maneuvering for advantage. This Nation, for a period of years prior to the war, was rapidly dividing into segments, each with a particular problem or desire inherent in the group. These pressures were frequently generated with no thought of the effect upon other parts of society. Monetary or social benefit to the group in question was too often the motivating power.

America largely set aside these social, economic, and class differences in wartime. No sane man believes that they will be forgotten entirely in peace. There is not the war urge to unity; but, as a parallel to this, there is a rare opportunity to develop a program of mutual understanding, based upon ascertained facts rather than upon blind emotion. If the executives of business, with other group leaders, will study their current problems with a view to understanding the humanities which are involved, together with the cold facts of the balance sheet and the profit and loss statement, then real progress will be made toward integrating our democracy.

America has had few greater friends than Lord Macaulay. That great student of political and social science once prophesied, however, that self-seeking divisions, inherent in the development of a metropolitan democracy, would destroy that selfsame civilization. Democracy can inoculate itself against this internal infection only by these various groups becoming interested in something more than their own selfish welfare.

Many deplore the increasing part that government plays in the daily lives and affairs of men. The inroads by the state upon the even tenor of pure individuality, however, have resulted because some interest or individual lacked social consciousness proportionate to its or his material and economic advantages.

Our immediate ancestors crossed the Appalachians and the Rockies with the same general type of transportation that Abraham used when he came out of Ur of the Chaldees. Our Conestoga wagons were little improvement over the vehicles in use when Hannibal crossed the Alps. Man's voice carried relatively few miles at most, whereas today, events around the world are heard as they happen. Whether this great progress in a material world will be of lasting benefit to mankind—or will seal its doom—depends not upon the physical laws of the universe that our scientists unearth, but rather upon whether we will also hitch our team of investigation to the plow in the field of social and moral behavior.

To history, literature, and philosophy, the public relations counselor can look for precedents and inspiration. The study of current events, or history in the making, reveals some interesting opportunities in this respect.

Businessmen have cooperated with the Government's efforts to control production and allocation of supplies during wartime. The decisions of the War Production Board and other war agencies, coupled with the cooperative help of industry and labor, made it possible to destroy our enemies through the weight of material power. No greater demonstration of the inherent strength within a democracy was ever made than that represented by these emergency bureaus which were largely staffed by men from corporate business. These executives wholeheartedly left their affairs and helped in various home-front war efforts. Their actions were of inestimable value. In time of peace, they might well consider taking the same attitude toward calls for public and human service. This is one way in which the inanimate corporation can participate in national welfare.

Now that the Government has released controls, there is a responsibility on business that it, with the aid of labor, must slide over into the driver's seat and steer our economic machine along the path most conducive to the common weal. Such patriotic enthusiasm in peacetime is needed.

America, in one stroke, performed a most worth-while public relations feat when it refunded to China an indemnity received in the Boxer Rebellion and permitted the Chinese to use that money to send some of their promising young people to American universities. That investment, made in human welfare, has paid tremendous dividends in friendship as evidenced by the great and strong Chinese ally that continued to believe in America even though it shipped scrap iron to the Japanese.

The loyalty of the Philippines to the American way of life, in the face of seductive temptations by Japanese totalitarianism, is a testimonial to a national program, predicated upon the doctrine of humanitarianism rather than merely upon the system of double-entry bookkeeping.

During these war years, corporation management has had a rare opportunity to prove the results of well-planned public relations programs. People accepted delays incident to telephone service with a smile. The Pullman upper berth attained social distinction without passenger recalcitrance. The railroad trains were sometimes late, but criticisms were softened. Air-travel disappointments were the order of the day, but when the apologetic cancelation call from the company arrived, it was met with a response in like spirit.

These are a few examples of how an intelligent public relations program can make the customer feel that he is a part of the family and willing to be served, when necessary, in family style. Some other segments of American business without a well-planned public relations program but with similar wartime inconveniences have not had the same type of popular good will, thus proving that public relations to be effective must be a part of a full-time, sincere effort and not be looked upon merely as a fire department to call only in an emergency.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States enacts, among other things, that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. Substantially similar provisions prohibiting restraint of the press by legislatures are found in all of the State constitutions. Freedom of the press is the basic foundation of democracy.

Those who enter upon a press career automatically assume a duty to use their immunity from governmental interference to give their readers the benefits of freedom in the form of full disclosure and a truthful and factual presentation.

Newspaper and periodical editors and staffs, as a whole, have been cognizant of the moral duty to present the truth which they assume when taking these rights under the freedom-of-the-press clause. The oppressed, the lowly, and the racial minority, all find a champion within a free press.

Public relations people can learn much from the ethical standards of the press. Some so-called public relations men have tried to use "pressure" tactics on the press and others. This is the antithesis of good public relations procedure with understandable bad results.

The public relations adviser should recognize that his greatest strength is in the truth and that, when he tries to influence another to color the truth, he has sown the seed for his own professional downfall. He must realize that facts are stubborn things and truth though crushed to earth will rise again.

No honest public relations practitioner will knowingly take a client whose motives he considers dishonest. He cannot be the artist to whiten sepulchers. That job still belongs to the age-old clan of hypocrites.

The right thing to do is the best thing to do, expresses the philosophy of the honest business leader who is looking into the future to discern the policy that he should set for his company.

Too often the commercial value of knowing people becomes the motivating spirit by which new acquaintances are secured. This is a prostitution of the better motives of human relationship. Elbert Hubbard once said, "Use your friends by being of use to them."

The years ahead are going to be evolutionary. What one organization does will tend to either weave or unravel the fabric of an industry. If America can utilize the best that it has learned in its public and private dealings with man and with nation, then the world will be able to ascend new heights—to material and spiritual glory.

Here are a few of the many current problems that are worthy of the best joint thinking of the public relations consultant and the executive of business:

Are there other labor problems involving points of difference aside from wages and hours?

Should the primary producer of food, fiber, and shelter products be taken into consideration in the plans of the assembler, transporter, processor, and distributor?

Are cheap raw materials the answer to economic prosperity?

Should corporate boards of directors be elected entirely on pecuniary basis, or should representatives of related vocational interests or affected society be invited to participate in the directorship?

Will profit and nonprofit corporations intelligently study their points of agreement and conflict?

Can the distributing business with salesmen riding the rural routes concern itself with the economic problems of the small town or entirely with the catalog of things that must be sold?

Will directors become stifled with formalism and concerned primarily with cash intake or will they integrate their own corporation problems with those of society?

Will groups and individuals follow the dictates of the prompters of racial intolerance and class hatreds or will they promote an era of good will based on common grounds of mutuality and interest?

Will business find what the potential customer wants in line with his needs, rather than what business wants to sell him?

Can protection from obsolescence at the cost of social gains be justified, such as the suppression of patents to improvements?

Does business realize that, as constant research is needed in the modern manufacture and distribution of goods, it also has need of painstaking research in the field of humanity wherein its commodities are to be marketed?

Will group interests recognize the right of academic freedom in educational institutions?

Will labor, agriculture, and industry emphasize their points of agreement, in a spirit of generosity, rather than their points of difference?

Should prices be set in accord with real value and service rendered, or in line with what the traffic will bear?

Should public interest be considered in determining corporate expansion programs?

There are many more. These are merely suggestive of the type of problem that arises where human relations are involved with corporate action.

I believe that American business is basically sound; that free enterprise as opposed to statism is right. I believe that our present institutions can survive at home and be emulated abroad if the truth of the statement made by General MacArthur at the Japanese surrender ceremony is recognized and practiced by corporate business as well as by government. He said:

"Military alliance, balances of power, League of Nations all in turn failed, leaving the only path to be by way of the crucible of war. The utter destructiveness of war now blots out this alternative. We have had our last chance. If we do not now devise some greater and more equitable system Armageddon will be at our door. The problem basically is theological and involves a spiritual recrudescence and improvement of human character that will synchronize with our almost matchless advance in science, art, literature, and all material and cultural developments of the past 2,000 years. It must be of the spirit if we are to save the flesh."

The greatest opportunity for service in corporation history is presented to its executives and their public relations advisers to develop techniques whereby the material flesh of corporate business may be impregnated with the spirit of humanity. In helping to accomplish this they will become worthy keepers of the corporate conscience.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, because I placed in the RECORD under date of June 17, a newspaper article, Labor Warned, in which reference was made to the Washington legislative representative of the UAW-CIO, now under the privilege granted me, I place in the RECORD a letter from my colleague, Representative CHARLES R. SAVAGE, of the State of Washington, as printed in the Letter Box of the Detroit News under date of June 28, 1946, concerning the same officer of the UAW-CIO, Mr. Irving Richter. The letter follows:

To the EDITOR:

My attention has been called to criticisms appearing in your paper of Irving Richter, UAW-CIO legislative representative.

Before coming to Congress, I did not know Irving Richter, nor had I ever heard of him. But within a few months after my arrival here, I had occasion to write an article for Ammunition, the UAW-CIO magazine, in which I said: "The UAW, of course, has a splendid legislative representative in Washington. During my short stay here I have seen a number of cases where he has unearthed hidden dyamite in seemingly innocuous pieces of legislation, and has brought them to the attention of Members of Congress who might otherwise have been too busy to notice them."

I praised Mr. Richter because his work deserved praise. He has been outstanding in his work in Washington for labor. And as a labor representative he has also worked with those of us who have fought for the general welfare. I refer to his able fight for price control, FEPC, as well as strictly labor measures.

In fairness to Mr. Richter, whose character and reliability was attacked by your Blair Moody, I hope you will print this letter.

CHARLES R. SAVAGE.

There Are Four Diverse Interests Concerned With the Use and Value of Silver Money—Which of These Are Entitled to the Support of Congress?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 14, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, there is much confusion and lack of understanding concerning the nature and character of our money, and use of the money metals in our monetary system due to the long-sustained campaign of selfish interests here and throughout the world to discredit silver and substitute an interest-yielding managed paper currency system for the sound redeemable currency based on the use of the money metals—gold and silver. This subject is discussed in detail in an exchange of letters with the managing secretary of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, inserted here for the consideration of my colleagues:

ECONOMISTS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON MONETARY POLICY,
New York, N. Y., March 4, 1946.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WHITE: The following appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, page 1685:

"Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman appreciate the fact that if restrictions were off silver today, silver would go much higher than its monetary value in the United States and that it is now higher in many parts of the world?"

I smiled as I read that. Do you recall that at one of our luncheons in the House Restaurant I asked you why it would not be better for you silver people to let the normal open market determine the prices of silver? I said that I would not be surprised to see the price rise above the subsidy price in time. I recall asking you specifically how you knew it might not rise as I suggested it very well could.

You got your subsidy, and now I hope you have to live with it. That does not mean that I do not think the natural market price is not the proper one; quite the contrary is the case. But I do like to see you people pay for your foolishness once in a while, at least. You silverites would have been much better off had you employed me as your adviser and had you followed my advice.

Now that you and your silver-subsidy associates have fought so hard for this subsidy price and against a natural market price, why don't you arrange to send me out to your home territory to explain the part you played in the present situation? I need rest and relaxation. Part of my tiredness is due to the necessity of having to be on the watch constantly for machinations on the part of you antinatural market price silverites. You really owe me a rest and should in some way pay for failure to take my advice. Furthermore, I would guarantee to do a swell job in explaining to your constituents just how you fought for the present silver-subsidy price. I should enjoy doing that.

I have been hoarding as a special treasure the 3-ounce silver bar that you kindly gave me; and, while one should not look a gift horse in the mouth, I do realize that in the face of the Treasury subsidy price for which you fought the bar is not worth as much as it would have been had you permitted the market price to prevail.

All this should provide a good lesson to you people. But it won't. I know what you will try to do next. In fact, I notice that you already are trying it—trying to get a subsidy above the market price so that you can skin the poor taxpayer out of some more of his hard-earned cash.

With warmest regards and all good wishes (except on this silver-subsidy business).

Sincerely,

WALTER E. SPAHR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON COINAGE,
WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1946.

MR. WALTER E. SPAHR,
Secretary-Treasurer, Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. SPAHR: In answering your letter, I regret the circumstances which have occasioned the delay. As you know, our efforts to obtain a sound money system may be compared to the efforts of the ministers of the various religious denominations; we are all endeavoring to get to the same place but are following devious routes to get there. The reminder in your letter was much appreciated and the delay in answering is not due to lack of interest or appreciation but rather a lack of opportunity to do justice to a communication from an esteemed correspondent.

As a basis for understanding a very much misunderstood subject; i. e., money and the use of the money metals as a medium of exchange, let us accept the old truism: Use creates demand, and demand creates value, a fact that seems to have been understood by the founders of this Government when they adopted our monetary unit and established our monetary system in 1792 shortly after the Constitution was adopted. One of the first acts of Congress established a mint and made 416 grains of silver and 27 grains of gold a dollar. The dollar was made legal tender by law for all debts and due, both public and private.

By this act both gold and silver became money wherever these metals existed. All the owner or finder of either of these metals had to do was to get possession or take it out of the ground and bring it to the mint for refining and coining into money. The owner could then spend it or keep it as he pleased. By this law the Government made gold and silver everywhere money, including the undiscovered gold in the gravels of California. The silver in the veins in mines everywhere was money with the purchasing power of money. If a meteor composed of gold or partly of gold was cast off the sun and could be recovered on the earth the gold in that meteor was money in the hands of the finder. The stamp of the mint simply placed the guaranty of fineness and quantity on that certain amount of gold which already had purchasing power on earth before it left the sun, if man could only get his hands on it.

In establishing our first monetary system, the founders of this Government were wise in providing the American people with the kind of money that increased automatically to stabilize prices and insure the integrity of business commitments. This result was achieved by adopting the simple plan of monetizing both gold and silver at a definite ratio. The production of both these metals by the miners put into circulation a volume of money which met the requirements of economic law and thereby created a monetary system which operated to maintain stable prices by supplying a volume of money which increased evenly with the growth of population and commerce.

In considering the financial history of this country with the record of booms and depressions, a record with which I am sure you are familiar, we find that it has been conclusively demonstrated that gold alone cannot be made to supply the necessary volume of money that will keep pace with the growth of population and commerce. Now with silver discarded, it has become necessary to lock up gold and resort to the expedient of a managed currency system which is just the opposite of the old tried and proven bimetallic money system.

A managed currency system, operated under some perfect system of management, might supply the Nation's money needs if the profit motive of those in control could be eliminated and human influences could be overcome. Our experience with a managed currency system has been unfortunate. The banking structure created to manage and control this monetary function has been compared to a pump which has lost its prime and thereby failed to supply money and credit when most needed, a failure that had disastrous effects on business and industry in this country. This failure of the banks to function forced the Government to come to the rescue of business by creating a new agency that put the Government in the financing business in a big way with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This money shortage also made it necessary for the administration to supplement the RFC financing program with relief appropriations that piled up a national debt of over $62,000,000,000 before the Government undertook to finance a global war.

These relief appropriations were a continuation of the Government's efforts to prime the so-called financial pump, i. e., the Federal Reserve Banking System, a banking system on which the Nation had to depend to supply the money function under a managed currency system.

What the silver advocates have been trying to do all along is to increase the volume of primary money by inducing the Government to restore one of the money metals, silver, to monetary use; silver, which is one of the two money metals which was established in our monetary system by the founders of this Government, primary money that was erroneously discarded due to the influence of selfish interests for private profit.

Neither gold nor silver were ever priced on a commodity basis by the Government for use as money until the Bland silver free coinage bill was amended in the Senate by Senator Allison and came out as the Bland-Allison Act in 1879. This law authorized the Treasury to buy silver at $1 per ounce. The act was subsequently changed by the passage of the Sherman Silver Purchasing Act of 1890, which authorized the purchase of an increased amount of silver at the same price. This act was repealed in 1893.

Without going into a historic review of the effects of the national monetary policy or a description of national bank currency or the Federal Reserve banking system, recent financial experience in this country has demonstrated the insecurity and danger of a managed currency system. The Federal Reserve System for creating and issuing money has very aptly been compared to the mechanism of a financial pump. It appears the influences responsible for the recent financial depression caused this pump to lose its money prime and thereby created a national money and credit deficiency with disastrous results to business and industry, a money shortage that the minds of the best legislators, assisted by the minds of the best economists, have cooperated in a valiant but unsuccessful attempt to retrieve.

This effort was directed to putting enough Government money in circulation to restore the Federal Reserve banking mechanism to its money-creating and supplying function, an effort that has made tremendous drafts on the national credit by way of Government appropriations. This deficiency in the money and credit supply was only relieved by the financing expedients adopted as a result of this Nation becoming involved in a global war, and now the country's financial cup runneth over.

In considering our efforts to restore the use of silver as money you mistake our motives. What we seek and what the world must have, if this Nation is to maintain a stable economy, is a sufficient supply of money of ultimate redemption, money having a recognized value and which is interchangeable internationally; the kind of money that will be automatically supplied into the channels of trade and business by the production of the precious metals from the mines.

Gold alone would be sufficient for the world's money needs if gold could be had in quantities which would provide the money function. Since gold alone has been definitely proven insufficient it is apparent that if we are ever to have a stable monetary system, we must go back and add silver on the same basis and in the same way gold and silver were used in our monetary system up to the time silver was demonetized and discarded at the instance of certain financial interests for their personal gain.

In considering the financial developments responsible for the recent depression, did it ever occur to you how much of the loss of business and property value in this country could have been prevented if President Hoover and his administration had stepped in and stabilized the purchasing power of our oriental customers by supporting the price of silver, when the British was depressing its value in their maneuver to recapture English foreign trade and English international banking control.

Naturally you won't agree to this fact, demonstrated in recent financial history, because you have a point to make in support of your precious but unworkable managed currency system. However, any student of financial history of recent years will not have far to look to find the factors which caused the depression and the resulting financial loss to the American people, and the reason for your difficulty in attempting to prime the financial pump which is one way of describing the Federal Reserve System, the sacred cow of banking with the difference that cows are supposed to give milk and in that day the Federal Reserve could not be managed so as to give milk to its owners much less supply the financial liquid that floated the business of this country; hence the necessity for creating the RFC.

Contrary to your estimation, our efforts to increase the price of silver are a part of the plan that is being followed to restore silver to its original place in our monetary system and is only a step toward what must inevitably come—remonetization of the metal here and throughout the world.

My chief interest in silver goes to the benefit the American people will derive from the establishment of a sound, adequate, workable money system based on the use of both the money metals gold and silver, rather than to the small profit to be derived by a little group of silver-mine operators and their employed personnel.

There appears to be four separate interests concerned with the use of silver money. First, the one with which you are concerned. These are the least important in the remonetization issue, the silver producers. Their profits weigh so lightly as to be negligible in the scale of the real benefits that will accrue to the American people. Second, the group I oppose. The bankers with their money creating privileges and their financial control of business, a control that will be strengthened by keeping interest-free silver money out of circulation and out of competition with their interest-yielding managed-paper currency. Third, the manufacturers, jewelers, and fabricators that buy silver bullion to manufacture and sell for a profit. This class is interested in cheap silver bullion and high prices for their manufactured silver products. Fourth, the most important of all, the group that you and I should patriotically get squarely behind—the great American public, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by the restoration of the use of silver as money by the remonetization of the metal so that silver may come to the assistance of gold as money of ultimate redemption and international value.

Financial history presents the record of a plan that worked successfully to provide the group of nations comprising the Latin Union with a sound and stable money system for use in both domestic and international exchange when the coinage of the contracting nations, France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland united to standardize their gold and silver coin as to weight, size, fineness and value, and made their coinage interchangeable internationally. Why must we risk our financial security by further experimenting with complicated credit paper schemes such as Bretton Woods when a sure and simple way is already provided by the law enacted in our Federal Statutes in Section 311 of the United States Revised Code, which provides:

"Section 311. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts (Nov. 1, 1893, ch. 8, 28 Stat. 4)."

Whether you agree or not, the profits to be gained by the silver producers by the remonetization of silver will be small in comparison with the profits that will accrue to the American people and the whole world by restoring silver as money in the plan to establish a stable, adequate, workable money system by the use of gold and silver as money. This plan, it appears from our monetary experience, is the only one we can adopt to maintain stable prices and permanent prosperity.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

The Plain Duty of the Republican Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the following remarks of Hon. William S. Bennet at the John Hay Republican Club April 11, 1946, entitled "The Plain Duty of the Republican Party":

In June 1945 I had the pleasure of addressing this club, which some time ago honored me by electing me an honorary member, and which is located in the assembly district of which my old and good friend, Peter W. Wynne, is the leader. On that occasion I spoke, as I wished to do, on national issues. Tonight I am speaking on the plain duty of the Republican Party. I shall endeavor, so far as possible, to avoid repeating anything I said last year, but some repetition will be unavoidable.

The Republican Party has never been without a program. The Republican Party is the older of the two major parties. Its name in connection with a party dates from May 13, 1892 when Thomas Jefferson wrote his well-known letter to President Washington describing himself and his associates as "Republican-Federalists," a term which he shortened in his first inaugural to "Republican." During his entire lifetime he so described himself and on one occasion when the followers of Alexander Hamilton attempted to force him to describe himself as a Democrat he successfully resisted their effort. The name, of course, appealed to Jefferson because our form of government is republican and so was that of France, towards which country he was at all times friendly.

There was rivalry between John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson in 1824 when four candidates, Jackson, Adams, Clay, and Crawford, all holding office as Republicans, all ran for the Presidency. None received a majority and the election devolved, in accordance with the Constitution, upon the House of Representatives, which chose Adams. In the election of 1828 Adams described himself as a National Republican and Jackson was described by one part of his following as a Republican and by another, including Tammany Hall and certain voters in New York, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina, as a Democrat. In the Presidential elections from 1840 to 1852 the National Republicans took the name Whigs, reorganizing the party in 1856 under its own name of Republican and continuing under that name ever since.

Democrats commonly ignore the long and useful Republican history prior to 1832. However, the Democrats in the only published statement I have ever seen, the brief history of their party, written by Frank R. Kent and appearing in the Encyclopedia Britannica, simply say:

"Its original name was the Republican Party and the day of its birth has been fixed as May 13, 1792."

Also footnote to list of Presidents after "Democrats" popularly called "Republicans" up to the time of Andrew Jackson.

Of course, this is not in accordance with the facts, but there is nothing that anyone can do about it. Besides it was a long time ago and while the record of the Republican Party has always been highly creditable and one of which they can be proud, what the people are interested in now, naturally, is what the Republicans say they will do and what the people believe they can do and will do in the future. In this connection, however, the fact of their long and highly successful record as a party is an element to be considered in the party's favor.

A party program divides itself into two parts: foreign policy and domestic affairs; and foreign policies, which I shall consider first, also falls into two subdivisions: (1) long-range, permanent policies; (2) particular policies in relation to different countries and different situations. It is always amazing to me that Americans generally do not recognize how successful American diplomacy has usually been; how superior it is to European diplomacy, and the reasons. I shall discuss the reasons first. American diplomacy has the better foundations. Our country was to a large degree settled by people who came here seeking greater freedom of religion. The Pilgrims and the Puritans in New England, the Quakers in Pennsylvania and the Catholics in Maryland and the French Huguenots, all came to this country because of religious persecutions which they had undergone in Europe at different times and places. A citizenry of men and women seeking religious freedom, even though from different viewpoints, is a good foundation on which to build any country. It should be noted that the tradition of complete religious freedom was introduced into this country by the Catholics in Maryland, although the Quakers established it later in Pennsylvania, but the same tradition did not prevail in New England in the early days and neither did it wholly in New York, where the Quakers, at least, were subject to persecution. New York had its religious basis in the Dutch and in the Huguenots who first came to New York by way of Holland.

It became necessary at a very early date for various of the northern colonies to send diplomatic representatives whose official title was "agent" to England for the reason that the London merchants—then as still, bold, courageous, enterprising, and aggressive—thought it in accordance with seventeenth century business principles to stifle everything in any of the colonies which interfered in any way with the success of any enterprise fostered by a London merchant and to encourage only those things in the colonies which would result in advantage to London merchants. This is not an idle statement. In a book published in London by Mr. Joshua Gee in 1729 and reprinted in 1767 he warned in the 1767 edition that the recourse of the colonists to their own products which they manufactured, was a thing of great consequence to Great Britain and should be guarded against, and in a book which I hold in my hand, printed in London in the year 1687 and which in accordance with English law had to be submitted to Government authorities before it could be printed, I read the following:

"The vast returns which the merchants of London and other parts of His Majesty's dominions made from those ports are a sufficient encouragement for any that would study the improvement of his fortunes to look into the advantages of that extensive traffic which those regions produce."

Consequently, the colonies to get all the rights that they could for their enterprises, both agricultural and otherwise, were obliged to send accredited agents to present their views before the British Parliament.

Benjamin Franklin was one of the agents sent by the State of Pennsylvania on a mission of this character, in which service he was trained for the highly successful work that he later did as the first representative of the Continental Congress at the Court of the King of France. It should be noted that it was highly beneficial that our first diplomatic service did not require those agents to plot, connive or scheme against any other country; to interest themselves to the disadvantage of any country or to consider any question relative to military power. European diplomacy, which was much older in Europe as a profession, had no such creditable foundation. The nations of Europe were almost constantly engaged in bitter wars. They had a bad record as to keeping treaties, and the promises even of the most prominent men were frequently broken, and what were apparently the most sacred friendships and alliances constantly subjected to betrayal and deceit. Many of the instances of ill-feeling between European nations which are still reflected in present-day acts antedated by centuries the settlement of America.

It was the knowledge of these facts that led George Washington to say in his farewell address:

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connections as possible.

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or enmities."

As to success, the record of American diplomacy is so superior to that of European diplomacy that no real comparison exists. What has European diplomacy to boast of? The record speaks for itself and is not necessary to repeat. On the other hand, our record is highly creditable. Franklin at the French court was notably successful. When the South American countries revolted against Spain in 1821 and set up separate governments, mainly republics, our country, although Spain at that time was a strong nation, promptly recognized all of these governments and President Monroe promulgated the Monroe Doctrine, which is in substance that no European country can enforce any claim or right against any country in the Western Hemisphere by acquiring sovereignty over any portion of its soil. When France attempted to take over Mexico through Emperor Maximilian, our country, acting under the Monroe Doctrine, brought about the Emperor's downfall. When England, during the administration of Grover Cleveland, threatened to take over a portion of the territory of Venezuela in a dispute over indebtedness, President Cleveland invoked the Monroe Doctrine and told England that any attempt against Venezuela in opposition to the Monroe Doctrine would be regarded as an unfriendly act, and England dropped the effort.

In our relations with Canada the joint agreement between that country and ourselves is such that on the 3,000-mile-long boundary between the two countries there is not a single fort, and on the Great Lakes, forming a large portion of the boundary, there are only one or two treaty ships necessary to the maintenance of law and order. The situation between ourselves and Mexico is almost equally good, although we have had to erect some defenses against Indian raids from the south.

We also have the Pan American Union, organized in 1889 by Secretary James G. Blaine and housed in a building in Washington, to the erection of which an American citizen, Andrew Carnegie, contributed $850,000, the remaining $250,000 being contributed by the members of the Pan American Union, including ourselves. This organization, originally named the International Bureau of American Republics, was, upon the initiative of Elihu Root, then Secretary of State, reorganized in 1907 by action of the Third Pan American Conference held in Rio de Janiero in 1906. At the fourth conference held at Buenos Aires in 1910 its name was changed to the present name, Pan American Union, the functions of which were considerably enlarged at the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth conferences held, respectively, in Chile in 1923, Cuba in 1928, Uruguay in 1933, and Peru in 1938. Secretary Root attended the fourth conference at Rio de Janiero and in connection with it visited all the principal countries of South America. President Hoover, between the time of his election in 1928 and his inauguration, visited th principal South American countries. Secretary Frank B. Kellogg, by patient, persistent, homespun work, brought about the settlement of the ugly Tacna-Arica dispute which threatened the peace of South America. President Roosevelt, Secretary Hull, and Under Secretary Welles built on this strong foundation. It is questionable whether describing this long-time proper policy, which they continued, as the good-neighbor policy was really helpful. For obvious reasons, it had more of an appeal in the United States than in South America. However, our long-standing policy and the efforts of the Roosevelt administration did prevent any of the South American Republics from espousing the cause of the Nazis.

In China we have the John Hay open-door policy and the return of the Boxer indemnities to our credit and, most outstanding of all, the firm stand of President Hoover and Secretary Stimson in 1931 against the recognition of the acquisition of Japanese sovereignty over Manchuria. Had England and France acceded to Secretary Stimson's request to join our country in this policy of opposing Japanese acquisition of Manchuria, World War II might not have occurred. It is, of course, too well known to discuss that in Europe the acts and omissions of both England and France in relation to Hitler's early aggressions and at a time when they could have eliminated him, permitted World War II to become possible.

An analysis of the policy built up by the strong men who, from time to time, have been Presidents of the United States and Secretaries of State, discloses that the uniform, long-range foreign policy of the United States has always been a sincere and consistent one. First, the protection of the lives and property of American citizens traveling or located abroad; second, to put it simply, the Golden Rule to all nations, that is, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you," with the addition that we expect others as well as ourselves to live up to the same rule and when they do not we voice a protest or take such other measures as we deem best. This is all the policy that a country of our size and resources needs.

The only outstanding speech that has been made in the American Congress in recent years in relation to our foreign policy, or at least the only one that struck an almost unanimously responsive chord, was that of Senator VANDENBERG in the Senate on January 10, 1945, and a careful reading of that speech will show that it is based almost entirely upon the two principles which I have stated. In fact, it would be almost impossible for our Nation to adopt any other rules and remain true to its traditions. Under the first rule we fought the Barbary pirates in our early days, something for which I found on a recent visit to London our country is still respected, and under the same rule President Theodore Roosevelt cabled the ruler of a Mediterranean state: "Perdicaris alive or Rasul dead." Perdicaris was a naturalized American citizen of Greek birth and Rasul was a bandit who was holding him for ransom. Needless to say, Perdicaris was promptly delivered to an American consul safe and sound So far as has come to my personal notice the Franklin Roosevelt administration endeavored to live up to this rule, that is, they endeavored to protect the lives and property of American citizens everywhere and in very dangerous times and situations. I read with regret in the newspapers the other day a statement of a well-known and widely read columnist to the effect that under the present administration an American woman born in Cincinnati is being permitted to be held in slavery somewhere in Russia. I hope that this statement will be promptly investigated and if the American citizen is so being held that steps will be taken for her release.

As to short-range and current policies, no Secretary of State should be asked to state from day to day what the policy of the United States is as to such matters outside of the general principles to which I have already referred. In a matter like the Palestine situation, for example, President Truman has made a very proper request for the immediate admission of 100,000 displaced persons from camps in Europe to Palestine to the extent that such persons wish to go to Palestine.

A joint committee of Englishmen and Americans is investigating the situation. To some extent, of course, our State Department and the British Foreign Office are being consulted, and in all probability the foreign offices of other countries. If Secretary Byrnes should start in to make public everything these foreign governments say to him they would stop saying anything and thus make it difficult to work out a proper solution to one of the most important problems now under consideration. Of course, all of us would naturally like to know everything that is going on, but even more than that, what we want is favorable results, and if in the opinion of our Secretary of State pending matters ought not to be divulged or discussed we have to abide by his judgment and hope for the best. Back-seat driving by 140,000,000 people in connection with foreign affairs would probably not be very helpful.

The fact that from one Presidential election until the next we are so largely dependent on the appointees of the President most recently elected ought to make us extremely careful who we elect as both President and Vice President. The same thing is true, of course, as to congressional elections, differing only in degree and in diffusion of authority.

Now, as to domestic policies and the immediate task of the Republican Party. There has been so little discussion in recent years as to the form of our government and what it should do and the regard which we ought to pay to the United States of America that it is necessary before discussing specific things to devote a little time to the extent to which government is helpful, the basis of our form of government, and what are issues.

Our Government is, of course, a democracy because any form of government in which the people govern themselves is a democracy, but specifically, it is a republic in that the people govern themselves through representatives elected to the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The judicial branch, appointed by the Executive and confirmed by one branch of the legislative, is maintained for two purposes: (1) to protect the people against unconstitutional acts of the legislative and executive departments, and (2) to afford a forum of the trial of such actions and proceedings as to which jurisdiction is conferred on the courts by the Congress. There are, in addition, a few matters in which the Constitution itself confers original jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. Thomas Jefferson, in his first inaugural, after our Government had been in operation 12 years, said that our republican form of government was the strongest on earth, and time has demonstrated that he was correct. There is no stronger Government on earth today than ours. Government to be strong must exercise limited authority, because in any democracy the more that there is left for the people to do for themselves the better they will be governed, and, as to local matters, the more that is left to local authority the better the government. We have had a long fight in New York for home rule for cities and have gained a very large degree of home rule, possibly all that cities, as creations of the State, are entitled to.

As to matters which the State can best handle, those matters should be left to the State. We are having an illustration now of the wisdom of this idea in the tremendous degree of progress which our State, through the foresight, ability, and courage of Governor Dewey and of the Republican legislatures, has made possible. In all probability in connection with every postwar problem, including housing, our State is further advanced than any other 1 of the 48 States, and none of this advance would have been possible if it had been left to be done by the Federal Government, which necessarily would have had to act to meet the varying needs of 48 widely different States.

As to the Federal Government and the powers which it should exercise, Montesquieu, the great French student, said 200 years ago "that country is the best government which is the least governed." This view was also that of Thomas Jefferson and is stated in his first inaugural as follows:

"A wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government."

A government which attempts to go much further gets into trouble from the mere size of the task. Jefferson also said in substance in connection with agriculture that if the farmers waited for advice from Washington as to when to sow and when to reap there would be no crops. Some very excellent advice does come to farmers, but other advice, such as to killing their little pigs, to grow certain crops and not to grow other crops has almost invariably been disastrous to the farmers. One of the basic reasons why there is so much criticism of OPA is that it is utterly impossible for OPA to handle wisely all that it is attempting to do in the matter of price control. In addition, we have learned in 300 years of experience on this continent that power has an unvarying tendency to attempt to increase itself, a tendency which has had to be fought against during the entire existence of our Republic.

As government should be administered within as narrow limits as possible and with as little interference as may be with the ordinary everyday life and business of the citizen, it follows that there are very few real national issues. Lincoln, as a candidate for the Illinois Legislature at the age of 23, stated his national political platform. He advocated a national bank, internal improvement, and a high protective tariff. It will be noted that all of these were truly national questions, none of which could be handled by a State. Parties ought to stick to national issues.

For example, we are asked at times what is a correct national labor policy. There is no national labor policy and there ought not to be any national labor policy. Ours is not a class country and there are a thousand different questions in which industry, employers, and employees are interested which can be properly settled only by the industry or the employers and the employees concerned. We have recently had illustration of the danger of Government attempting to settle such matters. The OPA fixes the manufacturer's sales price; Secretary Wallace, with no basis whatever for his figures, states an amount that a particular industry, and in fact industry generally, could increase wages without increasing prices. The President's price-fixing board, assuming these figures to be correct, based a finding on them. Neither the employers nor the employees had any way of checking the figures as to the future. But Secretary Wallace's statement held up the settlement of strikes in two important industries for weeks, and in one instance months. It eliminated, as far as wages were concerned, collective bargaining in those industries because with the manufacturer's price fixed by the OPA and the amount that the manufacturer could increase wages asserted by the President's fact-finding board and accepted by the employees as correct, there was nothing left to bargain about except conditions of employment. Now that those two major strikes have been settled, Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach states what is correct and which everybody knew, that after these industries have had a year's experience under the new wages they will know what wages really ought to be.

This brings me to the matters on which the Republican Party ought to affirm an immediate stand:

1. In our national platform of 1944 we stated 14 propositions as to which we would enact legislation if we were put in power. From 1860 to 1932 our party, when in power, put on the statute books legislation in connection with every platform promise we made except one. That one was antilynching legislation which was and still is blocked by a combination of Democratic Senators in the Senate. In 1896 we promised immigration restrictions, meaning as everyone knew, the enactment of the then pending literacy test. In my judgment this was a foolish promise but we kept it as far as we were able. We went right from the convention to the Congress, which was Republican in both branches, and passed the legislation, but Grover Cleveland, the Democratic President, on the last day of his term, vetoed it in a message so strong and convincing that it was later followed by both Presidents Taft and Wilson. However, we had kept our platform pledge. In 1917, 21 years later, Congress passed the literacy test over the second veto of President Wilson and in practice it proved worthless.

2. We should take a strong and uncompromising position in upholding the United Nations as a permanent body. There are two dangerous schools of thought in the world to one or both of which many Republicans incline. The first is a trend against nationalism. No good American ought to have any sympathy whatever with this trend. Ever since the Renaissance nationalism has been the creative force in history. It has been associated with every struggle anywhere for liberalism; the lever of attack against political autocracy and ecclesiastical reaction; the weapon of small peoples against oppressors. In our own country, our Thirteen Independent Colonies found progress difficult until they had formed themselves into an indestructible union.

There are many specific illustrations of the beneficial adherence of various nations to nationalism. Switzerland, now in her six hundred and fifty-fifth year as a nation; Norway, which not so long ago broke away from Sweden in the belief it was entitled to a national existence as Norway; Sweden itself; the countries of South and Central America, no one of which is inclined to give up its national existence and all of which in South America have made material progress since their separation from Spain, and both Mexico and Central America are on a higher level than they would have been had they not each made attempts toward progress within nationalistic lines; and England, which during the awful horrors of the recent war sang defiantly "There will always be an England." I feel no shame in saying that I hope there will always be a United States; that we will always sing the Star-Spangled Banner and that our children will continue to be taught in the public schools the American pledge:

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the Republic for which it stands, one Nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Yet there are those who want us to abandon all this and become simply a member of a world organization. The Republican Party should take a firm and emphatic stand against this.

Another branch of the same thought is that the United Nations should be turned into a congress of world nations. The leader of this thought is none other than the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom, Ernest Bevin. The idea of a government embracing within its jurisdiction the entire world is simply ridiculous. A moment's thought will indicate that the government of such a world body would have to be a dictatorship. It wou'd be impossible to elect a legislative branch. Our House of Representatives, with 435 Members representing a much more homogeneous constituency than a world congress possibly could, is unwieldy. If that is true, and we know it is, what would the congress of a world nation be? Walter Lippmann in opposing this idea touched on another objection, the variance in education and wealth throughout the world. He said:

"He (Stalin) was comparing the two systems in eastern Europe and in Asia, where there live under primitive governments in a state of dire poverty with massive illiteracy and superstitution, about two-thirds of the human race."

There is not an atom of bigotry or intolerance in my personal make-up but when returning soldiers and sailors tell me of kindly people in isolated islands in the Pacific whose necessary clothing consists of a G string, who have no religion but superstition, no written language, no currency, no commerce except barter of foodstuffs with neighboring islands, I am, with no feeling in connection with them except kindness, dead set against putting my American-born and educated grandchildren on a voting equality with them.

As a matter of fact, the United Nations, which is the product of the wisdom of 51 nations which met at San Francisco, represents just about the basis on which those nations can cooperate to maintain peace, and the maintenance of peace is the great goal. It is infinitely superior to the League of Nations, which was a failure, and its framers frankly admit that they have drawn lessons not only from the good points of the League, but from its mistakes and failures. The nations which have the veto power ought to have it. An organization such as the United Nations consisting of small as well as large nations ought not to be at the mercy, on a question which involves world peace, of even two-thirds in number of its members. On the other hand, and properly, no nation has a veto on matters of procedure. The value of this has just been demonstrated in the Security Council. Amendment of the Charter is difficult and properly so. A generation from now it is quite probable that there will be amendments, and, by then, by unanimous consent and based on experience. As the United Nations is workable, there ought not to be any move for speedy amendment, and above all things, there ought not to be any move to make the organization a part of a world government. On this the Republican Party should be speedily and specifically emphatic.

3. We should maintain the American standard of living so far as possible. The protective tariff, one of the most important means of sustaining our standard of living, is an American rather than a Republican policy. It is the result of the experience of the independent colonies from 1775 until the meeting of the first Congress in New York City in 1789. In the latter days of the Revolutionary War every American leader except Alexander Hamilton was a free trader. But experience taught the Northern States that a protective tariff was essential to American prosperity. When the first Congress met on April 6, 1789, every Northern State except New Jersey had a tariff act, several of which were protective. Only New Jersey was a free-trade State and there free trade was not a success.

The Southern States were rather indifferent about the matter but they went along with the Northern States in the first Congress because they recognized that the Northern States had joined in a Constitution which deprived them of the rights, which they had been exercising, of levying tariffs and then they had joined in ratifying the Constitution. So, said the Southern States, the Northern States, which are chiefly interested, having given up rights which they consider valuable in order to form the Union, they ought to have largely their own way in relation to the tariff. Therefore, the second act passed by the First Congress was a protective tariff act, based largely on that of Pennsylvania. It started on the basis of a 5-percent revenue act introduced by James Madison, but when Mr. Fitzsimmons, a Representative from Philadelphia, offered the substitute modeled on the Pennsylvania act, it went through unanimously. Years later the Supreme Court of the United States held in a unanimous opinion (United States v. J. W. Hampton & Co. (276 U. S. 374, pp. 411, 412)) that this act of July 4, 1789, was a protective tariff act because of its preamble, which reads as follows:

"SECTION 1. Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Be it enacted, etc."

Although some of the Members of both Senate and House were free traders, there was no objection to this language. It was adopted without a roll call or even a discussion.

Daniel Webster, who came to Congress as a federalist free-trader Member of the House of Representatives from New Hampshire in 1815, never ceased to be a theoretical free trader but assisted as a Senator from Massachusetts in putting through the protective Tariff Act of 1828, stating correctly that the United States had become a protective-tariff country and that it was then impossible to conduct it on any other basis. That Mr. Webster was correct is shown by the fact that the Democrats when successful in a straight-out free trade versus a protective tariff contest in the Presidential election in 1892 failed to pass a free-trade act; they were again successful in 1912 and again failed to pass a free-trade act, and, most recently, successful in 1932 and have not repealed the Republican Tariff Act of 1930, but have contented themselves with nibbling at it through the agency of reciprocal trade acts.

No party in power will dare to attempt to put this country on anything approaching a free-trade basis. There are over 50 industries listed by labor organizations as dependent in whole or in part on tariff protection, and this in addition to agriculture which has always shown itself awake to the benefit of tariff situations. Until recently this was not so as to raw cotton, but that product now has an embargo and in addition a subsidy of 4 cents a pound on foreign sales, so agriculture can be listed as practically unanimous for a protective tariff. This being so, if there is any revision of the tariff in the near future it ought to be by the Republican Party after 1948, when the Republican Party will probably be back in power. While the Republican tariffs have differed in the degree of their success with the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, possibly the best that a Republican Congress has ever passed, their tariff acts have been better than either the Walker tariff of 1946, it successor, the tariff of 1857, the Wilson tariff of 1893, or the Underwood tariff of 1913.

In fact, the Democrats, by failing to repeal the present Republican tariff, have practically confessed their inability to handle the tariff question successfully. They are bewildered about it. They are pinning all their hopes for American prosperity on an increase of foreign trade with no evidence whatever on which to base their assertions. A year ago Assistant Secretary Clayton, of the State Department, told the Senate Finance Committee that his goal was to increase exports to $10,000,000,000 a year from the then estimated figure for 1945 of three billion. Of course, it didn't happen. He and all the administration also urged and got congressional authority to reduce nearly a year ago, existing tariffs 50 percent from the January 1, 1945, figure, asserting this as necessary to the progress of international trade. Up to date not one single tariff has been reduced, and there seem to be no specific plans underway for any such reduction. A party which makes such wild assertions on matters of the gravest importance cannot be trusted with America's progress.

We ought also to handle the currency situation. All that is necessary there is to repeal President Roosevelt's act which took our country off the gold standard so far as transactions in the United States are concerned. Few realize why the American dollar is the strongest currency in the world. There are two reasons: First, it is maintained by production, and the currency of no country can be strong unless it is maintained by production. Second, internationally, we are still on the gold standard. Foreign trade balances, when they are against us are paid in gold which the banks obtain from Government sources for that purpose. The result has been that because of large lend-lease purchases in other countries the amount of gold in the United States diminished about $2,000,000,000 during the war, but these gold payments maintained the integrity of the American dollar. Recently, with exports reviving, gold has commenced to come back to this country. The reason why we should repeal Mr. Roosevelt's act is that it will strengthen the dollar. That will be a hedge against inflation, because no nation which retained confidence in its currency ever had a runaway inflation crisis.

As to progressive and social welfare legislation, the position of the Republican Party has been and is outstanding. I have already referred to the 14 affirmative positions taken in the 1944 platform which ought to be backed by Republicans in the Senate and the House. I have also had a challenge outstanding for some years that no one can point out any progressive or social welfare act put on the national or State statute books since 1860 which has not either originated with Republicans or been supported by them. Up till now I have limited this statement to the period ending in 1933. Tonight I enlarge it to the present day. No really progressive or social welfare legislation has passed the Congress in the last 12 years which did not have Republican support and the essential piece of legislation necessary to enable us to win the war, the Selective Service Act, was sponsored in the House of Representatives by a Republican from New York State, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, at a time when such legislation was highly unpopular. There isn't any real reason why progressive and social welfare legislation should ever have a party label. In the Constitutional Convention of 1938, which had a Republican majority, many forward-looking amendments were made to the Constitution, none of them labeled as either Republican or Democrat, and as to none of which there was, on a vote, a division on party lines. This is as it should be. I have never seen any reason why the Democrats shouldn't accept the position of the Republicans on the tariff and currency questions. After all, they are American positions before they are Republican positions, and I would rejoice to see the day when the Democrats would concede this and remove these economic questions from party division. We had an era in this country from 1804 until 1825 when we had practically no party division and it is referred to in history as the era of good feeling. During all that time the party in power was the Republican Party, and as an American, although even such a situation would bring problems, I would be perfectly willing to have the Democrats join us and make unanimously American our position on the tariff and currency, which are about the only existing strictly party divisions.

War Fliers Deserve Square Deal by United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, a large number of young men who fought the war in the air which made our victory over Germany and Japan possible, have now engaged in the legal business of transporting passengers and freight by air on a contractual basis.

The transportation service which they are rendering is an important asset to our national postwar economy. In the operation of this legal peacetime business they have purchased approximately 5,500 planes, and employ 6,587 pilots, 10,000 ground crewmen and 2,845 miscellaneous personnel. Approximately 100 percent of the personnel and management of these fixed-base air carriers are veterans of the United States armed forces, and were actively engaged in World War II. Their investment in the planes and other facilities of this large peacetime operation aggregates more than $100,000,000. This force of men, if permitted to operate and retain their skills, will constitute an important trained military reserve air force essential to the national defense.

Recently the Civil Aeronautics Board has had under consideration a proposed regulation which would, in effect, bar the encouragement of this new industry and react to the detriment of the large number of aviators of World War II who have invested their life savings in it.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked permission to append to this statement the text of the recommendations of the legislative committee of the Institute of Air Transportation, 49 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City, which represents the Air Cargo Association of California, New England Air Carriers, Mid-Western Air Carriers, Contract Carriers Association of Florida, and the East Coast Fixed-Base Air Carriers, as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE AS SUBMITTED BY INSTITUTE OF AIR TRANSPORTATION INCORPORATING AIR CARGO ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA, NEW ENGLAND AIR CARRIERS, MID-WESTERN AIR CARRIERS, CONTRACT CARRIERS ASSOCIATION OF FLORIDA, EAST COAST FIXED-BASE AIR CARRIERS, RELATIVE TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3 OF SECTION 292.1

Predicated upon the duty of the Civil Aeronautics Board to "encourage and foster the development of Civil Aeronautics in the United States and abroad," as set forth in the Civil Aeronautics Act and predicated upon the policy of the United States Government to oppose monopoly, the following resolutions and proposed regulations will be submitted to the Civil Aeronautics Board, all governmental agencies having jurisdiction, the Congress of the United States, and to the President:

"Whereas there now exists a large body of efficient fixed-base air carriers engaged in the business of transporting persons and/or cargo under Regulation No. 400-1 as amended December 7, 1938, relating to nonscheduled operations; and

"Whereas these fixed-base air carriers in the aggregate operate approximately 529 transport planes consisting of DC-3's, DC-4's, Curtiss Commandos, and Lodestars sold to them by the United States Government at a cost of millions of dollars; and in addition 2,000 miscellaneous smaller type planes as well as 3,000 single-engine planes; and

"Whereas the said fixed-base air carriers employ a total manpower force of approximately 6,587 pilots, 10,000 ground crewmen, and 2,845 miscellaneous personnel; and

"Whereas approximately 100 percent of the said personnel and management of the fixed-base air carriers are veterans of the United States Army Air Forces and the United States Navy Bureau of Aeronautics, all having actively engaged in World War II; and

"Whereas this force of men, if permitted to operate and retain their skills, constitute an important trained military reserve Air Force essential to the military security of the United States; and

"Whereas this force of men, as a military unit, represent an investment by the United States Government of a sum in excess of $100,000,000 training costs of personnel; and

"Whereas the United States Government originally invested in excess of $375,000,000 in the planes and equipment operated by this force of men and the same constitutes a military reserve of such planes and equipment; and

"Whereas these fixed-base air carriers having pioneered the fields of non-scheduled operations, contact operations and cargo operations on a large scale and by reason thereof are entitled to common law rights to so operate; and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers constitute an entirely new industry and vehicle for the advancement of aviation operating between areas rather than between cities, and specializing in the experimentation and development of new fields rather than the encroachment on older avenues of business; and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers reserve at all times the right to reject transportation of persons and/or property which do not conform to particular contractual policy; and

"Whereas the seventeen scheduled air lines are now attempting to monopolize the entire aviation field servicing the requirements not only of the 140,000,000 peoples within the United States but all the billions of peoples outside of the United States, not only in the fields of scheduled operations but also in the field of nonscheduled operations; and

"Whereas the certificates of convenience and necessity when originally issued to the scheduled air lines did not contemplate the transportation of air freight as such, and in that respect the scheduled air lines were not certificated as to air freight; and

"Whereas the scheduled air lines are attempting to encroach upon the field of air freight pioneered by the fixed-base air carriers; and

"Whereas the scheduled air lines are presently subsidized by the United States Government by means of air-mail contracts despite the fact that they are financially secure as is witnessed by the public flotation of stock issues aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars within the past year and aggregating total stock valuations in terms of billions of dollars; and

"Whereas the scheduled air lines are charging the United States Government for the transportation of such mail and parcel post at a rate which is both exorbitant and unfair to the taxpayers of the United States; and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers are qualified and can profitably and efficiently transport the bulk of the mails at a rate which will permit a 3-cent air-mail letter to become a reality immediately; and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers are qualified and prepared to develop a low-cost parcel-post service immediately and not years hence at a cost to the Government far below the prevailing rate (providing for nonstop service between major cities and local service between towns with adequate airport facilities); and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers as a new and young industry are entitled to the support of the United States Government and the encouragement of the Civil Aeronautics Board as a capable and efficient instrument of air transportation; and

"Whereas the United States Government can effect such encouragement and development of aviation by permitting the said fixed-base air carriers to transport the bulk of the mails; and

"Whereas the fixed-base air carriers are prepared to cooperate with existing railroads and steamship companies carrying loads to and from the various termini of such railroads and steamship lines on a contract basis; and

"Whereas proceedings have heretofore been had under docket No. 1501 before the Board of Examiners of the Civil Aeronautics Board under a so-called investigation of the nonscheduled air lines, before which board none of the transport fixed-base air carriers were heard or represented; and

"Whereas, despite the fact that such transport fixed-base air carriers were not heard or represented, they were the subject of analysis and consideration; and

"Whereas the report and recommendations of the examiners of the Civil Aeronautics Board in relation to such carriers was most favorable to the extent that the said examiners of the Civil Aeronautics Board issued highly laudatory findings and conclusions relating to this class of carrier, and recommended 'as much freedom and latitude as possible for development of transportation service by fixed-base operators,' and recommended 'that no distinction shall be admitted on the basis of scheduled or nonscheduled service,' and further recommended 'the adoption of a liberal proposed classification and exemption order'; and

"Whereas the Civil Aeronautics Board is about to consider a proposed regulation so stringent as to be contrary to the recommendations of the examiners who conducted hearings; and

"Whereas such stringent regulations, if permitted to go into effect, would stifle the advancement of aviation, would bar the encouragement of a new industry, and would react to the detriment of deserving veterans of World War II; to the detriment of the military forces of the United States; to the detriment of business and to the detriment of all citizens and the general public;

"Now, therefore, in view of the foregoing, the Institute of Air Transportation on behalf of the fixed-base air carriers requests:

"1. That hearings be immediately commenced to determine the recommendation of fair and equitable legislation relating to the business and operations of fixed-base air carriers at which hearings members of the industry may be permitted to be heard and represented by counsel.

"2. That pending the outcome of such hearings the recommendations of the examiners of the Civil Aeronautics Board should be adopted en toto with exceptions as per the annexed proposed regulation.

"3. That the proper congressional committee or committees be asked to consider the advisability of investigating present air-mail contracts with a view to cancelling the same and establishing a complete revision based upon fair and equitable rates and permitting the allocation of new contracts to fixed-base air carriers.

"4. That pending the outcome of such congressional investigation, the fixed-base air carriers shall be permitted to contract with the railroads and steamship companies for the transportation of mail, passengers, and/or cargo to and from the various termini of such railroads and steamship companies wherever the termini of the railroads and steamship companies are within or meet the area of the fixed-base air carriers."

In relation to the four-point program above outlined, the Institute of Air Transportation will invite the support of the following: the President of the United States; Members of Congress; municipal, State, and Federal authorities; chambers of commerce; industrial groups such as railroads, steamship lines, hotel associations, oil companies, aviation manufacturers, and truckers' associations; American Legion; Veterans of Foreign Wars; AVC and other veteran organizations; Commerce Committees of Senate and House; Postal Committees of Senate and House; Small Business Committees of Senate and House; mayors' conference.

General Duff, of Pennsylvania, Makes Strong Plea for Pollution Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to call to the attention of the Congress and the country the stirring speech of Gen. James H. Duff, Republican candidate for Governor in the State of Pennsylvania, in which he told the Pennsylvania Exchange Club, "It is time to do something about the problem of pollution." The following newspaper report of General Duff's speech sets forth some clear-cut arguments in support of national legislation to meet the evils of stream pollution.

Mr. Speaker, Pennsylvania has an excellent State law to correct pollution but, like other State efforts to correct this menace, it cannot be effective unless and until we enact Federal legislation to get at the sources of pollution. I am hopeful that this House will enact such legislation within the next 10 days or 2 weeks. The Rivers and Harbors Committee has reported out a workable and effective bill; the Rules Committee has granted a rule on this bill; it is the first legislation to be called up the next time the House transacts public business on a Calendar Wednesday. Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS, of Pennsylvania, has introduced in the Senate a companion bill to the one I introduced in the House to correct pollution. There is no partisanship in this endeavor to outlaw pollution and to clean up the public waters of America. Let us get action now.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of June 23, 1946]

DUFF PLEDGES BATTLE FOR PURE WATER—STATE IN POSITION TO MEET MENACE, NOMINEE DECLARES

ALLENTOWN, PA., June 22.—Characterizing stream pollution as the "greatest single menace to public health" in Pennsylvania, Attorney General James H. Duff, Republican nominee for Governor, today called upon the citizens of the State to assist in the fight for clean waterways.

Pointing out that legislation passed at the 1945 session of the legislature placed the State in a position "to meet this danger head on," Duff, in an address before the convention of the Pennsylvania Exchange Club, added:

"It is time to do something about it. It can't be blocked or delayed if those who believe in it are willing to fight for it."

HIGHLY MENACING

He asserted that inasmuch as 80 percent of the State's population lived in congested areas "we can no longer tolerate the use of chlorinated sewage as drinking water," that the pollution of streams by mines, mills, and municipal sewage also "is highly menacing to industry itself."

"Consequently," he said, "most of these industries favor a broad and thoroughgoing program of stream purification. However, a great share of the responsibilities rests with the individual communities and the people who make up these communities."

NOT A FANATICAL SCHEME

To make the stream clearance program, enacted by the 1945 legislature upon the demand of Governor Martin, highly effective, Duff said the public must realize it "isn't a scheme cooked up by fanatics or those who want to close all industries so they can fish, but that it is a matter of twentieth century living conditions and the all-important protection of public health."

He continued:

"Today in Pennsylvania the waters of the great rivers in the most thickly populated areas in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh are so vile in their contamination that swimming is prohibited under penalty of law. In these congested areas, where recreation is necessary for the welfare of the community, almost all types of aquatic recreation have been practically eliminated by reason of stream pollution.

"DISEASE CARRY-ALLS

"Preposterous as it is, the more we have become dependent upon our streams for every kind of water supply, the more we continue to add to their conrruption. In some areas of the State, not a single stream remains unpolluted, even to the smallest tributaries.

"Scientific research has proved conclusively that polluted waterways are carry-alls for every possible type of disease. Rubbish and the pestiferous waste of thickly settled communities are dumped on creek and river banks as a matter of course and apparently with little or no thought to potential health hazards."

RESOURCES WASTED

"The first and foremost argument in favor of pure streams is the necessity of giving the people the kind of water they ought to have if they are going to have the kind of health they have a right to expect.

"It is time to realize that we have been shamefully wasteful and prodigal of all our natural resources."

WAR MADE INROADS

"The war also made incalculable inroads upon Pennsylvania's natural resources and even the most casual observer must now be aware of the vital necessity of an all-inclusive program of conservation as it affects our timber, minerals, soil, and streams.

"Those who come after us have the right to insist that we restore and replace those things among our natural resources which we have recklessly and witlessly depleted and which by their regular course in nature are capable of being restored and replaced.

"By such a program we can fulfill the obligations of modern citizenship and build a broad and material legacy to posterity."

California State Insurance Fund Saves Money for Uncle Sam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, the State compensation insurance fund of California, which was awarded the workmen's compensation insurance for Marinship Corp., Sausalito, Calif., one of the large wartime shipyards on the Pacific coast, has recently returned to the United States Maritime Commission the sum of $391,657, which was made possible by the State fund's nonprofit plan.

For reasons which are difficult for the layman to understand, the War Department and the Navy Department did not award any insurance to the California State fund during the war, principally because the war-projects rating plan required all types of insurance carried on a war-industry job to be combined in one package.

I am in receipt of a very interesting letter from Mr. Paul Scharrenberg, chairman of the California State compensation insurance fund, which points out that these other departments of the Federal Government might have been able to enjoy similar economies under the nonprofit plan of the State of California fund if they had not, to all practical intent and purpose, barred the State fund from bidding on war-projects insurance under their control, by insisting on a blanket plan of coverage.

Mr. Scharrenberg's letter to me follows:

In the early days of our national-defense program, prior to Pearl Harbor, and during all of the period of World War II, the State compensation insurance fund of California made strenuous efforts to secure at least a fair share of the workmen's compensation insurance on war projects. Most of that work was contracted on the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis, under which the Federal Government paid all the bills.

In March 1941, the California State fund's interest in workmen's compensation insurance for Government projects was conveyed to our California delegation in Congress. Their attention was directed to the leading position of the fund in California, its strong financial structure, its facilities for furnishing the most effective service to both employer and employee, and its ability to provide complete insurance protection at the lowest cost, offering a saving running into many millions of dollars for directly reimbursable Government expenditures. As a result of such advices, a communication under date of March 26, 1941, was directed by Hon. James Forrestal, then Acting Secretary of the Navy, to Mr. Addison G. Foster, Office of the Director, Executive Office of the President. We shall quote pertinent paragraphs from that letter:

"Under the general practice followed in connection with cost-plus-fixed-fee naval contracts, the contractors place the workmen's compensation insurance direct, usually, it is understood, on the basis of competitive bids.

"The Comptroller General in decision of October 12, 1940 (20 Com. Gen. 196) advised the Secretary of War that workmen's compensation and public liability insurance might be procured from a mutual insurance company by a Government contractor whose cost-plus-a-fixed-fee national defense contract provided that the Government should pay the cost of such insurance policies as the contracting officer approved when said officer believed that adequate protection would be furnished by the mutual company at less cost than by a stock company.

"There would seem to be, therefore, no legal objection to dealing with the State compensation insurance fund of California in like manner, and the Navy Department is willing to instruct its contracting officers involved to direct cost-plus-fixed-fee contractors operating in the State of California to secure bids in every case from the State compensation insurance fund prior to placing award for workmen's compensation insurance. The issuance of such instructions will be held in abeyance pending any comment or suggestions as to the procedure proposed."

On April 11, 1941, the manager of the California fund wrote to Mr. Forrestal, quoting the last paragraph of the letter cited above, and adding the following comments:

"It will be entirely satisfactory to us if contractors operating in the State of California are instructed to secure bids in every case from the State compensation insurance fund.

"We shall appreciate it if you will have this procedure put into effect. We are certain that this will enable you to save a great deal of money for the Government."

"On May 1, 1941, a reply was received from Mr. Ralph A. Bard, Acting Secretary, as follows:

"In accordance with your request of April 11, 1941, the Navy Department has issued instructions to its various contracting bureaus that bids be obtained from the State compensation insurance fund of California for workmen's compensation insurance covering construction projects in the State of California, being prosecuted under the cognizance of the respective bureaus by cost-plus-fixed-fee contractors before award for such insurance is placed by the contractors."

Similarly, on April 18, 1941, a letter was received from Julius H. Amberg, Special Assistant to the Secretary of War, as follows:

"I take pleasure in informing you that by direction of the Under Secretary of War, a directive has been issued to the Supply Arms and Services on the subject of seeking an opportunity to bid with respect to State insurance funds.

"I enclose a copy of the directive herewith."

The April 18, 1941 directive of the Under Secretary of War issued by W. N. Shulz, brigadier general, United States Army, read as follows:

"1. A number of States have insurance funds which have facilities for writing workmen's compensation insurance.

"2. It is desired that all contractors who purchase insurance, for which reimbursement of premium is obtained from the Government, offer the State Insurance Fund in the jurisdiction in which the work is to be done an opportunity to submit a bid.

"3. In the consideration of such bids the same requirements as to the protection afforded, the financial stability, and the service facilities will be applied to State funds as are applicable to other types of carriers.

"By direction of the Under Secretary of War."

The ink on the above directives had barely had time to dry when, on or about May 3, 1941, the comprehensive rating plan for national defense projects, commonly referred to as the war projects rating plan, was adopted, first by the War Department and subsequently by the Navy Department and other governmental agencies. This so-called cost-plus-a-fixed-fee insurance scheme combined in one package all types of insurance required on a job. Despite the fact that the cost of workmen's compensation insurance was by far the major insurance cost, the war projects rating plan, for all practical purposes, effectively eliminated competitive State funds. This was brought about through the provision that the insurance carrier selected must issue the following policies: (a) Workmen's compensation insurance; (b) automobile bodily injury liability; (c) automobile property damage; (d) comprehensive bodily injury liability. As the State funds can write only workmen's compensation insurance, the requirements automatically excluded all competitive State funds from participation.

Protests were immediately made by the various State funds, so the War Department permitted an interpretation. Under this interpretation a State fund might participate, provided the "State fund could perfect an arrangement with a private carrier, whereby the fund furnished the compensation insurance, and the other carrier furnished concurrently the required miscellaneous liability and automobile insurance, with the premium for all of the coverage adjusted on an aggregate basis, just as if only one carrier were involved."

This requirement for all practical purposes eliminated State funds just as fully and completely as would an outright prohibition. In the first place State funds were told that they must form a partnership with a member of a group actively opposed to the very thought of the State being in the insurance business. In the second place, even if the fund were able to make such an arrangement, the premium was to be determined not by the exposure under each individual type of insurance, but by the amount of the total losses incurred under all lines of insurance.

One of the very fundamental principles of workmen's compensation legislation is that each individual industry should care for its own killed and wounded and their dependents. This principle has been faithfully carried out through our insurance rating laws. However, we were told that this principle was to be discarded for a certain class of risks, and for this particular class, compensation insurance premiums were to be determined by including the cost of injuries to members of the public and damage to property.

The California State fund was created by the legislature to provide safe and economical insurance for all employers. Any plan, no matter what its purpose, which in effect eliminates the State fund from the field of workmen's compensation insurance flouts the spirit and intent of the Constitution of the State, as well as the workmen's compensation laws. It is certainly a strange situation that a governmental agency, even on an alleged basis of economy or expediency, could, in effect, say to the legislature, "The State fund you have created for insuring all employers against liability imposed under the workmen's compensation law is to be denied the right to insure employers who have been awarded certain war contracts."

This rating plan which seriously discriminated against State funds was not immediately approved in California, and the California State fund went along satisfactorily on a competitive bid basis. The insurance sections of the Army and Navy (manned largely by private insurance company partisans serving for the duration) continued to press for the adoption of the special rating plan in California and were successful in securing approval in December 1941, of a modified version, known as the California defense rating plan. Although the latter plan had many of the basic objections of the original plan, its application was limited to workmen's compensation insurance alone, and it was possible for the fund to participate. Either because the California fund was not completely knocked out of the running, or for other unknown reasons, this substitute rating plan was not widely used. The competitive bidding system continued to some extent until, finally, October 22, 1942, when the Government's insurance men prevailed upon the insurance commissioner of California to approve the war projects rating plan.

The answer to whether or not the State funds were discriminated against under this plan is displayed in an array of cold figures which have been submitted to all interested persons and which are available for inspection in the files of the California State fund. Under competitive bidding the fund was awarded war insurance contracts totaling $1,301,207 in insurance premiums. When the modified defense rating plan was adopted, the business secured by the fund dropped to a total of $124,490. Subsequent to the approval of the war projects rating plan on October 22, 1942, the fund secured only three relatively insignificant contracts for such coverage, totaling $28,977. The only reason for this latter participation was the fact that three long-time fund insured insisted on their private liability carriers joining with the fund to complete the required coverage. Otherwise, private liability insurance carriers positively refused to furnish the miscellaneous liability coverage in combination with the fund as the workmen's compensation carrier. As a consequence the fund was, in effect, boycotted and could not participate at all. Bear in mind that all of this was during the period of the greatest war production activity and when, it is conservatively estimated, Government expenditures alone created $30,000,000 or more in California compensation insurance premiums annually.

Of the $1,301,207 premium earned by the fund under competitive bidding, approximately 60 percent was returned to the contractor and the Government through the application of the fund's net cost dividend plan. The resultant saving to the Government of over three-fourths of a million dollars on this small part of the Government's total insurance cost in California is far greater than any possible saving under any other insurance plan and indicative of the great amount of saving which might have been realized by the various agencies if the fund had been permitted to offer competitive proposals subject to honest evaluation.

A striking example of what might have been accomplished arises from the modification of the war projects rating plan adopted by the United States Maritime Commission in May 1943. This modification permitted proposals (State fund or private company) segregating workmen's compensation liability from other forms of general and public liability and permitting evaluation of the cost of fund insurance as compared with private insurance coverage. Such a modification cannot be deemed unfair nor discriminatory nor specifically to the advantage of any one type of carrier. It merely made it possible for the Government to secure equivalent merchandise at the best available market price.

Under the revised Maritime Commission procedure the California State fund successfully bid for and was awarded the workmen's compensation insurance for Marinship Corp. at Sausalito, for a 1-year period, February 28, 1944, to February 28, 1945. The insurance on this project was a definite challenge to the fund because the previous insurance carrier had found it necessary to retire from the risk owing to the excessive cost of accidents.

The fund met the challenge squarely. Through safety engineering service, careful medical direction, and claims supervision, this shipyard was changed from an unprofitable insurance risk to a profitable one. This was accomplished at lower rates than had previously been charged and during a period when the yard constructed the greatest number of ships. A fully equipped hospital with a staff of doctors and nurses to render necessary first-aid and medical care was maintained at the yard. Seriously injured employees were removed to San Francisco hospitals and placed under the care of specialists. The immediate result was a sharp drop in accident frequency and a rapid reduction in lost man-hours.

The total premium earned under the policy was $1,169,125. Out of that premium $710,167 was paid to injured employees or their dependents or for hospital and medical care. The net overhead charged by the fund, including the cost of reinsurance, amounted to only $67,301, leaving a balance of $391,657, which was returned to the Marinship Corp. in accordance with the fund's nonprofit plan. This entire saving is being passed along to the United States Maritime Commission. The administrative cost to the Government would have been $120,737 greater under the war projects rating plan which was used in the majority of war work. So in addition to a material reduction in the number of accidents and the saving of manpower for our Nation at war, the California State fund plan also effected administrative economy for the Government by reducing overhead costs more than 64 percent.

It was argued in favor of the war projects rating plan that its use would lessen the cost of insurance to the Government. That claim has been dissipated time and time again. The California State fund can demonstrate, under any set of circumstances and on any size risk, that its net cost of insurance will always be less than the net cost developed by the rating plan. The fund did not ask for discrimination in favor of State funds. The California State Fund asked only that the departments require a proposal from the State fund as well as the proposal of eligible private carriers. All the State fund sought to accomplish through a modification of the rating plan to permit segregation for the coverage for workmen's compensation was to effect economies greater than those available under the rating plan.

Government insurance on Government projects appeared to be entirely satisfactory in California's neighbor States of Oregon, Washington, and Nevada, and in several additional States where compensation insurance is a State monopoly. The California State fund did not even hint at monopoly, but asked only the same arrangement that perforce must be made by Government agencies in exclusive fund States—the writing of the workmen's compensation insurance separate and distinct from other liability lines, and then only where the State fund is in a position to effect greater economies.

When we consider the great aircraft, shipyard and war construction program in California that made this State and our Nation an arsenal for victory, very little imagination is required to visualize the tremendous savings that might have been made for the United States Government and the taxpayers if the State compensation insurance fund of California had been afforded the opportunity to insure a greater share of these projects. The fund's record was not made at the expense of the injured worker who received his full benefits and the best of medical care. It was made possible by an experienced staff specializing in this type of insurance, by the elimination of human hardship and suffering through safe practice, and by economical administrative management.

The State Department Needs a House Cleaning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the House having granted permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the penetrating analysis of our policy in Latin America written by that outstanding authority on foreign affairs, Constantine Brown, published in the Washington Star on June 30.

In the course of his analysis, in which he shows the tremendous influence of the leftists in shaping our Latin-American policy so that it will injure American interests and advance those of the Soviet Union, Mr. Brown mentions the name of George Michanowsky. Let me add that this George Michanowsky is a Russian-born alien, who entered this country without proper papers, claiming that he was a political refugee. His lack of citizenship did not prevent his being employed by the OWI. This mysterious character, it would seem, is not only advising policymaking officials of the State Department on Latin-American affairs but actually shaping our policy, which all goes to show that a thorough house cleaning is long overdue in that Department. Mr. Brown's brilliant study follows:

YANKEE IMPERIALISM CRY IN SOUTH AMERICA GROWS—UNITED STATES POSITION DETERIORATING AS RESULT OF PROPAGANDA STEMMING FROM WIDELY SEPARATED BUT ALL ANTI-AMERICAN SOURCES

(By Constantine Brown)

Unless some of the wise men in the State Department decide to face realities squarely and revamp their Latin-American policies there is a strong possibility that our relations with the republics south of the Rio Grande may become even worse than they were in the pre-good-neighbor era.

When President Roosevelt decided to back by every means short of war the European democracies which were fighting the Nazis, the South American situation came prominently into the picture. The American Government put a watchful eye on German, Italian, and Japanese machinations in the principal Latin-American Republics.

The Axis propagandists described this country as imperialistic and aggressive. Axis factories attempted to undersell the United States in Latin markets by offering products far below American prices. While quality was not up to American standards, the difference in price was such that it tempted the Latin-American consumer.

But far more important than this economic war was the penetration by Axis agents into the life of our Latin neighbors. There were reports—sometimes confirmed—that Germany and Italy were preparing naval and air bases in remote sections of those republics with the assistance of corrupt or ideologically sympathetic local officials.

HITLER SPENT LAVISHLY

Mr. Roosevelt and his top military and diplomatic advisers soon became convinced that after Hitler had liquidated the European democracies he intended to turn his attention to the Western Hemisphere. His agents spent money lavishly on propaganda and other methods to increase the Axis' prestige and power. And while there was little affinity between most Latin-American republics and the Germans, there was a good deal of feeling for the Italians. Our past mistakes and clumsy dealings with the supersensitive Latins were exploited to the utmost. There was, in fact, more real danger for the United States in the operations of official and unofficial Axis missionaries in South America than there was likelihood that the Germans would threaten this country with direct military action across the Atlantic after Europe was conquered.

Thus, one of the reasons for the administration ranging this country against the Axis was the realization that unless Hitler and his allies were defeated, our predicament would become serious, indeed.

Germany, Italy, and Japan now have been utterly defeated. The military might of the Reich has been crushed and is not likely to become a menace to the world again unless those who play power politics decide to use the German people as tools and cannon fodder.

Yet, some high officials of the State Department, and particularly those in charge of Latin-American affairs, are conducting the policy of this country as if Hitler were still alive and a power in the world, and Germany continued to be the foremost military threat.

BYRNES IS PREOCCUPIED

Secretary of State Byrnes is so busy with the enormous problem of attempting to bring about some sort of a peace, to end officially the war which ceased last August, that he has little time to pay attention to Latin-American problems.

Although this Government has poured billions of dollars into almost every corner of Latin America and outwardly, at least, has done everything to eliminate suspicions of "Yankee imperialism," it cannot be said that it has succeeded in winning the genuine confidence of Latin America.

At the Chapultepec Conference in the spring of 1945, the United States achieved probably its most important diplomatic success in 25 years. The foreign ministers of the American Republics established a realistic policy of hemispheric cooperation. As a result of that meeting the United States representatives at the United Nations Conference in San Francisco fought against the bitter opposition of Russian Foreign Minister C. M. Molotov, to permit Argentina to enter the world organization. The battle was on. But soon afterward the State Department returned to its pre-Chapultepec ideology and took up a bitter fight against the active and popular Argentine politico, Col. Juan Peron.

The accusation brought against him was that he was a declared pro-Nazi. This was unquestionably true some years ago. But the State Department overlooked the fact that Peron was popular with his own people. On the eve of the presidential elections in Argentina the State Department brought out its Blue Book setting forth all the "crimes" of the popular candidate. While the accusations brought against him may have been correct, the American officials who urged President Truman to permit the issuance of that document failed in psychology. The Blue Book was interpreted throughout South America as another demonstration of the United States desire to mix into the domestic problems of its neighbors to the south.

REPERCUSSIONS STILL FELT

The repercussions of that publication are being felt even today and, strange as it may seem, our "intervention" is more resented in the smaller republics than in Argentina, Chile, and Brazil.

The man who is regarded as responsible for this policy is Assistant Secretary of State Spruille Braden, who was United States Ambassador at Buenos Aires at the time when the American-Argentine relations became seriously strained. According to reliable reports from unbiased American observers, many Latin-American foreign ministers now declare that "America has replaced the good-neighbor policy with Bradenism."

In fact, however, there have been many other considerations besides anti-Peronism which have affected the State Department's policies toward Argentina. Among others was the keen interest shown by the Committee of Latin-American Affairs of the CIO. This committee, which has its headquarters at 15 Union Square, New York, a building which houses Mr. Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Clothing Workers, is devoting much time to Latin-American affairs. Its chairman is Jacob S. Potofsky. But the moving spirit of the organization is its secretary, George Nichanowsky, who for some time has shown a deep interest in the undemocratic form of government in Argentina.

According to Members of the Senate who have followed closely the vagaries of the American Republics Division in the State Department, Mr. Michanowsky has taken an active part in American diplomatic actions in Buenos Aires. He is said to have close contacts not only with Mr. Braden, but also with Mr. Byrnes, whom he is said to have informed after the Potsdam Conference of all his personal activities in support of Mr. Braden's actions in Argentina.

RUSSIA ALTERS POSITION

He told the Secretary of State, according to the Senators who have had access to certain confidential files, that during Mr. Byrnes' absence at Potsdam he had personally supervised publicity to bolster Mr. Braden in Latin America and had "inspired" a news agency's story about the admirable stand the State Department had taken on the Argentine question. This "inspired" story, Mr. Michanowsky reported, caused a sensation in Latin America and made the front pages in Argentina's biggest newspapers.

The interesting point in this story is that within less than a year after Foreign Minister Molotov violently denounced the fascism of Colonel Peron, the U. S. S. R. decided to forget all about it and renewed diplomatic relations which had been broken off in 1917. A Soviet diplomatic mission is now on its way to Buenos Aires, while a Soviet economic mission is already there and was present in a place of honor at the inauguration of Colonel Peron as President of Argentina.

Thus, while the Division of American Republics in the State Department still shouts "Nazis" every time the name of Colonel Peron is mentioned, the Russians, who claim they need greater security against possible resurgence of the German menace, are more than anxious to become friends with the "Argentine pro-Nazi dictator."

Some State Department officials explained to this reporter that publication of the Blue Book 2 weeks before the Argentine elections was essential because our democratic friends in South America were pressing the State Department to take some action to prevent the election of Colonel Peron. It looks as if the pressure on the State Department for "immediate action" may have come from sections which are known to be subservient to Soviet policies.

THREE GROUPS OPPOSE UNITED STATES

Today our position in Latin America has become difficult. The United States prestige and its intention to deal honestly and fairly with its sister republics are undermined by three groups who are united under one slogan: "Down with Yankee imperialism!"

These groups are: The remnants of Nazi propagandists who went under cover but are still fairly active; the many sympathizers of Generalissimo Franco and Soviet agitators, working through the labor organization of Vicente Lombardo Toledano, president of the biggest organized labor group in Latin America.

The Nazis, representing a power which has ceased to exist, exercise their influence in a small way by admonishing those with whom they are still in contact "we told you so." They argue that after the Axis threat was ended, America reverted to her old imperialism and has decided to use the big stick whenever it suits her purpose.

Those Latin Americans who would like to save Generalissimo Franco's regime join in the anti-American chorus. They praise Britain for her unbiased and realistic attitude toward Spain and denounce the United States for its vacillating policies. Since there is not much they can say in defense of Generalissimo Franco that has not already been said, they are castigating American "imperialism" in Latin America as the reason Washington sides against the Spanish dictator.

Finally, there is the Russian propaganda which, while newly on the scene, is deadly efficient because it has at its disposal far more money than the Germans and the Italians together had.

REDS WELL FINANCED

Soviet propaganda in Latin America dates back some 20 years to the time when the word "Communist" was still anathema—officially—in every Latin republic. Then there were attempts to organize cells among the discontented workers in the smaller republics. These were partially successful. But the brilliant military feats of the Red army impressed the Latin Americans and the Politbureau was quick to take advantage of the situation.

Russia's most agile diplomat, Constantin Oumansky, was sent to Mexico when diplomatic relations between the two countries were resumed, with a large staff of experts and some $150,000,000 in gold. Mr. Oumansky did a first-class job until his death in Mexico City.

One by one all the Latin-American republics—sometimes under the gentle prodding of the State Department—resumed diplomatic relations with the U. S. S. R. The new ambassadors arrived with large staffs and were well-supplied with money. This force, later assisted by Lombardo Toledano's Latin-American labor organization, did good work, not so much to reestablish Russia's prestige but in an attempt to undermine America's prestige and vilify our intentions toward these sister republics.

There is today an outcry of Yankee imperialism throughout Latin America. To these voices are added those of some American Communist publications and Soviet propaganda organs: Izvestia, Pravda, Tass news agency, and the Soviet government broadcasting stations, which beam their programs to Latin America in Spanish and Portuguese some 4 hours daily.

Politically, Europe is important to us merely because it represents the storm center of the world, since all major wars start there. Asia is remote, and, while its importance cannot be minimized, it is of a long-range nature. Latin America, although generally given little space in the American daily press, is today of greater consequence to the United States than all the other countries put together. It represents a solid line of defense, and it also represents the most fertile portion of the world for reciprocal and profitable exchange of products.

Yet certain American official groups do nothing to prove that the cry Yankee imperialism is a lie.

More Proof About the PAC School

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the House having given unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to offer additional proof of a statement I made on the floor of the House on June 11, 1946. When I presented a study of the personnel of the School for Political Action Technique conducted in this city by the National Citizens Political Action Committee, I was not in full possession of their complete plans. It would seem that for certain reasons they did not publish a full roster of their "faculty" in their catalog. What these reasons were, you can judge for yourself from the list of those who appeared unannounced.

On Friday, June 28, one of the featured lecturers was George Pirinsky. Let me tell you something about him, since he comes from my own State. Pirinsky was formerly the editor of the Bulgarian-Macedonian Communist weekly, Saznanie. In 1937, he was held under a deportation warrant by the Department of Immigration on a charge of illegal entry. His real name is reputed to be George Zykoff. His articles appeared in the Saznanie under the name of George Nicoloff. The Daily Worker of May 8, 1936, page 4, carries a glowing tribute to the activities of George Pirinsky, written by George Dimitroff, a fellow Bulgarian Communist, former head of the Communist International, now a leader in the Communist Party in Bulgaria. In the same issue of the Daily Worker it was announced by Mr. Pirinsky that a special six-page edition of Saznanie would be published in honor of the same Mr. Dimitroff.

In the August 31, 1935, issue, page 4, Mr. Pirinsky demonstrated the nature of his allegiance in an article headlined "Bulgarians in United States must answer Dimitroff's call, heroic leader of the Communist International an inspiration and an example to the toilers of the whole world." Quoting from a letter of Dimitroff dated May 13, 1934, he outlined a policy which bears a remarkable resemblance to the policy now being carried out by the Communists, especially in the Balkan countries. The letter read in part as follows:

> Only the united revolutionary struggle of the Macedonian people in close alliance with the workers and peasants of Bulgaria, Jugoslavia, and Greece can bring to victory the Macedonian revolution for liberation. Only the Soviet system, as the experiences of the great Soviet Union glaringly proved, can guarantee * * * final liberation and * * * complete national unification.

In line with this record it is no surprise that Mr. Pirinsky, who is the executive secretary of the American Slav Congress, an affiliate of the All-Slav Congress with headquarters in Moscow, delivered an attack on the Congress of the United States. He claimed that what was going on behind the Soviet iron curtain was really a great upsurge on the part of the people.

On Saturday, June 29, another previously unannounced member of the faculty appeared, namely, Woody Guthrie. In testimony before a congressional committee delivered on October 4, 1940, this worthy is described as follows:

> Woody Guthrie, a Communist, is a guitar-playing, ballad-singing entertainer. * * * During the past 3 or 4 years Woody Guthrie has become one of the outstanding entertainers in the Communist Party, Communist Party fronts, and other left-wing organization meetings. * * * I have heard him on numerous occasions and it is always with this definite Communist Party tinge, and in his singing and in his talk he has never tried to attempt to conceal the fact that he was the columnist for the Daily Worker or that he was a member of the Communist Party and represented it as such.

The character of these two additional members of the faculty of the School for Political Action Technique more than justifies the charges I previously made against this Communist-dominated hoax.

Testimonial Dinner to Senator Tunnell and Representative Traynor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, at Wilmington, Del., on Thursday, June 27, 1946, a testimonial dinner was given to the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL] and to Representative PHILIP A. TRAYNOR by the Delaware Joint Labor Committee. At that time I delivered an address in which I discussed the outstanding service and record of both the Senator from Delaware and Representative TRAYNOR. On the same occasion the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL] also delivered an address. I ask that both his address and mine be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, members of the Delaware Joint Labor Committee, and distinguished guests, it is a genuine pleasure to take part in this program in which we honor Delaware's eminent sons and political leaders, the Honorable JAMES M. TUNNELL, United States Senator, and Congressman PHILIP A. TRAYNOR.

First let me say, my close relations with Senator TUNNELL in the Senate of the United States have developed into a sincere and enduring personal friendship. Like all others who enjoy his friendship, I hold a very high regard for his skill, for his courage, and for his integrity.

While my acquaintance with Congressman TRAYNOR is obviously not of such an intimate character, I have, nevertheless, a long acquaintance or personal knowledge of his fine record in the Lower House of Congress, where he stands high in the ranks of loyal Democrats of that body. I have followed his record there, and we are all proud of his work in the Lower House.

You know, it is a fine thing to be able to say these days that a Democrat is loyal when we find so many who forget their allegiance to the party which put them in office and who fail to stand up and be counted when a real legislative battle is in progress.

And so, my friends, I welcome this opportunity and deem it a high honor to have the privilege of joining with you tonight in offering a tribute to a distinguished citizen of Delaware, a liberal and courageous statesman and loyal Democrat—my very able friend and colleague, Senator TUNNELL.

My friends, you are to be congratulated for arranging this fine demonstration of respect and goodwill toward your honored guests. I am sure it will serve as a source of renewed inspiration to Senator TUNNELL and Congressman TRAYNOR in the great tasks which they are undertaking in the Congress of the United States.

My very close association with your senior Senator ever since he came to the Senate has given me an especial opportunity to learn of his many splendid traits of character, his unique talent for probing and getting at the heart of complicated problems. If no other activity or life—in no other occupation or profession—can one find a better opportunity to study the character and true worth of a man than in a legislative body such as the Senate of the United States.

In the United States Senate, every act of its Members is preserved in accurate and unquestioned records. Our speeches and votes on every issue are taken down with unerring precision. In that body, it often takes a high degree of courage to stand by one's conscientious convictions. Every time we vote, we are on trial. Obviously, we cannot satisfy everyone. We must, however, justify our votes before our constituents. We cannot repent our actions or escape responsibility.

"The moving finger writes; and, having writ, moves on: nor all your piety nor wit shall lure it back to cancel half a line, nor all your tears wash out a word of it."

During the years which lie ahead, our country will face vast problems. There is the problem of how we can avoid inflation and deflation and maintain a balanced and expanding economy of full production and full employment. There is the problem of how we can reverse the growing trend toward the concentration of economic power and put our vast resources to work on behalf of the great majority of our people instead of the privileged few. There is the problem of how to cooperate effectively with the other nations of the world and work out a common destiny free from the threat of recurring warfare.

The solution to these problems will largely depend upon the type of men and women who are elected to the United States Congress.

If you or I have doubts as to whether the Congress of the United States can meet the test of the future and live up to its great responsibilities, it is only because we do not yet know whether there will be enough men in the next Congress who have the vision, the understanding, and the ability of your own senior Senator, Senator TUNNELL.

As we look back to the inadequacies of the record of the present Congress, you and I are well aware of what was wrong. We know the trouble lies in the simple fact that there have not been enough Members of Congress like Senator TUNNELL—men who have the ability to analyze our problems and determine the correct course and then possess the courage to follow their convictions.

Looking into the future, I say to you with all the conviction at my command: "Give us more men in Congress of the caliber and courage of Senator TUNNELL of Delaware and America's future will be in safe hands."

You people here in Delaware may believe you know him well, but I regard myself as a very competent authority on the accomplishments of Senator TUNNELL. For the last 6 years, I have sat on the Senate floor at a desk only a few feet away from Senator TUNNELL, where I turn to him for frequent consultations. I sit with him day after day in the meetings of the two of the most important committees in the Senate—the Foreign Relations Committee and the Education and Labor Committee. In the Education and Labor Committee, of which I am chairman, he is my chief reliance in the many vexing and difficult problems that come before that committee. I have named Senator TUNNELL chairman of a subcommittee which handles most of the vital labor and educational legislation that comes before our committee. It was Senator TUNNELL who, only a few days ago, handled the United States Employment Service bill, H. R. 4437, and brought it to successful action against the efforts of reactionary Members of the Senate to strip it of its vital provisions guaranteeing protection of the rights of unemployed workers. I have listened carefully to Senator TUNNELL in many debates in which he has participated. I have sat with him as he listened to others. I have noted again and again the rapt attention and respect with which others accord him whenever he speaks—either on the floor of the Senate or during the proceedings of a committee meeting or hearing.

Therefore, I come to you tonight with very special knowledge of the facts to tell you of the magnificent and courageous job Senator TUNNELL has been doing in representing you and indeed all the people of the Nation in the Senate of the United States. My friends, these are not mere rhetorical expressions. Every Member of the Senate recognizes Senator TUNNELL, of Delaware, as a man of deep human sympathy and understanding, a man who is eminently fair and intelligent and completely forthright, a man who is gifted with genuine legal talent and unusual ability to express himself with sharp precision.

In recent years there has been a lot of criticism about Members of Congress. It is said, for example, that some Members of the Senate absent themselves for long periods from the work of the Senate and its committees, and often fail to vote on important issues, missing when their votes are needed on important legislation. Let me say to you that no one has made such a criticism of your senior Senator. I doubt if there is another man in the Senate who has a better attendance record than Senator TUNNELL.

But Senator TUNNELL does not merely listen on the floor of the Senate—he participates. He is one of our most active debaters. He is always there seeing that no vicious or ill-conceived legislation is rushed through against the people's interest or the country's welfare without being vigorously challenged. Only 2 weeks ago a bill came before the Senate for final passage which, if passed, would have encouraged wholesale violation by employers of the Fair Labor Standards Act. This bill would have encouraged employers to pay less than minimum wages and to have their employees work without overtime pay for more than 40 hours a week. I am referring to the so-called Gwynne bill, which would practically do away with the penalties provided under the wage-hour legislation. This bill came up at a time when no other Senator then on the floor recognized how dangerous it would be. It was Senator TUNNELL'S alert objection which prevented it from being passed.

Because of Senator TUNNELL'S acknowledged sound judgment, his opinion is frequently sought and he is called into consultation by other Members of the Senate on pending bills or amendments. His knowledge and keen ability to supply the right judgment and information at the proper moment has thus caused many votes, besides his own, to be cast on the side of wise and intelligent legislation. I know of no Members of the Senate who are more persuasive or influential than Senator TUNNELL on behalf of worthy and progressive legislation.

But I will not confine myself to mere statements. Let us look at the record of Senator TUNNELL:

In a speech on the minimum wage bill, which incidentally got as far as it did chiefly because of the efforts, persistence, and intelligence of Senator TUNNELL, who handled the bill through most of its very rough and stormy passage, Senator TUNNELL said:

"Raising the legal minimum wage from 40 cents to 65 cents an hour will help to correct an injustice to economically defenseless underpaid workers, and will help to bring them closer to a decent standard of living, which was the goal set by the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938."

Further on he stated:

"The bill will not affect a very large percentage of American workingmen today, but it will reach those who are unable to defend themselves. In some sections of the country employers are abusing their privilege of paying less than a living wage to those who are unorganized and in no position to defend themselves. That is something which we may and should consider. In the first place, approximately three-fourths of American laboring men are unorganized. They constitute a body of people living as best they can on the highest wage they can get."

It is clear from these quotations that he is a champion of the unorganized, the economically defenseless, the exploited—those whose voices are rarely heard.

What does he want to do for them? Again from the same speech I quote:

"But simply to break even is not what an American boy and an American girl who start out in life to build a home want to do. That is not what we want them to do. That is not what America expects them to do. An American boy and an American girl starting to build a home expect more than to break even. They have to have a place in which to live. They are entitled to receive a wage which will enable them to buy a home and to purchase the things enjoyed by those taking part in the ordinary life of the community in which they live. They are entitled to an automobile. They are entitled to refrigeration. They are entitled to have the things that go to protect their health, their lives. Breaking even is starvation one door away. Breaking even leaves the man and the woman in poverty throughout their lives. Breaking even means that when a person reaches the age of 65, or whatever may be the maximum working age, he must be dependent on someone else, even though he were the best manager in the world."

Senator TUNNELL practices what he preaches. In his own farming enterprise he does it; in conducting the hearings on the minimum wage bill he showed himself to be as interested, and even more so, in the household budget of the substandard workers who appeared before our committee as he was in the most profound statements of the experts or the representatives of powerful organizations. On more than one occasion, when through no fault of your distinguished senior Senator, the hearings were delayed, at the risk of political chastisement, he made way for the substandard workers waiting to testify and postponed the appearance of witnesses who were nationally famous because he knew the substandard worker could not afford to wait around in Washington incurring heavy expenses in lodging, and so forth.

In his able speech on the Case bill, he showed the deep interest and attention he pays to the rights of the average person. He read from letters of his constituents, analyzed their significance and told of his responses. This procedure brought the average man and woman right into the Senate debate and clearly and effectively served to point the issues and explain his own position on the bill. Thus he made democracy really function.

He gets right down to the roots of a problem. In discussing the Byrd amendment to the Case bill, which proposed to prohibit an employer from contributing to welfare funds, and so forth, he in two paragraphs, in my opinion, showed it up for what it was. He said:

"Mr. President, I have listened to the discussions as much as I could, and have heard no one come forward with any suggestion as to why that language should be put in a measure pending in the United States Senate, and I cannot understand why it is placed in the amendment, unless it be on the theory that the person involved is incompetent, or that the purpose of the gift is in violation of public morals. I do not know of any possible excuse for such language, and I have heard none advanced during the discussion of the subject. Here we have a prohibition against an individual giving his own money away for a legitimate purpose. There may be thousands of legitimate purposes, but this language would prohibit the giving away of money for such purposes.

"When we start to dig up antilabor legislation, or antisomething else we run into difficulties. If we were to start to write antiemployment legislation, for example, we would write some silly things. That is what has been done in this amendment, as I see it."

After listening to his penetrating legal analysis of draft provisions in the President's emergency labor bill, their deletion from the bill was assured. Speaking of the particular section he said:

"There is also included the words, 'and on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the President.' Knowing the present President of the United States, I believe that any rules and regulations which he might prescribe would be fair if he knew the particulars of the case involved. But the language reads, 'as may be prescribed by the President.' Does that mean, Mr. President, that a man could be forced to serve in the Army for the remainder of his life? Does it mean that he could be forced, for example, to serve in the Army for 20 years? The language is, I repeat, 'and on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the President.' There is no limitation in such language. It seems to me that it is more than should be asked for, even in the case of an acknowledged criminal, or in the case of a conviction in regular form. On the basis of the President's judgment, a man could be inducted into the Army and compelled to serve. It would depend upon the President's judgment. We can reasonably say that the President would never have an opportunity to exercise his judgment."

Continuing further, he said:

"I cannot imagine a provision of law going that far. I am anxious to stand by the President and by the people of the United States. I believe that the pending bill is aimed at something which is wrong; I fully agree that it is; yet, it seems to me that we are being asked to prescribe a punishment which we would not prescribe for a murderer, or a person who had been found guilty of any other serious crime. When we provide that a man may be forced into the Army under such terms and conditions as the President, in his judgment, may prescribe, it is going too far."

What else has Senator TUNNELL done? Well, let us just look at his work in the Education and Labor Committee, of which I am chairman.

Besides conducting the very controversial minimum-wage hearings, with very long executive sessions, he, as chairman of the important Subcommittee on Labor Legislation, was responsible for the very revealing hearings and the favorable report on the women's equal pay bill. He also is responsible for the very successful and very difficult task of resolving in the most satisfactory manner possible the controversy over the return of the Employment Services to the States. On last Monday, he fought a vigorous battle on the floor to provide a good functioning employment service system, to serve the workers of the Nation, and forced a compromise which even the most optimistic among us never believed could win as many votes as it did.

An expert in the Budget Bureau informed me that the bill and report which Senator TUNNELL filed from our committee was the best piece of legislative workmanship he has seen in many years.

His work on the Subcommittee on Wartime Health and Education is well known, as well as his activity in connection with FEPC, the hospital-construction bill, Federal aid to education, and the numerous social welfare and other constructive measures in the interest of our national well-being reported from our committee.

In the Foreign Relations Committee and on the floor there has been no one more active than he in seeking a just and equitable solution of the Palestine question. Since that time he has continuously and vigorously pressed for the admission of 100,000 Jews into Palestine as a just and moral obligation. He was likewise vigorous and active in his support of the creation of the United Nations Organization, the Bretton Woods Agreement, and in helping me during the last few weeks in presenting the resolution for approval of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization before the Foreign Relations Committee. In supporting the loan to Britain, Senator TUNNELL did an excellent job.

You all know of his votes on the price control, lend-lease, reciprocal trade, excess-profits taxes, veterans and housing legislation.

Being a real friend of the farmer, he voted against the Russell amendment to the minimum-wage bill, which would include the cost of labor in the parity price on farm products. He knew too well that only the large commercial farmers and the big packers could benefit from such an amendment, and the cost would be paid through sharply increased prices for food products consumed by the workers. He was a loyal supporter of the farm-tenant program, loans to the low-income farmers and the veterans, and the very socially desirable migratory labor program of the Farm Security Administration. He was very actively interested in the school-lunch program recently signed by the President. He was one of the Senators who fought successfully to keep the program from being reduced to less than $100,000,000.

In the meat and flour subsidy program, through his keen analytical judgment, he could see that the more money that was appropriated for the subsidy, the less money would be collected in the market place from the pocketbooks of the low-income groups, and thus he did his utmost to secure these appropriations in the interest of sound economics and good business.

Summing up, one perhaps could say he voted with labor, but I would like to put it that he voted as his conscience and his intelligence directed him. I know this is true because on many occasions I have discussed matters with him before labor or other groups have had an opportunity to present their views and have always found his views to be based on sound economic and social principles and national welfare. Also, I know he is so completely fair and forthright that he could not do otherwise. Yet, as he stated on the floor of the Senate, he did not see why he should not recognize a labor union as a legitimate constituent. Let me quote his exact words:

"The other day a man wrote me that I was representing a certain labor union, naming it. I wrote back and asked him if he thought that people who were members of labor unions were entitled to be represented by their Senators and Representatives in Congress, or whether he believed that Senators and Representatives should confine their representation to other classes than those who belonged to labor unions. He has not yet answered my inquiry. And yet that statement was from a man who is well educated and who conducts a large business. He says in effect that if we represent labor unions, or if we represent people who are members of labor unions, we are doing something 'wrong.' I feel that it is my duty to represent not only labor unions, but members of the employment branch of industry. I do not intend to do something which I think will injure either of those elements. If there is to be any injury, I want it to be the very least possible under the circumstances."

A man who has such a philosophy of government, a man who is so entirely reasonable and honest, a man who has such a clear and penetrating legal mind, a man who is willing to use all of these qualifications in the interest of the welfare of our country as a whole must be kept in the United States Senate.

We in the Senate who realize the serious problems which confront our country are relying on you, the voters of Delaware, to send back to Washington these men who have so ably and conscientiously represented their constituents in the Halls of Congress.

"Times like these demand strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands—men whom the lust of office does not kill; men whom the spoils of office cannot buy; men who possess opinions and a will."

My friends, you have an opportunity to put those sentiments into effect by marshaling support for these two candidates, Senator TUNNELL and Congressman TRAYNOR, in the forthcoming primary and general election, and returning them to the offices which they have so faithfully and efficiently filled in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TUNNELL. I desire to express to you my sincere appreciation of this wonderful dinner and the spirit in which it is given. Congressman TRAYNOR and I can never have reason to say that our constituents do not appreciate the things we have tried to do for them. I think that all people, while they dare not ask for it, do look with satisfaction on such spontaneous acts of kindness and gratitude as you have performed with relation to the slight services which he and I have been able to perform.

One likes to think of America as a nation united and in agreement on the great problems which face us. However, any nation that makes progress must of necessity have people within it who are anxious for progress, for betterment, for better living conditions, better homes, more opportunities for their sons and daughters, as well as themselves. It was this spirit of dissatisfaction which caused your ancestors and my ancestors to leave their European surroundings and come to the forests of America. They left their homes, their employment, their government, and launched out in a great effort to build for themselves a government of the free, a church of their choice, and schools in which these principles should be taught. In later years, those who favored any sort of change in laws for the betterment of mankind, organizations for the uplift of the human race, and a form of government more adapted to the ways of the average man are called liberals. Those who seeks to hold progress, including laws, forms of government, and personal opportunity to their present standard, or even look with regret upon the conditions of the past, are known as conservatives or reactionaries. Reactionaries do not favor change or improvement. Reactionaries never favor labor.

On July 5, 1935, there was approved a law providing for the National Labor Relations Board. This law has been the magna carta of labor. Under it the United States has reached the greatest production in the history of any nation in any age. We now hear a great demand on the part of reactionary elements for an amendment or a repeal of the National Labor Relations Board. This is a bill of rights for labor. The reactionaries of this country are demanding that they be freed from its provisions.

On June 25, 1938, there was approved a bill which was known as the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. This was a bill advocated and passed at the instance of liberals, having for its purpose the guaranty of certain rights to the individual laborer, certain privileges and rights which had been denied him up to that time. This act guaranteed minimum wages, maximum hours, freedom from the curse of child labor, and provided other safeguards for labor. The reactionaries have always longed for the return of the period of unprotected labor conditions. Within the last 5 years, the reactionaries of the Nation have become obsessed with the idea that protection to labor must be removed. The reactionaries now state that the National Labor Relations Act is wrong because it does not protect the employer. In other words it is wrong because it does not obtain for the employer the things which he already had at the time of its passage, namely, an equal status with labor. We have been receiving all sorts of objections to minimum wage and maximum hour changes. One sometimes wonders why this campaign has been put on. Campaigns of this sort are bound to arouse antagonisms. The laborer must earn enough by his daily toil to support himself and family. In most instances he has no other resources. The ideal condition in America would be one where labor would realize its responsibility to the employer, the employer would realize his responsibility to the employee, and both would realize their responsibility to the consumer. Yet, those of us in Congress know that these conditions do not exist to the highest degree. In all the correspondence I have had with people favorable to labor, I have never yet received a letter indicating the desire to destroy management. On the other hand, I have been deluged with attacks on labor. Some desire that we should curb labor. Some ask that labor be prohibited from organizing. We have seen every possible effort made to cripple labor organizations by legislation. Every attempt has been made to make it more difficult for labor, organized or unorganized, to obtain a fair living wage. I presume that this condition does not prevail in our State. There are sections of the United States where wages are far below a living standard. First, there was the Smith-Connally Act, which was passed on June 25, 1943. When this bill became a law, its sponsors assured us that there would be no further strikes. Labor had had its lesson, so we were told. As a matter of fact, the Smith-Connally Act simply streamlined strikes. It set out the rules by which strikes were to be brought about, the laws by which they were to be governed. Then there came the contest over the soldier's vote. The liberals of America favored giving our boys in the service the right to vote a Federal ballot. This was fought by the reactionaries to the last ditch. This descended to the level of a political fight to prevent the boys in the service voting for the man they wanted elected to the Presidency. One reactionary said on the floor of the Senate if we could give them the assurance that a particular man would not be a candidate for President of the United States, that the service boys' vote bill would be passed in 30 minutes. The bill was passed through the efforts of the liberal elements of the Senate, and became a law. However, it had been so emasculated that it was of little use, and in fact only about 80,000 Federal ballots were cast in the United States. The same elements fought the preparation of the United States for defense against its enemies. They fought lend-lease legislation. They fought the minimum-wage bill. They fought legislation for full employment. They fought a continuation of the OPA. They fought for the passage of the Case antilabor bill. They fought to repeal the Norris-LaGuardia Act. Recently there was introduced in the Senate a proposed amendment to the Constitution for the avowed purpose of removing from the Supreme Court of the United States certain judges who are believed by the reactionaries to be too liberal.

In order that you might have some idea of the determination of the reactionary forces in this Nation to wipe out the gains of labor for the past 10 years, I might tell you that in the midst of the Case bill fight, one of it most active proponents, a United States Senator, said to me, "I am trying to break the labor unions." I am going to read you a few communications I have had from your neighbors in this county. From this county I received a letter dated February 18, 1946, in which the following language appears:

"I am just an ordinary person whose ire is provoked by the crippling utility strikes we have just seen in Philadelphia, New York, and Pittsburgh. Now a communications tie-up is impending. It is a tragic blot on our civilization that a few reckless and unprincipled union bosses can throw great groups of people into chaotic tangles at will. Strikes against the people must stop. You have the power to stop them if you will enact some lawful strike-prevention measure."

On May 6, 1946, I received a letter from this county, in which the following language appears:

"This report ought to make pleasant reading for you and the CIO, whom you represent, to say nothing of hot-air Bowles.

"The operations of business under the direction of CIO dictation are tending to the insolvency of all American companies, and we have taken the first step, as you will observe from this report. This ought to please you greatly, as you have made a good start with a corporation in your own State, toward destroying business in this country, which ought to be highly gratifying."

On May 8, I replied in part as follows:

"You say, 'This report ought to make pleasant reading for you and the CIO, whom you represent.' I am anxious to know whether you think that those citizens of Delaware who belong to the CIO and other labor organizations are entitled to be represented in Congress, or do you think that representation should be confined to certain classes of our citizens who do not belong to labor organizations?

"I should have been very much pleased had you told me what it is that I have done toward destroying business in this country.

"When I first read your letter, I was impressed with the evident intent on your part to be personally offensive. I shall let that pass as I don't know the state of your health nor the rules which ordinarily govern your contact with other citizens."

On February 27, I received a letter from a man in our State which was in the following language:

"After watching the behavior of the United States Senate toward two labor bills now before it—the Case bill and the bill to curb James C. Petrillo—I come to the conclusion that it is just plain craven, that it cringes every time organized labor says 'boo.'

"Perhaps it ought to be reconstituted—revitalized with new blood of the kind that makes up the House, which has certainly done its plain duty in the case of both of these measures."

To it I replied on February 28 in the following language:

"I am heartily in agreement with your suggestion that the United States Senate should have new blood. I am not sure but what this could easily result in an improvement in many States.

"I thank you for your suggestion."

On March 21, there was sent out by an organization in this State to some of its members, the following language:

"Attached is a copy of a communication I addressed to Senator TUNNELL concerning the Pepper bill.

"It is requested that you write Senator TUNNELL your views on the same.

"The bill raises the minimum wage to 65 cents (62½-percent increase) per hour during first 2 years of operation, and to 75 cents (87½ percent) after 4 years. Time and one-half for everything after 40 hours per week.

"One immediate result would be the throwing out of work of thousands of marginal workers—youth, aged, slightly physically handicapped, and especially women.

"There would be bound to be a more careful screening of workers.

"Don't take the attitude, 'Oh, it won't affect me.' If one segment of our retail and whosalesale trade must pay these wages, it won't be long before everyone in business will have demands made on them for the same wage and workweek (40 hours).

"Will you kindly send us a copy of your communication for our files?"

This letter was written with reference to the minimum wage bill. This organization sent out statements in which it is admitted that the average rate paid to New Castle employees in the industries in the Wilmington area on March 1, 1946, was 73.8 cents per hour to unskilled employees, and that the average rate paid to skilled labor by the manufacturing industries in the Wilmington area on March 1, 1946, was 95.6 cents per hour. Yet this same organization was propagandizing its members against the payment of a 65-cent minimum wage bill on the ground that if one segment of the retail and wholesale trade must pay these wages it won't be long before everyone in business will have demands made on them for the same wage and workweek, 40 hours. I received with reference to this statement that was sent out by the Wilmington organization a statement from another of its members that if I cared to read this letter again I would find that there is no opposition expressed in this letter to the minimum wage. If the request to its members to write me because of the thought that everyone in business would have demands made on them for at least 65 cents an hour and a workweek of 40 hours is not in opposition, I don't know what opposition is. I will read you a copy of a letter that was sent to several Senators who favored the Case bill, and to President Truman, in the following language:

"I have read with considerable satisfaction your review and analysis of the so-called Case bill, H. R. 4908. It was gratifying to know that we still have in our Government people who are ready to put the interests of the public ahead of the selfish leaders of such groups as some of the labor unions. Many of us regret that the Senator from Delaware, Mr. JAMES M. TUNNELL, continues to attempt to further his own political interests by promoting the interests of such selfish leaders and groups. Perhaps in the next election he may find that their support will not be as valuable as he anticipated."

You will see that this person makes a scarcely concealed threat to attack me at the election because, as he says, I am promoting the interests of such selfish leaders and groups as some of the labor unions. I have received hundreds of letters and communications which show the hostility to labor which has been aroused in America.

In a column of one of the Wilmington papers, dated June 16, 1946, I find the following language:

"Leaders are well aware that the labor organizations have endorsed or approved the work of Senator JAMES M. TUNNELL and Representative PHILIP A. TRAYNOR, and are going to work assiduously in their behalf, but feel the thousands of other dissatisfied voters will offset labor's activities."

On June 22, 1946, I find an editorial in one of the Wilmington papers, in which the following paragraph is used:

"The Hobbs bill, let it be said, is not aimed at all union labor or designed to deprive labor of any of its social gains. All it does is to provide heavy penalties, including imprisonment and fines, for interference 'by robbery or extortion' or threats of violence with the movement of goods in interstate commerce It was inspired by the fact that certain unions, most of them in New York, have been forcing truckers from nonunion areas to employ a union driver before being permitted to deliver their goods in the city's markets—a custom which has resulted in both rioting and bloodshed."

The editor did not state why the Governor of New York, or his attorney general, is unable to enforce the State laws of New York. I know of no one who argues that robbery or extortion is permissible, or should go unpunished. I know of no reason why the government of New York has permitted these crimes to go unpunished. Have political conditions there reached the point where the law-enforcement officers cannot or dare not enforce the law against criminal acts? I know of no reason why the United States should be compelled to perform police duty for the State of New York.

During the present week, there was passed a bill in the Senate which provided for the return of the unemployment services to the States. The reactionary element in the Senate attempted to amend this bill in a manner which would have prevented the functioning of these organizations in the States where the State authorities were not obeying the law, or the legal regulations by the Secretary of Labor. This would not only have thrown out of employment the officers of the employment organization, but it would have left the returning soldier and the unemployed generally with no employment organization with which to consult, or from which to receive aid in the way of employment information.

The favorite method of the antilabor group, whether it is by speeches, broadcasts, columnists, or political mouthpieces, is to attack a particular segment of those they oppose. Sometimes this opposition is to CIO. Sometimes it is to AFL. Sometimes it is to the brotherhoods. Sometimes it is to labor generally. Sometimes the farmer is coupled with one or more of these groups in the opposition expressed. I think it would be well for those who are interested in labor to realize that this hatred of the antilabor groups in America is not to any particular group, except for strategic purposes. It includes not only the leaders of labor organizations. It includes the individuals of labor organizations. It includes not only a particular labor organization, but all labor organizations. It includes not only labor organizations but labor itself. It includes not only labor in the sense that it is ordinarily understood, but it includes the farmer, the white-collar class, the small businessman, and I want to remind you that your opponents are powerful in their organizations. I sometimes receive letters expressing the belief that all the difficulty arises because labor leaders have gotten labor under their control. Many crocodile tears are being shed for the relief of labor unions from the domination of their leaders. I have received hundreds of communications from all over the United States. Nearly all of them assure me that they are not antilabor. They are simply against permitting labor to organize, to strike, or to take any steps to increase their wages. I have received communications from all over the United States expressing antilabor sentiments, and in practically identical language, no matter from what point the letter was mailed. I have found a unanimity of purpose and methods by antilabor advocates, no matter where they may live. The effort to arouse antagonism to labor has been apparent in thinly settled and agricultural sections of the country. The Case bill had its origin in South Dakota. The strongest advocates of antilabor legislation come from the Middle West. I remind you that the liberals of the Middle West have been displaced by the reactionaries. They have taken the places of such liberals as Senator Norris and dozens of others. There is no use for me to tell you that in the main the same men vote for every piece of antilabor legislation that is introduced. It is noticeable that no expense is being spared in the attempt to divide labor and to cause one element of labor to antagonize another. No matter how little significance a proposed antilabor bill may have, it has the spontaneous backing of every antilabor organization and individual in the United States. These antilabor representatives are in the main against any FEPC legislation. They are in the main jealous of any attempt at Federal regulation of poll taxes. The same Senators, the same Representatives, the same lobbyists hasten to their posts. The Minute Men of the Revolution were never more loyal to their standards or more fixed in their hatreds than are these men. America cannot permanently prosper on the hatred of any one class by another. Whether we realize it or not, labor, capital, and consumer are, and must be, united for the benefit of our children's children. For the highest good of America there must be every effort made to eliminate discriminations because of race, color, or creed. These persons who for political or economic reasons attempt to draw an iron curtain between the man who labors with his hands and the man who labors in management must not be permitted to succeed. The grandchildren of the laborer become the employers of the next generation. Frequently the grandchild of the employer becomes the laborer of his generation. A united America today means a happy, contented America tomorrow. In the meantime, your rights must be defended. Your opposition is threatening you and those who dare to defend your rights. They are belligerent, determined, financially strong. They threaten you and those who dare to recognize your rights with political reprisals. What are you going to do about it? You have equal rights at the ballot box. You have greater might at the ballot box. Again, I say, What are you going to do about it? Your future, your children's future, your country's future will depend upon your answer.

Shortage of Building Materials

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, that there is a critical shortage of bricks and other building materials in all parts of the country is common knowledge, but the shortage of brick in North Dakota and other Midwestern States appears to be more acute than in some other localities. The Midwest Lumber Co., of my State, informs me that many of their 38 retail yards have not had a brick in the place for months. These dealers could secure brick from manufacturers in Canada for immediate delivery but for the fact that the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, requires brick imported into the United States be stamped showing the country of origin. The brick now available in Canada is not stamped as required by this provision of law.

The legal departments of the Bureau of Customs, the National Housing Administration and the Civilian Production Administration have canvassed all possibilities of meeting the legal obstacles in obtaining this brick by administrative order. They have come to the conclusion that the only way the requirement for the stamping of brick imported into this country may be suspended is by act of Congress.

The necessity for action by the Congress is portrayed in a telegram received by me from Mr. Lee H. Piper, president of the Midwest Lumber Co., Minot, N. Dak., as follows:

Brick producers in United States supplying this area are from 6 to 8 months behind on shipments and are not accepting additional orders for future shipment. In addition to the 17 cars we have coming to take care of new housing and repairs on old housing other northwest dealers have placed orders for many cars. The Winnipeg manufacture has brick not bearing "made in Canada" stamp for immediate shipment. It will take at least 30 to 60 days for them to change molds produce brick with required stamp. Urge necessary legislative action temporarily waiving regulation as bricks are urgently needed.

I have, therefore, introduced a joint resolution today providing that section 304 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended—requiring the marking of imported articles—is hereby suspended until January 1, 1947, as to any brick which may be imported to the United States from Canada which is dutiable under paragraph 201 (b) of such act.

I urgently request favorable consideration of this joint resolution by this House without delay, in order that the veterans housing and other building programs in North Dakota may not be completely stymied for the lack of brick.

Regulation of Consumer Credit

REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the time has come when every Member of the Congress should be fully apprised of the growing wave of opposition among banks, businessmen, veterans, and other consumers to any further continuation of regulation W, a war-born regulation of consumer credit. There is a great volume of convincing evidence from businessmen all over the country that the continuation of these credit controls, now that the war is over, is an unnecessary expense to the taxpayers and an obstacle to the reconversion program.

The regulation was issued as a wartime Executive order as part of the Government's anti-inflation program. Its purpose was to dampen consumer buying in wartime markets where goods were dwindling or scarce, and where excessive purchasing power would exert upward pressure on price levels. President Roosevelt set up the regulation under a section of the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1918 which gives the President of the United States the discretionary right to regulate credit during a war emergency period. He directed that the regulation be administered by the Federal Reserve Board, an assignment which, I am told, the Board did not welcome at all but fell to the task with patriotic fervor and resolution. Indeed, I want to make it crystal clear that my remarks here today are not to be construed as reflecting anything but commendation on the manner in which the Federal Reserve Board has administered the regulation—a regimentation of free enterprise that has no place in a peacetime economy.

The regulation may have served its purpose in the beginning. But it must be remembered that regulation W was the first of the wartime economic controls. It was set up to prevent frenzied, competitive buying of the dwindling output of durable consumer goods, prior to the imposition of price controls through OPA.

Indeed, we have reached the stage in our postwar economic development where business is yelling loudest for an unshackled chance to meet its responsibilities and to make the fullest possible contribution. No automobile maker, no manufacturer of radios, refrigerators, household appliances, and other consumer durable goods can remotely hope to reach and maintain high-level production without the benefit of sound consumer credit at the selling—the consumer—end. Where is the family today that would buy a new car, new radio, new furnace, or other household appliance or equipment if it had to lay hard cash on the barrel head to make the purchases? Where is the manufacturer of such articles who could plan a full production and full employment program if he had to have cash only for his product. He does not exist. He could not exist, in a free-enterprise economy in which sound consumer credit is as integral a part as money itself.

We are mighty proud, and justifiably so, of our manufacturing prowess and ingenuity during the war. We produced staggering amounts of war materials from assembly lines that were mastered and handled by men who had far more know-how than the workers of any other nation on earth. All those goods were bought by Government. And how did Government buy them? It bought them on the consumer-credit plan—out of income.

We must not forget that the workers who turned out bombers, fighters, guns, tanks, and other war equipment in lightning fashion had learned the know-how by mass-producing prewar civilian goods to meet vast markets that were made possible through consumer credit. When I say that consumer credit has made an immeasurable contribution to our way of life, that without credit our average standard of living would be way below its present comparatively high level, I am stating an indisputable fact. And I am likewise factual when I say that there is just not enough consumer cash, either in savings banks or War bonds, to buy the consumer goods that must be sold if we are to keep our factories humming and our people employed.

Regulation W is an unnecessary harassment of countless thousands of businessmen today, small businessmen and big businessmen. Our manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers are faced with the greatest selling job in American history. We must keep in mind always that every car made, every radio, cooking range, and other items of durable goods manufactured must be sold if we are to avoid glutted store shelves, disastrous price declines and black depression.

We are drumming into the minds of American businessmen today that they are faced with their greatest responsibility and opportunity. "If you do not produce and sell the goods, the democratic jig is up," we are telling them in effect.

And we are right in so telling them. But I ask you, are we not being ridiculously inconsistent in shackling those businessmen with a regulation, the purpose of which is to hamstring them in their essential task of getting goods sold over the Nation's counters and into the consumer's hands?

The argument has been advanced by spokesmen for the Federal Reserve Board that the regulation is essential in the Government's fight against mounting inflation. This to me is specious argument. Surely, it merits the closest scrutiny from every Member of this Congress who realizes the urgency of getting our country back on its economic feet in the quickest possible time. In comparison with the inflationary pressures of the national debt, the huge bank deposits, and the expanded mortgage lending field, the Federal regulation of consumer credit is insignificant. Indeed, this regulation W is a threat to the Government itself because it encourages purchasers of war bonds to cash them and spend bank savings rather than paying out of income.

To me it is inconsistent for our Government, on the one hand to spend vast sums of money and vast amounts of time and energy in indoctrinating the people in the wisdom of buying and keeping savings bonds, and, on the other hand, blandly ignore this war-born regulation that encourages bond redemption and savings account withdrawals.

The regulation discriminates against the little fellow. The consumer with the fat pocketbook who can plunk cash down for what he needs is not bothered by regulation W. He has spendable cash to finance his purchases. But millions of little people have not. We must not be misled by statistics showing record savings held by the American people today.

In this connection, let me quote from an article by Ned Brooks, Scripps-Howard staff writer, that appeared in the Washington Daily News and other Scripps-Howard newspapers:

> The most recent Government survey minimizes the effect of accumulated war savings on consumer buying and prices and emphasizes that prosperity still will depend on high current income.
> About $80,000,000 of liquid assets—Government bonds and bank deposits—is held by American families but this is concentrated in the hands of such a relatively small part of the population that it will have little effect on maintaining consumer markets, the study disclosed.
>
> The survey was conducted by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics at the request of the Federal Reserve Board.
> It revealed that the top 10 percent of income units—families in most cases—hold 60 percent of the $80,000,000 of savings, with the lower 50 percent holding less than 3 percent of this wealth.
>
> The sampling disclosed that only 10 percent of Government bondholders and 25 percent of families with bank savings expect to draw on these assets this year.
> "Most people," the report continued, "regard liquid assets as earmarked for long-range purposes. Therefore, they intend to finance most of their planned expenditures, including those for durable goods and homes, out of current income or borrowing."

The regulation discriminates against the veteran who must readjust himself to civilian life often under straitened circumstances. Its effect on the veteran is ridiculous. And it confuses him. We set up the GI bill of rights to help the veteran in his readjustment. We provide the machinery whereby he can borrow money to go into business, buy a farm, or a home. The home the veteran buys under the GI bill can cost as much as $10,000. He makes no down payment and has as long as 20 years to pay. But when the veteran tries to buy furniture for that home, a refrigerator or kitchen range or washing machine, and so forth, he runs smack up against a regulation that hampers his readjustment. If he wants to buy a bed to sleep in, he must put up 20 percent of the price in cash and pay the remainder by regular installments within a year. If he buys a kitchen range he must put up 33 percent in cash.

There are numerous cases on the record of veterans being unable to purchase a home because they could not obtain the same liberal credit in furnishing the home as in the purchase of it. Of course, we all want to own a home, but what is home without a stove or a bed or furniture?

One State—the great Commonwealth of New Jersey—has done something about this gross inequity the veteran suffers under regulation W. New Jersey has taken the bit in its teeth and enacted legislation which throws the Federal Reserve Board's regulation W out the window, as far as the veteran in that State is concerned. In New Jersey the veteran can buy what he needs to furnish his house and pay for it, out of income, on terms that he can meet. These terms are in absolute contravention of regulation W, and that fact is tacitly admitted by Federal Reserve Board officials who, incongruously, say they will do nothing to alleviate present conditions for veterans of 47 other States.

Now, let us go to another phase: The regulation is circumvented by borrowers through subterfuge and evasion. The prospective buyer of consumer durables soon learns to disguise his intention when seeking a bank loan to finance the purchase. Instead he borrows the money on the pretense of paying doctor or hospital bills, for which purpose the regulation permits more liberal credit terms. As a result, bank records today may not reflect the real use to which consumers are putting borrowed money. It has been observed by one economist that if all the money borrowed from banks and finance companies since regulation W became operative was used in accordance with the expressed intent of the borrowers there would not be an unpaid doctor's or hospital bill in the country today.

Regulation W is a needless expense to thousands of financial institutions and tens of thousands of merchants throughout the country who must spend money and use hard-to-get help in administering the many rules and interpretations and procedures prescribed. These merchants are being required to comply with a regulation which by its very nature can only hamstring or otherwise interfere with the tremendous selling job they must do if our postwar economic program is to be fully developed.

The American manufacturer today is charged with the herculean task of filling a demand for merchandise that has been building up for 5 years. At his immediate doorstep there are some quick cash sales for the first products off his assembly lines. But experience has taught him that his business cannot survive on boom buying. He must be able to plan ahead and to gage his long-haul markets with reasonable accuracy. He must be free to cope with the problem of meeting these consumer needs which, he well knows, in themselves are not the gage of his market. There is a vast difference between needing and wanting something, and being able to buy it. It is the function of sound consumer credit to enable creditworthy consumers to buy what they need, to use it and to pay for it out of income as they use it. To curtail this use of credit, as regulation W today curtails it, is a disservice to American business, the consumer, and the veteran.

How long are we to tolerate the inequities of this unnecessary regulation? There is expectation in some quarters that the regulation will continue as long as the war emergency lasts. And how long will that be? Who is there to say?

The Federal Reserve Board itself is vague on the subject. We are told by a Board spokesman that the regulation will be continued in force as long as its anti-inflationary influence is needed. We are told that "at the right moment" the Board may use its discretionary powers to wipe out the regulation. And when will that right moment be? According to the Board spokesman, that time will come when industrial production has caught up with but does not surpass, demand. The identity of the economic genius who is to determine the crucial hour is not revealed. What never has been accomplished in the past seemingly is to be accomplished now. Our economic cycles are to be turned on and off like a faucet. Although the businessman and the American consumer need free, sound consumer credit if production is to meet demand, somehow or other he is expected to work the miracle despite the insuperable handicaps of regulation W.

The effect of this policy is easy to anticipate. The cash holder will be benefited and the credit user penalized in the beginning. Only when the cash buyer has spent himself dry will the millions of little fellows be permitted to buy what they need on credit terms within their ability to meet. The buyers with the cash will gobble up the first choice things off the assembly lines while the millions of families must hopefully stand by to await the "crucial hour" which some economist at the Federal Reserve Board decides is their time to buy. Among these millions who must wait while their cash-carrying neighbors buy are our veterans—the men and women who were making a subsistence wage in the armed forces while the cash buyers were saving for a spending spree from well-fattened pay envelopes.

Regulation W should be abolished now—today. It is my firm opinion that the Members of this Congress would do a great service to the veteran, to businessmen, and to their other constituents if they would look into the effect of this unnecessary regimentation of our economy. I think it would be highly proper and germane to our duties as national legislators to assign an already established committee of this House, or a specially appointed committee, to study this situation and to inquire from the Federal Reserve Board what, if anything, it proposes to do toward terminating this unnecessary and iniquitous regulation of needed sound consumer credit.

The Political Action Committee of the CIO

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address made by the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] over all Virginia radio stations on the night of Monday, June 24, 1946. This is an address which should command the attention of every American, and I hope by inserting it in the RECORD that it will be widely read.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As I announced last Monday, in my talk tonight I will describe the political system of the Political Action Committee of the CIO. This is a mighty political organization, the like of which has never before been experienced in America. It behooves all citizens to know and to understand the tactics and the purposes of the PAC. It was organized by the CIO to dominate the policies of the Government of the United States. It also seeks to control State and local elections and only recently claimed the credit for the nomination in a Democratic primary of a Governor of a southern State. It attempts to achieve its objectives by coercion and threats and by the promise of support to those who are willing to sell themselves to this organization, into political bondage.

The Political Action Committee is exempt from the Corrupt Practices Act, insofar as political expenditures are concerned. Its State organizations are not required to make itemized reports of their political expenditures. Being exempt, it can commit acts in violation of the Corrupt Practices Act and cannot be prosecuted. Other individuals or corporations who violate this law cannot only be heavily fined, but persons guilty can be imprisoned. This is one of many of the special privileges, under the law, enjoyed by this labor organization.

A CIO-supported candidate for the United States Senate, or for any other office, need have no worry about finances. This is taken care of out of the huge political fund of the PAC, but no itemized report need be made on slush-fund activities. On the other hand, under the Corrupt Practices Act a corporation is prohibited from making a political contribution.

The Political Action Committee of the CIO is organized in military fashion. Sidney Hillman, an exceedingly able but unscrupulous and ruthless man, is its supreme commander. He sits in New York and issues orders to his cohorts working in every nook and corner of America. His financial resources are enormous. He makes no accounting and fears no prosecution because of his exemption from the Corrupt Practices Act. He is the man behind the political gun of the CIO. He knows all the tricks of the game. Any candidate for public office who receives PAC support is expected to obey him or the orders of his associate labor bosses. Sidney Hillman is a hard master.

Hillman and his highly specialized and trained political henchmen are the stormtroopers of the CIO; the SS troopers who are always on the firing line to reward the faithful politician and to defeat the independent Congressman or Senator. In the States Hillman selects men who give an appearance of respectability as window dressing to his local campaigns. In Virginia he selected an ordained minister of the gospel and had him elected as president of the Virginia Political Action Committee. This gentleman has admitted he is on the pay roll of the PAC, yet uses the title of "reverend" in his CIO political activities.

Hillman is the spearhead for coordinated action against those he and other labor leaders seek to destroy. He determines the political strategy, and Murray, Lewis, Petrillo, Whitney, and Bridges throw behind him their great financial resources and their political manpower.

The PAC is not alined with any political party. In one district it supports a Republican and in another district a Democrat. In this effort to control the destinies of America the CIO, with a realistic sense, places first things first. If they are to succeed the leaders well know that first those Senators and Congressmen who have stood like a stone wall against CIO domination must be defeated.

In line with this policy, the National CIO Convention held in Atlantic City authorized Sidney Hillman to announce the names of 10 Senators whose elections occur this fall as being officially on the CIO purge list. My name led the list; so I am the No. 1 CIO purgee. Of these 10 Senators sentenced to political death by the PAC, 6 were Democrats and 4 Republicans. This emphasizes the PAC policy in recognizing no party affiliations. It is neither Democrat nor Republican. It votes and works CIO. Its political philosophy and purpose are to defeat anti-CIO Senators and to elect pro-CIO Senators, regardless of what party these Senators are affiliated with. The political effectiveness of such tactics is very obvious. In States or districts where the contest is close between the Democrats and Republicans the CIO, voting as a unit, often wields the balance of power and can elect one or other of the candidates at their pleasure. In a primary the same tactics are followed. From a standpoint of practical politics, this is the real secret of the great political power of the CIO which has enabled its leaders to intimidate important public officials.

As one who has observed the activities at close range, I cannot but have a feeling that unless the great mass of our citizens realize and are aroused to what the PAC is doing, and how they accomplish their objectives, we may wake up some morning and find that the dictatorship of labor leaders has been so firmly established that the people will be a long time in recovering control of their own government. America cannot tolerate a dictator even if elected by the people, and certainly we cannot tolerate a dictatorship of labor leaders who have no responsibility to the people and who are concerned only with the advancement of their own selfish interests. We must always be alert to the fundamental principle that our Republic was founded on the premise that here we have a government ruled by laws under the Constitution and not a government by men. It is this basic principle that protects America from what has occurred in totalitarian countries such as Germany under the dictatorship of one man.

Have we any assurance that the national strikes that paralyzed our country only a few days back will not be repeated? Can we live in the security that the leaders who called the steel strike, the railroad strike, and the coal strike will not do so again whenever the desire comes to them?

We can answer these questions best by reviewing the settlements made with those leaders who recently stopped the trains, the mines, and other essentials to our existence. If you examine the basis on which these strikes have been settled, you will find that in nearly every instance about 90 percent of the demands of the labor leaders were finally granted. This is also true of previous Nation-wide strikes.

In the case of the threatened strike of longshoremen and maritime workers most recently settled—and only settled, incidentally, until the first of next September—although our ship workers were receiving wages higher than those of any nation in the world—so high that the American ships cannot operate under the American flag in competition with other countries without subsidy—the requested increase of 30 percent in wages was granted, and the victory of Harry Bridges was nearly 100 percent.

The coal strike was settled practically on the basis of the demands of John Lewis, excepting that he did not get the privilege of spending the welfare fund of his union, as he chose, without supervision. This fund was reduced from 10 cents a ton, as requested by Lewis, to 5 cents a ton.

An aftermath of the concessions given John Lewis occurred last week when the OPA increased the cost of coal to the consumer by 40 cents a ton. This means that the cost to the American people will be not less than $240,000,000 annually in order to pay for the concessions the Government made to John Lewis.

The railroad strike was settled virtually on the terms of the union.

I cite this because the settlement of one strike does not in any sense mean that the same labor leaders will not soon call another strike. They have learned they can obtain their demands by calling Nation-wide strikes. I submit that such Government appeasement constitutes an invitation to continue the strike practice. As usual, it is the public that pays the bill.

It should be understood that in the two great strikes—the coal mines and the railroads—the terms of settlement were fixed not by the joint action of the employers and employees, but by the Federal Government. In the same manner the Government settled the threatened longshoremen and maritime strike.

So until the equality of rights of all citizens, corporations, and labor unions is written into law on a basis of justice to all, we can at any time expect new strikes that will again paralyze the activities of our people. The strikes we have had in recent months have greatly retarded reconversion from war to peace. They have cost America billions of dollars in the loss of essential production.

Let me again give my conception of those equal rights which must be written into law on a basis of justice to all by establishing standards to prevent and control future strikes.

First. Mutual responsibility by law must exist in labor contracts—responsibility on the part of the employer to pay and on the part of labor to perform.

Second. A union, like an employer, must be liable for civil damages, in the event of nonperformance of contracts or damage to property.

Third. Essential industries must be kept in continuous operation, even though it is necessary in vital utilities to induct the employees into the military service in order to prevent the collapse of an industry on which the Nation depends for its very existence, but such means should be employed only when the danger is great.

Fourth. The Corrupt Practices Act must be applied in politics against labor organizations as well as business corporations.

Fifth. Labor unions should be required to incorporate, to hold honest elections, and to account for their funds, and welfare funds, if mutually agreed to by the employer and employee, should be controlled jointly.

Sixth. Remove any and all special privileges that now exist under the law, for either labor or industry.

Seventh. Within these limitations of national welfare and equal responsibility, the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively should not be impaired.

This is the job ahead of the American people. Judging by recent events, it is no small task. It can be accomplished only by the united efforts of Americans everywhere—employers, citizens generally, and those union members, which I am convinced are legion, who want only just treatment. The veto of the Case bill has set this work back for many months. Only an aroused public demand will sustain another effort by Congress to correct existing conditions.

What exists in this country today is a monopoly of labor, just as firmly entrenched as any industrial monopoly that has existed in our history controlling a basic commodity. This monopoly is established by the system of the closed shop, whereby no man or woman can obtain work in a closed industry unless he or she is permitted to join the union. I have stated before, and I repeat it now, that I think a closed shop is undemocratic in a democratic country. I think the right to work is an inherent right in our democracy. This right to work should not be denied to any citizen, as can be done now by these great labor leaders who are determined to preserve the monopoly given them by the system of the closed shop. I believe that many laboring men are opposed to the principle of the closed shop.

Again, I emphasize that I shall do nothing as a Senator to disturb the legitimate rights of collective bargaining and will fight any effort to injure the just rights of the laboring man. I believe in unions, if properly operated, just as I believe in the corporate method of business operation, if properly conducted, but special privileges under the law must not be given to either. Hillman, Lewis, and Petrillo have done, and are doing, infinitely more harm to the millions of patriotic laboring men than the most violent opponent of labor unions could possibly accomplish.

Those elected to public office must realize that the future of our Republic depends upon refusal of special privileges to any group of our citizens when they use such privileges against the public interest.

Let me repeat that the greatest service that can be rendered the workingmen of America is to curb these reckless leaders who have abused their power and created a growing distrust and disapproval of all unions.

Peace between industry and labor would be a boon to America. Only full production in this country will enable us to pay our great national debt and finance our obligations to our people at home and perform our humanitarian commitments abroad.

Happily, there are some intelligent labor leaders who have become conscious of the fact that labor unions must have an equal responsibility with industry. On Monday President Emil Rieve of the textile workers union spoke some solid, good sense on the labor problem. He said labor unions must accept responsibility to employers and the general public; that they must make reports of their revenue and expenditures, and that he disagreed with union officials who demanded that health and welfare contributions from employers should be subject to exclusive union disposal.

I regard just legislation to attain peace between labor and industry as the gravest problem facing the American people at this moment. Believing this, I have devoted my first two radio speeches to presenting my platform with respect to labor legislation and my reasons therefor. I have done this without thought or concern as to the effect my statements may have on my candidacy in the pending campaign.

It is the obligation of every candidate for high public office in this dilemma that confronts us to speak in forthright fashion and offer such contribution as he can to preserve the future stability of our endangered Republic.

Living in One World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a commencement address I delivered on June 9, at the commencement exercises at Reed College, Portland, Oreg.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Odegard, distinguished guests, members of the graduating class, and friends: It is good to be home, if only for a day. I return with my head somewhat bloody but unbowed. When one speaks and acts upon the facts, he need not bow his head except when to utter a prayer that the public, upon reflection, following hysteria, will return to the teaching: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

At this time it is sufficient to say about the "battle royal" in which I have been embroiled recently that I have introduced a resolution in the Senate of the United States asking for an investigation of the evidence leading up to the settlement of the railroad strike on May 25, 1946, with all witnesses testifying under oath. That is my answer to high public officials and to political opponents who have sought to mislead the public about the facts of that historic day.

This very pleasant return to an academic atmosphere has made me somewhat homesick for my old profession today. For 20 years—rather for 21 years, to be exact—I was a member of the faculty of some university. Although I am a politician now, in spite of the fact that not even my severest critics have ever accused me of being very politic, I want to say that I know of no profession that pays richer dividends in public service than the academic profession. If and when—or as soon as—I am returned to private life, I shall be most happy to follow the profession of my first choice: teaching and practicing the law.

I am happy to congratulate the members of this graduating class and to welcome them into the opportunities of public service which should characterize the life of every citizen in the critical years ahead. I say that, because in my judgment that citizen who lives unto his own selfish economic interest alone and fails to place his primary obligation to the public welfare above all else is not likely to find very much happiness. Pleased as I am to congratulate the graduating class, nevertheless, I believe that congratulations are deserved even more by the members of the faculty of this school who once again, through the training of these graduates, have created great wealth and future leadership for their Nation. As the years go by these students will come to appreciate more and more the great lessons not only from the books but by example which they have learned from the members of this faculty.

I remember on my graduation day from college I was champing at the bit, so to speak, to get away from the campus and out from under faculty influences and controls; but I soon discovered as I bumped against some of the rough corners of life that many of the teachings of my college days, which I thought at the time were theoretical, were really bottomed in more practicality than I realized. I came to recognize that to teach successfully is to challenge; and to challenge the minds of youth to constructive thinking is a priceless art. You students have been challenged by such teachings, and I am inclined to believe that that preparation for life will serve you well because you are going to live in a world of challenges—a world that will call, on your part, for the personification of intellectual integrity and courageous devotion to realistic idealism.

May I say in passing that the social consciousness of any college—be it Reed College or any one of the other great schools of Oregon, or Harvard, or Oxford—can be no more dynamic and effective than the breadth of human understanding and integrity of intellectual purpose of the faculty administrative heads and students of that institution. The untrammeled search for and presentation of the truth is the motivation of the academic life. This torch of educational freedom must always burn brightly in every school in America, from grade school to graduate college, if American free education is to help light the way in dispelling the dark shadows of ignorance, bigotry, intolerance, blind nationalism, economic isolationism, revenge, and exploitation of human beings which today are jeopardizing the peace.

In selecting the subject for this commencement address I felt it particularly appropriate, in view of international conditions, to discuss some of our responsibilities as citizens in a one-world community. I think there is a great need for all people in America today to develop a better understanding of the urgency of international order.

Time is truly of the essence in meeting this urgency because if we as a Nation and as a people should respond too little and too late in meeting our obligations as citizens of a one world, history will pass us by. I do not mean that failure on our part to take advantage of the greatest opportunity that any nation has ever had in history to promote an international order of justice through law necessarily will result in our decline as a world power within the lifetime of those in this audience today. Nevertheless, we cannot be sure of even that time allotment in which to enjoy our national security in view of the rapidity of revolutionary adjustments taking place in this one world today.

I am pleased to note that most of our people are thinking about this problem, even including school children. The other night my 11-year-old daughter said to me, "Daddy, what's your answer to this one?" I knew at once that I was in for either a typical riddle or a catch-joke question in the vein of an 11-year-old's humor. I said, "Let's have it." "Well," she said, "the teacher asked Johnnie what he hoped to do when he grew up. Now, Daddy," she said, "what answer did he give for all boys and girls?" After a few wild guesses I said, "I give up." She said gleefully, "Johnnie's answer was, 'I hope to live.'" I submit that, in spite of her humor about it, Johnnie's answer, hopeful as it was, is very doubtful of fulfillment for millions upon millions of boys and girls the world around today unless you and I do all we can to bring order into this one-world community.

It is perfectly true that we as a nation are strong and that all other nations, comparatively speaking, are weak today. Thus we have some little time—but not too much—to clarify our thinking and demonstrate to the rest of the world that we can be counted upon to put into practice and join forces with other peace-loving nations in enforcing the tenets of human rights and justice through international order to which we pledged ourselves in the San Francisco Charter.

Idealistic, you say. Yes; but an idealistic realism that will not be ignored by the events of the future even should we ignore our obligations to the course of those events. The cold, hard, factual, inescapable reality is that in terms of history, modern science, and the struggle for freedom and a better way of life by millions of heretofore subjugated and exploited people in other parts of the world is producing a great world revolution. We need have no fear of it either from the standpoint of our standard of living, our culture, our private-property economy, or our form of political democracy, if we assume our rightful and duty-bound role of leadership in developing an international order which recognizes the fact that all men live today in a one-world community.

We do have much to fear from that revolution if we permit our present unmatched great strength and power—military, scientific, and economic—to lull us into a false sense of national security. We have much to fear if we permit a trend of blind nationalism and economic isolationism to cause us to revert to the same pattern of withdrawing from our world responsibilities which characterized our national policy for 20 years following the First World War. Any attempt on our part as a nation to escape from the world's realities such as we were guilty of after the last World War is likely to mark the beginning of our decline as a world power.

Will the San Francisco Charter prove to be a great emancipation proclamation freeing future generations from the scourge of war? The answer to that question depends upon the good faith of the signatories to the United Nations. It depends upon the United States, along with other nations, practicing as well as preaching the objectives of the San Francisco Charter. The American people are much, much too inclined to adopt a "holier than thou" attitude in international relations and assume that if any bad faith is ever practiced within the world of nations it is always practiced by nations other than the United States. From kindergarten through college American boys and girls are taught, and frequently falsely, that the international-relations record of the United States is simon pure and the epitome of the ideal of the brotherhood of men. Our histories gloss over the foreign-trade practices of the United States, our countenancing of the exploitation policies of sister nations against weaker nations, and our aiding and abetting those policies by entering into cartel and trade agreements which have been causal factors of war.

For years our statesmen preached international cooperation but practiced a blind national isolationism. It is true that even prior to the First World War, after armed conflict had developed between nations in South America or Asia or was threatened in other parts of the world, we did offer our good offices in an endeavor to promote a pacific settlement of such international disputes; but usually our offer came after economic interests in America had reaped great profits from the war preparations of other nations. As a wishful-thinking nation we have always been at a loss to understand why many nations of the world, particularly the weaker nations, have not been inclined to place the same face value, as we have been wont to do, upon our professions of brotherly love and devotion to the ideal of peace on earth, good will among men. We are hurt when we discover that many of the weaker nations do not think as well of us as we do of ourselves.

We refuse to admit it but the truth is that the people of other nations, great and small, but particularly the peoples of the weaker nations, are ever conscious of the fact that there is a marked difference between America's professed ideals and her practices. They are aware that imperialism and economic exploitation have not been solely monopolistic practices of Great Britain, Russia, France, Japan, Germany, and other great powers which, over the decades, have profited at the expense of the weaker nations. It is difficult for them to ignore the fact that prior to our entrance into the First World War we played ducks and drakes with neutrality, and the blood money of war-created great fortunes in America out of trade with nations who subsequently were to become both enemy and ally.

Although the interests of our national security were crystal clear long before we entered that war in 1917, after the die was cast we demonstrated the great strength of this Nation, once its moral principles and interests of self-preservation united in the determination of our people to winning the war. Throughout the holocaust there was no variance between the great ideals of the United States and the practices of our people. We poured out our blood, our resources, and our wealth in a heroic crusade to drive war from the face of the earth and to establish a parliament of man for the pacific settlement of international disputes. That chapter of American history will always deserve to be taught in a manner which will tingle the spine of every American boy and girl and instill in all Americans a just pride in the fight we made for the ideal of world peace.

But then something happened to the people of America. With the war won, they retreated from the ideals for which they fought the war, with the result that the peace was lost. Isolationism swept the country. Economic selfishness rather than national self-interest and international security became the objective of most Americans. The same causal forces of war were allowed to take root again, nourished by selfish economic interests, not only in America but in England, France, and other money-making countries. Economic interests were more desirous of making profit dollars out of selling materials of war than of promoting international economic adjustments based upon justice and fair play which could have prevented the forging of the chain of events which ultimately shackled the world and produced the throes of another war. The injustices of the Versailles Treaty, to which we were a party; the break-down of the League of Nations, for which we must assume our share of responsibility; the reversion to balance-of-power diplomacy, in which we played a part; the selling of a new war machine to Germany, Italy, and Japan, one of the greatest international crimes of all history, of which we are equally guilty with Great Britain and France, all contributed to the development of the power of the madman of Germany and the war lords of Japan.

Slowly, too slowly; late, almost too late, we as a people and as a Nation recovered from our nationalistic blindness and rallied once again around the true ideals of the American form of society. Once again we sacrificed great numbers of our best manhood, and expended billions of our wealth and great quantities of irreplaceable natural resources in the wastes of the world's most costly war. Unquestionably our final entrance into World War II saved the peoples of the world from being submerged in a world-wide reign of terror and tyranny devoid of any semblance of individual liberty and Christian ethics. A victorious Germany and Japan would have meant a new dark age for mankind—a dark age of mechanical perfection and human degradation. Paradoxically enough, the victory of the United Nations carries with it the danger of the atomic destruction of civilization itself if they permit the peace to be lost.

One fact about World War II stands out above all others, and that is the peoples of the world dare not permit the nations of the world to lose the peace made possible by the United Nations victory in this war. They dare not permit the losing of that peace, because, with the loss of that peace, entire national civilizations will literally disappear from the face of the earth in the next war, even if it were to be fought as soon as now, weakened as all nations are by the war struggle from which they have just emerged. Five years from now, 10 years from now, 15 years from now the potential results—yes; the inevitable results—of World War III will be too awful to contemplate. Maybe some one nation or combination of nations could emerge victorious from such a war, but it is more probable that such a war will end without its victors. One thing is more than reasonably certain and that is that the Americans who will die in World War III will not be only our brave sons fighting for our national security on battlefields in foreign lands, but men, women, and children of all ages and in all parts of our land will die by the millions if that war of electronics and atom bombing ever lets forth its scourges.

Shall we lose the peace? If we Americans were to think only of saving our own skins, we cannot afford to lose the peace. Yet one hears today the suggestion that we cannot afford to sacrifice too much to win the peace. How much is too much? Is practicing the ideals and objectives of the Atlantic and San Francisco Charters too much? Is feeding the starving people of both liberated and formerly enemy nations too high a price to pay for peace? Can we afford to permit the hate which is being transmitted into the blood stream of suffering millions of peoples in many countries of the world to build up a war psychosis which will produce a war madness 15, 20, 25 years from now just because some demagogs in America are preaching today that world cooperation in the application of humanitarian principles is costing the American taxpayer too much?

The best way we could implement the great military victory we have won, the most realistic way we could vitalize the objectives of the United Nations, the most understandable demonstration of democracy in action which we could give to the starving peoples of Europe and elsewhere in the world would be to open our larder of food in America and feed them. Feed them before it is too late; before it is too late, not only to save present lives which are about to be extinguished for lack of food, medicine, clothing, and shelter, but also before it is too late to prevent poisoning the blood stream of the future generations of those people with hatred toward America. We appealed to the people in the enemy countries during the war to lay down their arms in return for just treatment. We similarly propagandized the now liberated countries with leaflets from the air, by which we promised them not only food, but justice if they would hold out against Nazi terriorism until our conquering armies arrived. If we now forget to make good on those promises, if we take the attitude that now the war is over we have no further responsibilities toward those peoples, we will surely lose the peace. Part of the price of this peace is to help rehabilitate war-torn nations.

I am not talking only about responsibilities to other nations, but I am talking about responsibilities to other peoples; for in this new era of a one world we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that the good faith of nations is going to be judged by the people of the rest of the world. We are being judged today by the people of many nations of the world, and there is no denying the fact that the differences between our humanitarian professions and our practices are subjecting us to world-wide criticism. Take, for example, the stalling, of which Congress in its last session was guilty, in appropriating money for UNRRA. Those politicians in the Congress who were responsible for that stalling have much to answer for, not only to their own consciences, if they have any, but to the American people and to the future generations of Americans who may suffer directly and indirectly from the ill will that has been created by the delay in sharing our abundance of food with the world's hungry.

This is not the only example of stalling on the part of our politicians. In fact the political strategy of today appears to be one of stalling, of ducking and weaving, playing up to the prejudices and misinformation of our people rather than exercising leadership on great issues and going before our people with the facts in regard to the new world order into which the developments of the world have catapulted us and from which there can be no retreat. Too many of our politicians give clear evidence of being willing to capitalize upon the wishful thinking of our people rather than assume the risks of statemanship. They appear to be unwilling to inform our people that if we are to have world peace we must have economic stability on an international plane; that if we are to have world peace we must be willing to assume our full share of responsibility for enforcing the objectives of the San Francisco Charter; that if we are to have world peace we must interest ourselves in such things as the stabilization of international currency, rebuilding of a war-torn world, providing loans to nations who have no way of lifting themselves by their bootstraps, advancing the interests of weaker and subjugated peoples who are striving for the benefits of freedom and self-determination, and insisting upon the application of pacific procedures for the settlement of all international disputes, irrespective of their nature or source and without discrimination as to the nations involved. No other foreign policy on the part of our Nation will result in permanent peace, and our generation cannot justify shunting to the generation of our grandchildren the responsibility of paying for the peace which we have within our power to contribute to civilization if we of this generation are willing to pay the price.

I am firmly convinced that the best interests of America call for the making of whatever immediate seemingly economic sacrifices we may have to make as a Nation to implement the United Nations. Whatever the price, it would be cheap indeed compared with the cost of war which is certain to follow if we as a Nation break away from the objectives of the San Francisco Charter.

But someone asks, "Suppose some other nation or nations fail to live up to the spirit and objectives of this new world order? Will not our people then have sacrificed in vain?" Not at all, because in such an event our only hope of survival will be that our demonstration of good faith in international relations will have bound to us such a preponderant majority of the nations and peoples of the world as to serve due notice on any nation which seeks to follow an aggressor's course of action that it faces the opposition of a united world of peace-loving nations. The fear held by many Americans and encouraged by some politicians that participation by the United States in such international programs as Bretton Woods, reciprocal trade agreements, rehabilitation loans or grants, and the fulfilling of our obligations under the United Nations, will result in a lower standard of living in America, ignores the fact that our standard of living is bound to suffer if economic depression and instability characterizes the economy of other nations of the world. On the other hand, only by means of a rising standard of living in other countries of the world can we hope to improve and raise, to the ultimate level that it is capable of attaining, the American standard of living. In other words, our people must be led to see that economic isolationism for America is just as unhealthy for our economic well-being and national security as was the policy of isolationism in the sphere of world politics during the two decades preceding each of the two world wars.

The winning of the war in 1945 gave to the United States history's greatest opportunity to demonstrate in 1946 the strength of a representative government of free people in leading the world in the establishment of permanent peace. The destiny of our Nation in the history of time will be determined in a very large measure by the world statesmanship manifested by both our national leaders and our people during 1946. It is a year of decision which calls for self-sacrificing statesmen and not prejudice-responding politicians in the seats of government.

The peoples of the world are on the march. They will march on with or without us. Time is in our favor but time will run against us if we seek to live unto ourselves alone, if we muff this historical chance to exercise the needed leadership in meeting the urgency of international order.

I always like to test the advantages and disadvantages of any given program by taking a look at its alternatives. In my judgment the choice between our exercising leadership in the development of an international order, which effectuates the tenets of the San Francisco Charter, and reverting to our old foreign policy of nationalism based upon balance-of-power diplomacy is crystal clear. We must either help develop an international order or prepare for a Third World War.

If we listen now to those who are advocating that we follow a national course of economic selfishness and a foreign policy of economic isolationism we run the grave danger of having our grandchildren face an alinement of peoples of the world determined to check our power. Does anyone question that if such an alternative should become the course of history, war would not result? These are days when we must think ahead in terms of probable historical events and developments in all spheres of human relations for the next quarter, half, and full century. We owe it not only to ourselves, not only to our children and theirs and theirs but we owe it to this great Christian and political ideal we call America to subordinate our temporary, selfish, personal, economic interests to the greater long-time general welfare of our people and of our country. The sorry fact is that tonight all over America greed, personal self-interest and inconsideration for moral obligations to others are stalking this land. The resulting confusion is being seized upon by those who are ambitious for political and economic power.

However, I am confident that the great majority of the American people are aware of the fact that the world is in flux and that our national security must not be jeopardized by allowing the economic self-interests of the individual to be placed ahead of our economic responsibilities to the peace.

We cannot afford to minimize the difficult task ahead in keeping public opinion enlightened as to the obligations of the individual citizen to his living in a one-world community. It is a tremendous adjustment for each one of us to have to make these days as we find ourselves catapulted into world citizenship. We didn't ask for it; we didn't want it; but the course of human events thrust it upon us. We really have no choice in the matter. Protest as some do against it, the fact is that man, by the exercise of his God-given intelligence, has created a civilization so dynamic in its scientific power that it no longer can be confined to nationalistic compartments.

Old and narrow conceptions of national sovereignty, spheres of influence, trade barriers, colonial prerogatives, imperialistic exploitation of natural resources belonging to others, are all tottering and tumbling in the new one world of the atomic age. It is a world that offers mankind a civilization so far in advance of the one from which we are just beginning to emerge that any attempt to discuss its potentialities subjects one to the suspicion by others that he is a little queer.

Yet, spend an evening with the scientists on any campus, and they will tell you almost unbelievable things which they already know about the potentialities of this new world. Potentialities so inspiring in nature, so full of hope and possibility for a better and fuller life for people all over the world, that one's lips intuitively phrase a prayer that the peoples of the world and their leaders will have the vision and good sense to meet the urgent need for an international order that will settle by peaceful means the many problems of human relations that the atomic age is creating.

We are so close to the great change which has taken place in the history of mankind that few people have even begun to realize that the world of June 3, 1946, is as much different from the world as recently as August 5, 1945, as the depths of the Dark Ages differed from the heights of the industrial age. For accuracy's sake, perhaps we should take July 16 when the first atomic bomb was exploded at the Alamogordo Air Base in New Mexico, rather than August 6 when the bomb was dropped over Hiroshima, as the beginning of the new atomic era.

But the point to be remembered is that never again will the people of the world live in a world divided by nations, continents, and expanses of water and barriers of mountains and desert. Henceforth people will live, if they are to live at all, in a world of united nations composed of the same continents of land and oceans of water but made tiny in terms of time space, resulting from the new era of science. It is difficult to think of any sphere of human relations that isn't going to be greatly affected by the impact of the atomic era.

It should be obvious to all that if we are going to have a workable international order, the nations cooperating together must solve the problem of international control of the atomic bomb. If any one nation, including our own, is permitted to go its independent way in the manufacture of atomic bombs, world peace will be but a temporary period during which other nations race with time in preparation for atomic warfare.

We need to remember that although we know that we would never use our atomic bomb power in an act of aggression against another nation, it is not to be expected that other nations will feel comfortable and secure so long as we possess such a great power over them. We need to remember that although we know that we are a people who are devoted to the ideal of world peace and that we are a Nation which will never wage war until war is thrust upon us, nevertheless it is not to be expected that other peoples will not hold us in fear when they observe our tremendous war-making power should we decide to exercise it.

Human nature is about the same the world around, and to illustrate the point I would ask how many in this audience would be particularly comfortable if they knew that any one of several world powers were manufacturing atomic bombs today? How many would feel comfortable if Germany should revive itself sufficiently within 10 years to produce in secret the atomic bomb?

I consider the international control of the manufacture of atomic bombs one of the most important first steps that must be taken in the development of an international order if there is to be any hope of preserving world peace. The McMahon bill, which passed the Senate last Saturday provides a very adequate solution to the regulation of research in the field of atomic energy in this country. It represents a statesmanlike compromise of the conflicting views of the military, the scientists, and various groups in the Congress. It protects a principle of vital importance to the freedom of all of us in this country, namely, civilian control of research and manufacture in the field of atomic energy. It leaves the military only with the right to advise the President of the relationship to national security of any proposed research or productive development in the field of atomic energy.

However, in addition to the McMahon bill, there is need for action on the international level for control of the manufacture of atomic bombs and the use of atomic energy as a weapon for making war. In furtherance of that end I have been pleased to join with Senator MITCHELL, of Washington, Senator KILGORE, of West Virginia, and Senator FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, in introducing Senate Resolution 255, which seeks to establish international control of atomic bombs.

Another specific proposal which I think is essential if we are to meet the urgency of an international order is a resolution which I introduced in July 1945, at the time of the debates on the San Francisco Charter, proposing that the Senate of the United States adopt a resolution authorizing the President of the United States to declare our acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court for the settlement of international disputes in which we may be a party. As I have pointed out in debates on this subject, the United States and Russia are the only two great world powers which to date have refused to accept compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court.

I repeat what I have said in the Senate: The hour is historic, the obligation sacred, the challenge great. We have a great opportunity to forge a mighty pattern of international controls based upon justice by accepting the jurisdiction of the World Court now.

In closing I would emphasize the responsibility of our schools in enlightening our people as to the urgency of international order. I believe that if the people of our country are to keep abreast of the changes that will be necessary in our ways of political, social, and economic life, our educational institutions, particularly in the field of social science—from the grade school through college—will have to make a great many important adjustments in methods, curricula, and educational objectives. Possibly our educators can take a tip from that recruiting slogan of the Navy, Join the Navy and see the World. Our schools will perform a great service in meeting the urgency for an international order if we can say to our children, "Go to school and understand the world."

Bringing the enlightenment of world understanding to the other peoples of the world through education is going to be one of the major responsibilities of our leadership in developing the international order which living in a one-world community has thrust upon us. Our anthropological forebears never were faced with a greater test of survival than the urgency of developing an international order presents to us. It is a view of mine that we must think of a development of an international order which is composed of individuals as well as of nations.

I do not share the view of those who seem to think that the time has come for the setting up of a world government in relation to which the individual person is primary and the state of which he is a national is secondary. Rather, I think we must proceed to perfect the United Nations Organization as created by the great proclamation of human rights—the San Francisco Charter. The preamble of that Charter should become as common knowledge to American school children as the Declaration of Independence, the Preamble of the American Constitution, the American Bill of Rights, and the Gettysburg Address. It is a great emancipation proclamation pointing the way to world freedom from the scourge of war.

We must all agree that its combination of language and style is a literary masterpiece. Can we afford to let it be nothing more than just a masterly expression of great human ideals and hopes? I would suggest that every great document which has expressed the hopes, ambitions, and ideals of people for a better way of life and for a greater degree of liberty and freedom, was at the time of its forging naught but an expression of the determination of aroused people to translate the idealism of each such document into the realism of its objectives.

Thus by determined action and steady progress, with occasional temporary setbacks, our people have given the meaning of reality to the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution with its Bill of Rights, the Emancipation Proclamation, the Gettysburg Address, and every other great expression setting forth our national objectives of freedom and liberty and protection of the individual rights of our people. Our system of free education for 170 years has been the greatest source of strength for accomplishing our way of life. Our American system of freedom and individual liberty and our American form of government will not be weakened but rather strengthened by our schools assuming their great obligation to lead our young people into an understanding and knowledge of the one world in which they must live if they are to survive.

Nebraska's Share of the National Debt and of the British Loan

REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, calculated upon the basis of 1940 census figures, and utilizing the accepted figures of $2,000 for the share of each individual in the Nation in the Nation's debt and $28 for each individual in the Nation as his share in what will be taken from the Nation by the proposed British loan, Nebraskans must assume $2,631,668,000 as their share of the national debt and $36,843,352 as their share of the loss to this country through the British loan.

Broken down into counties, this means:

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the conclusions reached by President Truman as to the inadequacy of the price-control bill follow closely the views of a minority in the Banking and Currency Committee, Senators WAGNER, DOWNEY, TAYLOR, and MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD the full text of the minority views on price control, as printed in the committee report of June 7.

I ask unanimous consent also to have printed in the Appendix a letter from the wife of a serviceman showing what inflation will mean to the families of men in the service; and a circular sent to an Everett merchant by a New York firm, but addressed to the voters of my State, which contains a purported reprint from the Women's Wear Daily. This circular advises that I voted in committee to retain MAP, and suggests that I have voted fairly consistently against the special high-price interests of the women's apparel industry. I wish to make it clear for the RECORD that I presented amendments and voted in favor of price-control measures that would keep low-priced clothing on the market and protect the great mass of American consumers. In regard to this problem, I should like to cite section 2 of the minority views.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

The bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency writes the death sentence for effective price, wage, and rent stabilization in the United States. It is our considered judgment that adoption of the bill as reported would be as dangerous to the economic safety of this country as the immediate expiration of the existing laws.

The issue before the Congress is clear: Should the Government make a fight to the finish against inflation in the next 12 months or should it surrender unconditionally and entrust the Nation now to the operation of untrammeled economic forces?

There are many persons who sincerely believe that surrender is the wiser course. In our judgment, they heed neither the lessons of experience nor the dictates of economic law; but, however unwise, their position is at least forthright. They would not charge a governmental agency with the grave responsibility of protecting this country from inflation and then hamstring that very agency by amendments which could have no other effect than to compel it to allow prices to soar. They would not delude the people of this country into believing that their Government is in a position to protect them against rising living costs when in fact it would not be.

Production in this country has mounted to record levels for peacetime. It will take vast strides forward as the last of the major industrial disputes are settled. Employment in civilian enterprise is at an all-time peak. But manpower and materials shortages in particular commodities still prevent our great industrial potential from being fully realized. Moreover, as the stream of products flows from the factories it is rapidly absorbed by the almost insatiable demand for civilian goods. It will take 6 or 8 months for the greatest conceivable outpouring of goods to relax the tense inflationary pressures which now exist. It will take a year for the economy to achieve a general balance and even then, in the housing and perhaps a few other fields, scarcities must still be expected.

The demand for consumer and industrial goods today is backed up by $145,000,000,000 in the wartime savings of individuals and businesses. If we can keep our heads at this critical time, those savings can be a guaranty of prosperity to this Nation for years to come. If, instead, we abandon all protection for the purchasing power of the dollar, people will begin to draw down their savings to buy goods at an ever-increasing rate. Inexorably the law of supply and demand will blow the price bubble up further and further until at length it will burst when pricked by a buyers' strike or speculators' panic.

We think it folly to suppose that the stability of the dollar will be maintained if price controls have to be taken off more than 50 percent, in dollar terms, of the Nation's food products at a time when pressures are acute on the prices of meat, milk, butter, and many other food products.

We do not see how this can be done and effective control retained over the rest of the economy, especially when a number of other amendments weaken the Administrator's ability to prevent unnecessary price increases.

We are especially concerned by the fact that the majority's proposals, if adopted, would inevitably destroy the hard-won industrial peace which the Nation is just now achieving. Stable wage rates cannot be maintained in industry if the cost of living soars upward in the coming months. The majority report, if adopted, would inevitably invite the early reopening of the wage issue throughout American industry.

It is equally astonishing to us to find a majority of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee favoring a course which would endanger the intricate international financial machinery to the development of which this committee has contributed so much. Financial recovery abroad will be impossible if the dollar is caught in the throes of inflation.

But more than the currencies of the world are at stake. We are taking chances with people's lives, not just with their pocketbooks. Decontrol of meat and dairy products will surely start a bidding contest for grain between American meat producers and dairy farmers. The program to fight famine by shipping grain abroad will not survive that contest. It is equally true that this scramble for grain will cause serious hardship to important segments of American industry, particularly the dairy and livestock interests.

The committee, throughout its 4 weeks of exhaustive hearings, received testimony from scores of witnesses and statements for the record from hundreds of others, all of which appear in the printed hearings. In addition, all Senators have received thousands of communications, letters, telegrams, and petitions bearing on one or more of the issues in the price-control bill. In evaluating this mass of data, representation, and opinion, we believe that the majority of the committee has lost sight of the great consuming public who pay the bill, the millions upon millions of wage earners and others living on salaries or fixed incomes, as well as the people as a whole who would suffer the major impact of an inflationary spree.

Certainly there is no reason for defeatism in the war against inflation simply because the OPA has been faced this past winter and spring by a succession of difficult and serious problems in administering the price-control laws. Last year and the year before this committee was confronted by evidence of a critical supply and price situation in several commodity fields. But neither the committee, the Congress, nor the Office of Price Administration allowed itself to be stampeded. The stabilization laws were renewed in effective form. By tightening up controls here and liberalizing them there, by intensifying enforcement, and by enlisting increased public and business cooperation, the OPA, working with other departments and agencies of the Government, succeeded in meeting the crises of these preceding years. We are confident that this year's problems can also be solved without undermining effective price control.

Some of the shortage situations which were most troublesome a few months ago are rapidly improving. Lumber output has risen from a monthly rate of 1,500,000,000 board feet in December to 2,600,000,000 in March, a rate which should make it possible to attain the CPA's 1946 production goal. Wool fabric for men's suits which in December was being produced at the rate of 15,600,000 yards had climbed to 20,300,000 yards in April. The production of men's suits is also climbing steadily, with the 1946 production estimated to exceed 1939 output by 27 percent. The rate at which cotton fabric for men's shirts is being made is now above both the 1939 and the 1945 rates and the total output of shirts for the year will be at about the 1939 level. Production of nylons is soaring. Since January 1, 1946, the total output of nylon hosiery is estimated to average more than three pairs apiece for the 53,690,000 women and girls in America who are 14 years or older.

The fact that administrative solutions are being found for many of the most stubborn problems has not, however, led us to conclude that the stabilization laws must be renewed without amendment. We recognize that the problem of terminating the stabilization controls as rapidly as the safety of the Nation will permit calls for appropriate changes in the statutes. Moreover, the careful scrutiny which the committee has again given to the administration of these laws has disclosed certain minor inequities which are corrected by this bill without serious effect upon the price level.

We have carefully considered the question whether Congress should prescribe a new pricing standard such as that contained in the Wolcott amendment, adopted by the House, or in the Taft amendment, considered and rejected by this committee.

Assuming that the data needed to carry out these amendments could be procured and analyzed, they would compel countless unnecessary price increases. Moreover, these sweeping changes in the rules of the game in the closing year of price control would surely lead to business confusion and administrative chaos. The meritorious cases, already handled too slowly by OPA, would have to fight for place with hundreds of other cases not eligible for relief under the present rules and not deserving of it as a matter of fairness. In thus bogging down the administrative process, such amendments would fail in their purpose of aiding production. At a time when the country is crying for an outpouring of goods, there would be an unprecedented withholding from the market while industry was waiting for OPA to grind out the expected price increases. If justice clearly required drastic action, it would seem to us more sensible to do away with price control entirely rather than to paralyze its administration by imposing upon it an impossible task.

Fortunately, however, when the OPA's pricing record is examined, we see no evidence of need for a relaxation of OPA's pricing standards. We do not find the rigidity which the OPA's critics are accustomed to charge. The figures prove that the agency has been willing to increase ceilings for hundreds of industries since VE-day. Specifically, to meet cost and production conditions since that date, OPA has authorized a total of 825 industry-wide price actions, 263 of which were required to keep industry earnings from falling below peacetime levels or to satisfy other legal requirements, 231 to maintain or expand the supply of needed commodities, and 331 to provide adjusted ceilings for reconversion commodities, to correct price maladjustments, or to prevent price inequities. In addition to these industry actions, thousands of price adjustments were authorized for individual firms, chiefly through the OPA regional and district offices.

As a result of these actions, the committee has been informed, the agency has not only completed most of its reconversion pricing job but has almost finished the price adjustments called for under the President's wage-price policy. While, in the absence of inflationary amendments, some further price increases would still be required, general price stability is now well within reach.

In this statement of minority views, no effort will be made to discuss the committee's amendments which either meet with our approval or appear to us to create no substantial danger to the general welfare. The dangerous amendments fall into three groups: (1) The specific decontrol amendments; (2) the textile and clothing amendments; and (3) the amendments giving special pricing privileges to dealers in certain articles.

1. THE SPECIFIC DECONTROL AMENDMENTS

We believe that the removal of price ceilings should be guided by general standards laid down by the Congress. To be sure that the application of such standards may be reviewed by a body free from any possibility of interest in the continued administration of controls, we think it appropriate that decisions as to decontrol made by the Price Administrator and, as to agricultural commodities and food products, by the Secretary of Agriculture, should be subject to review by an independent board. These objectives we believe are reflected in the general decontrol amendment approved by the committee.

Under that amendment the case for decontrol for each commodity can be tested on its merits. Decontrol will be required only if supply is in balance with requirements. In the case of nonagricultural commodities, where imperfections in competition may lead to the manipulation of price even where such balance may exist, further safeguards are provided to assure against inflationary consequences.

Authority to make the initial decisions is vested in the Price Administrator and in the Secretary of Agriculture, as the case may be. A fair and expeditious procedure is prescribed whereby an industry advisory committee can obtain a prompt decision from the Administrator or the Secretary, and then, if still dissatisfied, it can resort without delay to the bipartisan Price Decontrol Board which the amendment creates.

Given this machinery, why should the majority refuse to entrust to it the decontrol of meat, poultry, and milk and their food and feed products? Only one reason is apparent to us, and that is the realization that some or most of these products might not qualify for decontrol under the standards the committee itself has written. In other words, the majority realize that supply is so far out of balance in the case of such products that decontrol would certainly be followed by an inflationary rise in price.

The majority do not explain how they expect the Price Administrator to maintain stable prices for the rest of the economy once controls have been removed from products subject to the specific decontrol amendments. The first additional victim of these decontrols would be grain ceilings, and their collapse would carry with it the hope of continued control of bread, flour, and cereals. When this had taken place, all effective restraints on price increases would have ended for 60 percent of food products which in turn represent 40 percent of the cost of living.

Moreover we cannot have inflation on one side of a supermarket and stabilized prices on the other. Nor can we allow inflation in the grocery store and the butcher shop and still hope for stabilized prices in the dry goods store, the hardware store, and the laundry in the same block.

Some of those who concede that price rises would follow the specific decontrol amendments lull themselves into false security by an easy optimism which sees these rises as flare-ups quickly quenched by a flood of goods to market. They disregard the biological fact that milk production can expand only as bigger dairy herds are built up and the economic fact that, if cream is shifted back to butter, it creates a shortage for the ice-cream producer. Herds on the range are large, but the grain to feed cattle, hogs, and poultry for the market is sorely limited. Decontrol will cause more dollars to change hands but it is no magic which can turn scarcity into abundance.

Moreover, decontrol cannot eliminate the problem of equalizing the supplies in surplus and deficit areas. To set the East bidding against the Midwest and the South for Wisconsin milk and butter will cost all three areas dear, but they still will be unable to get those commodities in the huge quantities they need to satisfy current demands.

We believe that both the meat and the dairy problems can be solved by proper administrative action. Before the committee acted, the OPA and the Department of Agriculture had launched a vigorous slaughter control program. It was already beginning to show promising results when the committee's action in approving meat decontrol gave to all growers and feeders an immediate incentive to withhold shipments and thus prevented a fair test of the plan's effectiveness. If, instead, the Congress were now to give the stabilization authorities its firm backing, we believe that the current meat problem would largely disappear as it did last summer.

For milk and dairy products, a new pricing and distribution control program has been instituted still more recently by OPA and the Department of Agriculture. It is too new for its effectiveness to be demonstrated in action, but the stabilization authorities are confident that the new program will contribute greatly to the solution of the dairyman's difficult problems.

What these amendments would cost: Any attempt to evaluate in dollar terms what the specific decontrol amendments would cost the consumer is an obviously impossible task unless it is artificially limited by confining the estimate solely to the direct effect of decontrol on the principal products directly involved. On this basis, OPA has furnished us with an estimate of a 40- to 50-percent average rise in meat prices. With the Nation's meat bill mounting to $6,500,000,000, the estimated cost of meat decontrol would range from $2,600,000,000 to $3,250,000,000.

For milk, the abandonment of subsidies alone would cost 2 cents a quart, and it is not difficult to project an early average rise of at least 2 cents a quart more. To add 4 cents to the Nation's milk bill would mean $900,000,000 to the consuming public. Accompanying rises in the prices of butter, cheese, ice cream, and other manufactured dairy products could readily boost the total to $1,500,000,000.

Despite the fact that the present supply of poulty is good, the rise in the price of meat and the concurrent rise in the cost of feed which would be the inevitable result of the measure would, OPA believes, be reflected before long in higher poultry prices. A 10-percent rise would cost $160,000,000.

Totaling the foregoing estimates yields the sum of between $4,350,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 to be charged to the immediate account of these decontrol amendments. But their indirect costs would dwarf their direct. The 50-percent rise in the level of prices which a year's spiral of inflation could easily bring would, for example, cut in half the value of those $145,000,000,000 in wartime savings.

2. THE TEXTILE AND CLOTHING AMENDMENTS

The Price Administrator has repeatedly informed the committee that in few other fields has his job of controlling prices been harder than in that of apparel. Now, when the demand for things to wear and for fabrics from which to make them has been multiplied by the return of the veteran to civilian life, it seems to us that the least the Congress could do at this juncture would be to refrain from enacting amendments which might complicate the Administrator's task. But the majority would do the very opposite. The amendments they have approved strike a succession of sledge-hammer blows at vital points by the structure of textile and clothing price controls. These amendments operate to destroy the textile mills' normal incentive to resist undue rises in the cost of their chief raw material and substitute a potent inducement for the mills to encourage cotton speculation.

The majority have proposed an amendment to the special pricing formula in the 1944 Bankhead-Brown amendment to make sure that cotton-textile ceilings will rise with any rise in the price of raw cotton. This amendment will free the industry from any obligation to absorb increased cotton costs despite the fact that preliminary returns for 1945 show that cotton yarn and textile mills were earning considerably more than the 23.4 percent on net worth which they earned in 1944. But more serious still is the fact that a continuing rise in raw-cotton prices will give to the mills a steady flow of windfall profits on their cotton inventories.

The majority have also liberalized the special pricing formula still further by assuring to the industry, on a product-by-product basis, not merely its 1936–39 margin but its much more favorable 1939–41 margin. We see no reason why the prosperous cotton-textile industry should be singled out for this favored treatment, which spells certain increases in all cotton-clothing prices.

Still another amendment to the special pricing formula would afford to any cotton-textile mill a 5-percent increase in price if in the preceding month it had used 90 percent or more of the cotton it had averaged per month in the calendar year when its production was greatest during the period 1936 to 1945, inclusive. We can foresee nothing but higher prices resulting from the operation of this provision. Since it is not selective in its operation (except insofar as it puts a premium on producing heavy items such as chenille bedspreads), it will deflect production from the selected essential items in short supply on which OPA has already authorized a 5-percent incentive increase. Moreover, the simplest procedures for administering this provision which can be devised are certain to mean more red tape and reports for the conscientious businessman. At the same time opportunities for its exploitation by the less scrupulous are boundless. One of the most menacing possibilities is that mills will build up inventories by slowing down deliveries during the months when production is below the target and then, after 1 month's spurt in production, they will unload their accumulated stocks at the 5-percent higher price. There appears to be no effective way of preventing such a practice, despite its obvious detriment to the regular flow of cotton textiles to the apparel and other cotton-using industries.

The majority, following the action of the House, would allow the wool-textile industry also to enjoy the perquisites of the Bankhead-Brown pricing formula. There is no risk that this will lead to a rise in wool-fabric prices corresponding with rising prices for raw wool, since the market price of the latter is well below the ceiling on the basis of which wool textile ceilings are fixed. But the requirement that ceilings be calculated according to the formula for each major wool item will thrust a new and heavy administrative burden on OPA. With wool-fabric production booming and mill profits running at a high level, such price increases as might result from the repricing would constitute a gratuitous burden for the veteran and other buyers of wool suits, coats, and other items.

Most important of all the blows which the majority have struck against stable clothing prices is the abolition of MAP, the maximum-average-price plan requiring manufacturers during any quarter to deliver goods at the same average prices as they delivered goods in the same categories in the corresponding quarter of 1943. MAP is also used for rayon and wool fabrics but has never been used for cotton textiles, for which direct production controls are practicable.

MAP is the only effective method which OPA has been able to devise to prevent the shift in production from low-priced to high-priced lines of apparel, a shift which accounted for most of the increases in clothing prices until the trend was brought to a virtual halt by MAP in the fall of 1945. With MAP out of the way, manufacturers will put their limited supplies of fabric to their most profitable use—the manufacture of high-price, high-profit items.

We recognize that the administration of MAP has been attended by considerable inconvenience to manufacturers and some hardship. Occasionally it has defeated its own objective. But the plan became fully operative at the most difficult period for the apparel industry, when production controls were being abandoned and the lower-cost fabrics were in acutely short supply. With steady improvement in the situation and in OPA's techniques for preventing and relieving individual hardship, MAP has been developing into an effective and equitable device for fighting inflation in clothing prices. Especially in those fields of apparel where the "styling up" of material affords to garment makers an easy way to concentrate production in their highest-price lines, MAP should be preserved.

What these amendments would cost: We have asked OPA for its estimate of the cost of these amendments to the consumer. For MAP alone, the effect within the next 6 or 9 months is believed to be in the neighborhood of a billion dollars. The effect of the other amendments would depend largely on the price of raw cotton. Assuming, unrealistically, that cotton would not resume its upward movement, OPA estimates that these amendments would add another quarter-billion to the consumer's bill. OPA also estimates that a penny rise in cotton prices is reflected in a $60,000,000 rise in the price of clothing. Hence, to add still another quarter billion would require a rise of only four more cents in the market price of cotton.

The Congress would quickly reject a proposal to impose a Federal tax of a billion and more dollars on the things which people wear. We do not think the Congress should give to the textile and apparel industries the right to impose a levy of similar size on the consumer, the proceeds of which would flow into their private coffers.

3. SPECIAL PRICING PRIVILEGES FOR AUTO, APPLIANCE, AND FARM IMPLEMENT DEALERS

The basic principle for controlling inflation is not to raise prices in the absence of a sound reason for doing so. This principle has been ignored by the majority in their acceptance of the Crawford amendment, which was adopted by the House. This amendment would legislate higher prices for automobiles, radios, and most large household appliances. This would be done by abolishing OPA's rule requiring wholesale and retail trades selling these items to absorb necessary increases in manufacturers' prices so long as this will not reduce their gross margins below the level they actually realized in peacetime. To us, the OPA rule seems a fair one. We fail to appreciate the sanctity of a theoretical discount or mark-up which a dealer never actually realized. Common knowledge supports OPA's statistics (derived chiefly from industry sources) showing losses on trade-ins before the war.

This special-interest legislation will cost the consumers of this country on the average $85 for each Chevrolet, Ford, and Plymouth sold and correspondingly more for higher-priced cars, and this despite the fact that dealers are already averaging $68 more on these cars than they would be getting if the average gross margin they realized in peacetime were applied to the October 1941 prices of the corresponding models.

We can see no justification or excuse for giving favored treatment to this group of distributors. The customary argument for price increases—that they will bring increased production—does not apply here. The apparent theory of the amendment that the dealers should receive postwar compensation for their wartime economic suffering is at best a dubious one. It is not a function of price control to try to even out the inevitable inequities of wartime. Moreover, the force of the argument is destroyed by OPA evidence that the lucrative repair and used-car business made auto dealers generally more prosperous in wartime than they had been in peace. Not only has the majority adopted the Crawford amendment, but it has added similar favored treatment for dealers in farm implements.

What these amendments would cost: OPA, in response to a request for an estimate of the cost of these amendments to the consumer, has pointed out that their amount will depend on the rate and timing of production in the industries involved. With this reservation, it believes that these amendments will take about $500,000,000 from consumers to put in the pockets of distributors, most of whom, without this legislative windfall, would be enjoying a prosperity greater than they have ever known.

One further amendment should be noted, an amendment which gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the power, on certain conditions, to direct increases in the ceilings of any agricultural commodity or any processed food or feed product as well as to pass on the decontrol of such products. It also gives him the power, unlimited by conditions, to withdraw approval for any maximum price which he has previously approved.

Developments subsequent to the adoption of this amendment have raised a question as to its wisdom. The Secretary of Agriculture expressly advised the committee that he did not wish to exercise this authority. The President expressed his direct opposition to the proposal by letter dated May 23, 1946, in the following words:

"I earnestly repeat my earlier request that the Congress quickly reenact the stabilization laws without any amendments that would jeopardize economic stability. I ask, too, that, as President, I not be handicapped by amendments destroying my authority to vest responsibility for effective coordinated administration of the laws in those departments and agencies of the Government which I believe can best carry out the stabilization policies."

Respectfully submitted.

VOTERS OF WASHINGTON—READ THIS

[Reprint from Women's Wear Daily dated May 23, 1946]

"The vote on the amendment (to eliminate MAP) came after the committee had defeated, each time by a vote of 10 to 8, attempts by Senator HUGH B. MITCHELL (Democrat, Washington) to retain MAP, first for men's, women's, and children's wear, and then, when this was defeated, to maintain MAP at least for women's apparel."

This is the man who is going to ask you to reelect him to the Senate next November. He has been fairly consistent against our interests in his voting.

Show this to your employees who are also affected.

DICK CONNER.

OPPORTUNITY, WASH., June 27, 1946.

DEAR SENATOR: We want price control! Have you ever tried existing on $100 per month Government service allotment? Have you tried to raise two little children on that much? Have you considered what inflation will do to the service wives and their families? Here's a very conservative estimate on what it costs per month to live. Milk, 14 cents per quart at 3 quarts per day, $12.60 per month; $32.50 per month for a two-room Government-leased apartment (and no palace either). By the way, that doesn't include fuel. Groceries at $15 per week (and believe me that's eating and no more), $60 per month for eating. Not counting fuel because of the season, $105.10 is already spent out of $100 allotment money. How and where do the service wives get the money for drugs like cod liver oil, baby powder and oil, etc., dental bills and incidentals. You are all plenty handy at voting yourselves expense money. How about keeping prices down so Mr. and Mrs. Average Citizen can just keep eating?

Mrs. S. G. OLSON,

The Voice of Nebraska and the Temple of Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials published in the Omaha World-Herald, one entitled "The Voice of Nebraska," commenting upon the recent primaries held in my State, published in the issue of June 13, 1946, and the other entitled "The Temple of Justice," dealing with the Supreme Court, published in the issue of June 18, 1946.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I thought the voice of Nebraska was already here.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the voice of Nebraska has already spoken, but I want the voice of Nebraska to be heard around the world, and the best way to have it transmitted around the world is to have it published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE VOICE OF NEBRASKA

Harold E. Stassen, the vigorous and likable left-winger who wants the Republican Party to nominate him for President, took a terrific shellacking in the Nebraska primary election.

It was made plain beyond possibility of dispute that the rank and file of his party in this State dislike and distrust his brand of political philosophy. They want the Republican Party to go Republican—at last, after having experimented disastrously in succeeding national campaigns with a tepid dilution of New Dealism.

And so Mr. Stassen, for all his appealing personality, was knocked clean out of the ring.

Governor Griswold, his running mate, was knocked out along with him. And largely because, we believe, he had clambered onto the Stassen platform. It was a decision disastrous to Governor Griswold that brought Mr. Stassen to campaign for him.

Even without Stassen to help him HUGH BUTLER would probably have won out in his bid for renomination. He was a convention first choice. As politics go he was entitled to a second-term nomination. His record as a Senator had been in line with the sentiments of his party members in Nebraska. Governor Griswold, on the other hand, having been thrice elected to his present office, was making a bold bid for the Senator's job.

There is not, we believe, the difference between Griswold's popularity and BUTLER'S that the primary returns seem to indicate. Both are well known, well liked. Each is strong in his party. In a purely personal contest Griswold would have made a better showing.

But Stassen's advent switched a lifeless, good-natured contest between two good men to a pitched battle over issues. Within a comparatively few days the tide of the campaign was deflected powerfully to support of HUGH BUTLER'S stalwart and uncompromising Republicanism. And equally in pronounced opposition to Mr. Stassen's ambition to lead his party in 1948.

Because there was every early indication of a very close result, the landslide that swept Dwight Griswold off his feet must have come to him as a stunning surprise. So it did to the experts and guessers who had not sufficiently evaluated the quality of Nebraska Republicans when it comes to a decision on basic principles.

The Nebraska decision will have Nation-wide repercussions. "All eyes were on Nebraska," it was widely reported. Harold E. Stassen, as his powerful newspaper supporter, the New York Herald Tribune said, had "staked his hopes" on the Nebraska contest. The result was "nervously awaited." Tension may relax.

It is well that Nebraska, when it did speak, spoke so decisively. Its voice, raised thus early, should have a marked influence on Republican decisions in other States, and with this an influence in the 1948 convention.

Many citizens in both parties are hoping for a square-toed contest in 1948 between a mongrel New Deal-CIO-PAC-City Bosses Party on the one hand, and a genuinely and courageously Republican Party on the other hand. They want a count of noses on the radical reactionism of the present administration as against a conservatively progressive opposition that does not hesitate to call a spade a spade.

They want this because they believe that, within the next 2 years, the final decision must be made as between extreme leftism and a return to a representative constitutional government devoted to the fundamental principles of our democratic society.

Nebraska on Tuesday pointed the way toward such a line-up.

THE TEMPLE OF JUSTICE

President Roosevelt's purpose, when he set out to pack the Supreme Court, was to replace "the nine old men" with Justices who shared his own partisan views.

This would give assurance that the Supreme Court would decide the way he wanted it to decide when called to pass upon legislation he was able to force through a reluctant but timid Congress.

If not by his own method, then in another equally effective, President Roosevelt had his way. Justices died; he named their successors. The Supreme Court, like the Congress, came under his control.

He packed the Court.

His appointees were chosen, not because of their judicial ability and experience, not because they were endowed with judicial temperament, but because they were politicians and New Dealers. Not one of them had had judicial experience in the trial of civil cases. Six had never been a judge. Justice Black had been a police court judge. Justice Murphy had been a judge in a Detroit criminal court.

It seems unbelievable that any President, for whatever reason, would have plunged such a knife deep into the vitals of the world's greatest tribunal. But President Roosevelt did.

The inevitable result of his misconduct as President is now before the eyes of all citizens and of all nations.

The Supreme Court stands in disrepute. Faith in its judicial ability and impartiality is shaken. It required only the publicity of the scandalous Jackson-Black quarrel and its underlying causes to bring to light a condition long known to lawyers and litigants.

This is not because the Justices are not good and honest men according to their lights. It is because they are not, in the true sense of the word, judges. They are partisans. They are skilled and clever advocates. And, after the manner of impassioned partisans, they soon fell into violent disagreement. With disagreement came angry factions, unable to agree on anything, tortured by hatred for each other. Some of the Justices would not even speak to other Justices, so bitter was the schism, so deep the chasm dividing them into warring camps.

The one thing lacking—and the one thing essential—was judicial ability, the judicial temperament.

In a thoughtful editorial, the Journal of the American Judicature Society recently commented upon the difference between judicial skill and skill at the bar:

"The two are in a way the antithesis of each other. The summit of the advocate's skill is to build up the arguments for the one side and to overwhelm those of the other side so convincingly that the one side prevails. The summit of judicial skill is to weigh the two so evenly and impartially that even though the preponderance of the one over the other be but as to the weight of the peppercorn, the decision will surely go that way."

Mr. Roosevelt's Supreme Court has the advocate's skill—skill to burn. And it does burn. With an intense heat each faction burns the other faction. The duty of weighing "evenly and impartially" the issues at stake is fast becoming, so far as that once august tribunal is concerned, a lost art.

The grievous wrong that Mr. Roosevelt inflicted upon the Supreme Court is not beyond remedy. But it does need to be remedied if this great branch of our constitutional government is not to be damaged beyond repair. President Truman ran away from the remedy and his patriotic duty when he named another partisan, another advocate, another hard-working New Dealer to the Court, leaving it with but one Republican member, and with none of a proved judicial temperament.

The present hope, however, is that Chief Justice Vinson, who does bear a politician's reputation as a mollifier, a conciliator, may succeed in moderating the hot flames that burn within the temple; in recalling the Justices to a sense of their obligations as jurists.

Another hope is that the evident popular indignation, together with a feeling of shame within the Supreme Court itself, may cool the ardor of the advocates who should be judges.

The more distant hope, but that upon which ultimate rescue must depend, is that future Presidents, exercising the grave responsibility of the appointive power, will name Justices known for judicial ability and experience, who will come to their duties with the one resolve to sit in impartial judgment over all disputes submitted to them.

This Country Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, since I came to Congress a dozen years ago, the number of inquiries I have received from my colleagues and their friends relative to opportunities to purchase small farms or summer homes in Vermont has run into the hundreds.

Today I number several of my fellow Members as summer constituents, and the inquiries still persist.

I am not in the real-estate business and have no list of available places for sale, but anybody interested may obtain full and complete information by writing to Harold Chadwick, director of the Vermont publicity service, Montpelier, Vt.

Anybody who has purchased a farm in Vermont or who contemplates doing so may very well read two books written by the Honorable Samuel R. Ogden, of Landgrove, Vt.

The most recently published is This Country Life, in which Mr. Ogden writes entertainingly and well of the satisfactions of the rural life. His book is a practical, well-written guide for those who live or want to live in the country.

I want to include herein two editorials from the Bennington (Vt.) Banner regarding This Country Life.

WORTH READING

"This Country Life" is the title of a new book just out and written by Samuel R. Ogden, of Landgrove. The book is published by A. S. Barnes & Co., of New York. The work is the outcome of Mr. Ogden's personal experience in coming out of the city and settling on a mountain farm in Bennington County, and there earned a living as a blacksmith and farmer, wheelwright and carpenter, architect and teacher, town and State official, until he has come to high rank as a writer and proponent. We have not yet read Mr. Ogden's new book, but we know that it will be worth reading, as it is written from his own experience. He went into a back town among the mountains to earn a living for himself and family. He did it by hard manual labor, and if he is now a successful and honored writer of books, it is because he has learned in the hard way the things about which he writes. He is not merely a word painter of things he has imagined and dreamed about, and for that reason we feel sure that the book will be of great interest and value. Vermont has a new immigration of people from over the hills and far away. Many of them will make themselves a home here, while some are merely curious to find out how we live and keep going. Both will do themselves well to read Mr. Ogden's book. He has learned the answers by living them.

Sam Ogden's new book, which has been generously exploited in the Banner, is worthy of the good things that have been said about it, but none of the reviews and editorial notices have suggested how the book can be gotten into the hands of the folks who need it most. These people who would be most benefited by it are the newcomers to Vermont and other rural parts of the country. The United States is becoming urban and Broadway-ized so rapidly that the people of the country villages and rural neighborhoods have not yet had time to realize the curse which is hanging over their heads. Sam Ogden's book, This Country Life, bears the warning that all the folks whom we have grown to call sun-tanners should read and heed. Mr. Ogden, who is one of those who has escaped the mesh of the city movement back toward the horrors of the jungle, does not placard his warning but it is in the book, and told so interestingly and cleverly that those who can be helped by the author's philosophy may see the truth and barely possibly may be made free. The great danger to the people who move from the city to the country, those who buy farms in Vermont and other rural States, is that they bring with them no real knowledge of how to get a living in the hick districts. Most of them bring a little money that they have saved or inherited, but when this is gone or lost and when expenses grow beyond what they had dreamed, they know not which way to turn and become the victims of their own disappointment and lack of preparation. Mr. Ogden has told them gently and kindly what the country is like and the hardships that surround every effort to make one's own way. The question is: Can our new immigration learn and know the truth and the remedy before it is too late? By atomic bomb or some other process the cities are doomed. The country can and will continue forever. Sam Ogden's book should have 10,000,000 readers. How best may they be reached?

Mr. Ogden's earlier book, How To Grow Food for Your Family, is written from the author's own experience in doing just that. Although the growing season is short in Vermont, he found that he could raise enough food for his family to eat during the entire year at a fraction of the cost of buying from a grocery store. How To Grow Food for Your Family is the result of years of careful gardening and an analysis of the records of the author's garden through good years and bad.

These two books should be in the library of every person who hopes tc enjoy life near to Nature's heart.

I am not, as I said, in the real-estate business, nor am I a reviewer of books, but I do wish those who have gone to Vermont to live, either permanently or temporarily, to get out of life all it has to offer in the Switzerland of America. Sam Ogden's books will help them to do so.

Millions Are Not About To Starve

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article written by Randolph Churchill in the Washington Daily News on July 2, 1946, entitled "Millions Are Not About To Starve to Death."

Mr. Speaker, Randolph Churchill, a very careful and painstaking reporter, recently traveled in all parts of Europe. He wrote a syndicated article in the Washington Daily News on Tuesday, July 2, 1946. I am placing the article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so the Members of Congress may have an opportunity to read it and help clear their thinking about the present need of food in Europe.

TODAY IN EUROPE "MILLIONS AREN'T ABOUT TO STARVE TO DEATH"

(By Randolph Churchill)

PARIS.—How hungry is the world? Is Europe really on the edge of starvation? Millions of people al over the world are agitated by these questions and, particularly in Britain and the United States, are anxious to do all they can to help if the situation is as critical as some people have suggested.

During the last 3 months I have traveled in many countries in western Europe and have used my best endeavors to find the answers to these questions. I cannot honestly pretend that I can give a conclusive answer, but one thing I am sure about is that, though much hardship exists, the predictions that millions are about to die of starvation are grossly exaggerated.

SYSTEM AT FAULT

As one who has always aspired to be a "good European," I write this with reluctance. But it would be dishonest reporting if I were to conceal the fact that a more equitable distribution of food in most of the countries of western Europe would greatly alleviate current conditions.

The fact must be faced that Britain is the only European country where a serious attempt is made to divide the available resources evenly among the population, irrespective of income.

One of the factors which helped Britain to play an effective role in the war was the fair system of rationing introduced at the outset in 1939 and still in force today. Countries which were overrun and occupied by the Germans were in a very different situation and, for various reasons, were unable or unwilling to introduce effective rationing after they had been liberated. Neutral countries like Sweden, Eire, and Swizerland have nominal systems of rationing, but the ration in most cases is so lavish that ration cards are a pure formality.

The fact really is that Europe is not as short of food as some people have suggested. Naturally, when the government of any country is asked to estimate its minimum requirements for any given period, there is always a tendency to exaggerate. Of all the causes of government unpopularity, none is so potent as a shortage of food among the population.

PEASANT KEEPS PIGS

Last year's European harvest was largely spoiled by drought. There is some danger that this year's harvest may be spoiled by too much rain. But if there is a reasonable amount of sunshine in the next few weeks, there will certainly be bumper crops in both Italy and France.

One factor which is seldom taken into account by those whose painful duty it is to assess the food needs of the world is the extent to which European peasants are still hoarding supplies. A peasant who takes his pigs to market gets in return dubious-looking paper money, with which he can buy next to nothing in the shops. So he naturally is inclined to stay at home and at least ensure that he and his family eat well.

The only cure is an increase in consumers' goods, which would give the peasant some incentive to sell his stock. If the townsman is to eat better, he must work harder and make more of the goods of which the countryman has serious need.

Here in France, production is rising but is still handicapped by the shortage of coal. It looks, though, as if the French have paid the largest part of their bill. From now on, recovery ought to be much more rapid and, barring any major political upheaval, France should be able by next year to provide a decent life for all her people.

Modern Industry Magazine Describes Benefits of Rural Industrialization Bills, H. R. 4068 and S. 1385

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following article from the magazine Modern Industry, June 15, 1946. This statement refers to bills introduced by Senator BAILEY, of North Carolina, and myself:

LAW WOULD REBUILD DEPRESSED AREAS

First hearings on the Industrialization of Underdeveloped Areas Act of 1945 (S. 1385) were held last month by a subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee. Its enactment by this Congress is rather doubtful, but additional hearings will be announced and the purposes and provisions of the bill merit study by management men.

Should the proposed legislation become law, it would constitute recognition by the Federal Government that it can and should play an active part in helping revive the so-called "depressed areas" of the country.

Objective of the measure (also called the "Bailey-Hays bill") is to support and assist private capital, State planning organizations, chambers of commerce, and other groups interested in providing industrial employment and activity to five types of areas.

These areas are described as: (1) Predominantly agricultural, (2) the "war-baby" towns, (3) areas whose natural resources are depleted, (4) areas hit by technological obsolescence, (5) industrially over-specialized areas.

The bill would authorize appropriations to Agriculture, Labor, and Commerce Departments to be used for expert technical aid for studies in production, marketing, finance, vocational training, etc. Commerce would get $3,000,000, Labor and Agriculture $1,000,000 each.

Supporters of the bill point to the depressing effect on the national enconomy of low-income areas, regardless of the reason for that low income. They also note that the individual city or State—or private groups—in most cases lack both the funds and the skilled technical assistance to lift themselves, industrially, by their own bootstraps.

The Secretaries of the three departments have testified favorably during the first hearings on the bill held before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce. The head of Virginia's State planning commission spoke in favor of the bill, citing the way in which it might be of assistance to Virgina in her effort to lift living standards in her farming regions.

The bill does not contemplate or provide for Federal funds to start factories or industries. Its only function is to lend a hand to private capital by providing information in the form of specific technical studies.

Most of the studies to be undertaken under the initial program would be at the request of civic or business groups interested in promoting the welfare of their community.

The areas from which such requests might come include the agricultural South and Midwest; the wartime boom towns of the south and west coast; areas in northern Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin where timber reserves are thinned out; and towns like Scranton, Pa., where mining has taken the town downhill with it; or a town like New Castle, Pa., which has been left more or less stranded by the rise of striprolling mills.

Opponents of the measure fear that the real purpose or net effect of the bill would be to siphon industry from an industrialized area to one less industrialized.

Answer given to this criticism is that there is no such intent, and that there is little likelihood of such a result. Main objective is to help communities help themselves by learning what an area's resources of labor, materials, plants, and capital are—and helping business and civic leaders to determine what type of local industries might be supported.

Also, it is pointed out that many of the most industrialized States themselves have problem towns, despite their over-all industrial advancement—and that these, too, might benefit from such a program.

There has been a tendency to link the bill with dispersal of industry throughout the country in the event of a future war. Actually, the act has no connection with this entirely different problem.

A committee of the three heads of departments or their designees would run the machinery. Experts would be drawn from each—Agriculture, Labor, Commerce—as required by the particular study at hand.

OPA Releases and Statistics Still Inaccurate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN PHILLIPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I call attention to the timely broadcast of Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., over radio station WOL, on Monday evening, July 1, 1946. This was the first day of the new freedom of the United States, the freedom from the regulations and controls of the OPA.

I particularly call attention to the statement, by Mr. Lewis, that he had checked, himself, or through his staff, the public announcements of the OPA, regarding rising prices, or price increases which the people might expect. Mr. Lewis said:

It so happens that I have spent the entire week end, ever since the President's veto message was made public, checking those statements he made.

He then tells the results of this check. The steel industry does not expect to raise prices; automobile manfacturers do not look for price increases; and so on.

Again, Mr. Lewis called attention to a press release Monday morning which he traced directly to the OPA office of marked increases in food prices. On checking the stores, he found no such rises. This, Mr. Speaker, is characteristic of OPA methods, the methods which I once characterized as the "Hitler-Bowles" methods of propaganda, because they so closely followed the methods outlined for the Nazi Party by its leader. I can add an example of my own. Yesterday, during the debate on this floor, one Member spoke of the rising prices of foods. Meats were mentioned. Others have called attention today to the fact that although meat rose on the big markets, it fell today as steers arrived in quantity. This is just what we have said would happen.

Among the commodities mentioned as having risen were oranges. This is an old favorite with Mr. Bowles, and always a subject for inaccurate figures from OPA. Yesterday was no exception. Mr. Speaker, instead of going up, oranges went down. I will include, at this point, the market figures for July 1:

ORANGES—AUCTION SALES JULY 1, 1946

The table below shows average prices received at several auction markets for July

1, the first day after termination of price control. A few preferred sizes sold above old ceilings but the averages were substantially below.

AUCTION SALES, JULY 1, 1946

Market	Cars sold	Range		Average price	Old ceiling
		Low	High
ORANGES
New York	54	$1.35	$10.75	$4.48	$6.20
Boston	17	1.25	9.65	4.86	6.22
Philadelphia	20	-------	-------	4.91	6.19
Chicago	16	1.70	10.35	5.30	6.15
Detroit	14	1.25	8.20	4.75	6.18
St. Louis	12	1.35	9.10	3.93	6.16
Cleveland	6	2.50	9.55	5.78	6.19
Average	------	-------	-------	4.72	6.18

The highest sale was $10.75 for 16 boxes of preferred sizes and extra quality in New York. There were a few other sales between $8 and $10 per box. The quantity sold at such prices was negligible. The averages were more than $1 per box below old ceilings.

A car of oranges contains from 462 to 693 boxes.

I said yesterday, and repeat now, that now is the time for courage and for leadership in the Congress of the United States. The OPA statistics and press releases are no more accurate since OPA went out of existence, than they were during its period of control.

The excerpts from Mr. Lewis' radio talk follows:

The big story tonight, of course, is OPA, and the fact that it expired at midnight and that as of this moment no price control of any kind is in effect over the Nation.

It's a weird story, full of unexplainable moves, particularly on the part of President Harry Truman.

The OPA continuation bill went to the White House Friday night, and even before it reached there, the President accepted the resignation of Economic Stabilization Director Chester Bowles, although he did not and he has not yet appointed any successor to Mr. Bowles. That is important, and it reflects a lack of understanding on the part of the President of the practical considerations that he faces with Congress in this whole matter. Whether he realizes it or not, the little matter of who is to succeed Mr. Chester Bowles is an all-important consideration, in its effect on what Congress does or does not do now. The objection that Congress has had all along to the OPA has been not on the price control act as a law, but on the personnel and the administration of OPA. If Mr. Bowles is replaced by someone in whom Congress has faith, that's one thing. But until the identity of that person is announced, until Congress knows who is going to handle this price-control policy in the future, the President's chances of getting any legislation of the kind he wants are greatly complicated.

The veto message which Mr. Truman sent to the Capitol on Saturday is generally understood to have been prepared by OPA itself, and to those in Congress who have tried to follow and support and be loyal to the President it was a rather disillusioning document.

His chief attack was against the Taft amendment, and the attack was so worded as to leave the impression to the general bystander that the veto was used as the vehicle for partisan politics. It was so charged openly at both ends of the Capitol today. What the President seemed to forget was that his own Democratic leaders, particularly Senator BARKLEY, supported the Taft amendment and commended it highly.

There's nothing complicated about it. The Taft amendment merely provides that ceiling prices set by OPA must not be less than the actual cost of production of a given article, plus the same dollars-and-cents profit on that article that the industry as a whole made in October of 1941. That same dollars-and-cents profit means, if you'll think it over, a lower percentage profit than the manufacturer enjoyed at that time, and it is percentage profits that count in any industry or business. Just how government could offer less than that, in any semblance of equity or justice, is rather difficult to understand. In all sincerity, does that seem terrible or unreasonable or unfair to you? Let's be a little sane about this thing. Was it necessary to have price control in October 1941? We didn't have it. There was no price control in 1941, and nobody was complaining about the profit that a manufacturer was making then. Prices weren't out of line, so the profit on a given item must not have been out of line. Nobody was profiteering.

Why then, is it so unreasonable and so heinous and so inflationary to apply the same dollars-and-cents profit today, to the present cost of production.

Figure it out for yourself. Unless President Truman wants us to have price control imposed on us forever, we've got to get back sometime to the point where the manufacturer can get for his product the actual cost of production of that product, plus a fair profit. Not an exorbitant profit. Just a reasonable profit. The whole argument for continuation of OPA has been that because supply has not yet reached demand, in some lines, unprincipled and greedy producers would charge more than a reasonable profit, and prices would become exorbitant. So the Taft amendment goes back to October 1941, when there was plenty of supply, and the law of supply and demand and competition was in full operation, and says the profit of that time is to be the profit of the present, and ceiling prices are to be the actual present cost of production, with that profit added. But that's wrong, they say. That is a terrible and vicious policy. Well, what's wrong with it? It accomplished precisely the aim and the avowed objective of the President—it accomplished precisely the aim and the avowed objective of the President and OPA itself. Exactly that objective. And it certainly is not clear, what the objection is.

Senator KENNETH WHERRY, of Nebraska, one of those who helped to write the bill which the President vetoed Saturday, said this afternoon that the kindest thing to think is that the President simply swallowed the dose that was administered to him by the OPA, and the Political Action Committee of the CIO, and the Communist Party, and allowed himself to be taken in without giving any personal study to the matter at all. He said that the predictions of cost increases, which the President cited in his veto message, are untrue and unfactual and are plainly some more of the phony statistics that OPA has been feeding out to the public for months past. Except that this time, they used the President as their mouthpiece.

It so happens that I have spent the entire week end, ever since the President's veto message was made public, checking those statements which he made, and perhaps you would like to have the result of those checks.

The President stated that under the Taft amendment, the ceiling price on steel would have to be increased between four and eight dollars a ton. I have contacted top officials of the steel industry, including so-called Little Steel as well as Big Steel, and they inform me that there is not the slightest prospect of any increase in steel prices for many months to come, and there is no indication now that there will be any increase at all.

The President stated that the average price of low-priced automobiles would be increased between $225 and $259 per automobile. I have talked to the top leaders of the automobile industry today, and they say that is so fantastically incorrect as to be ridiculous. They say they have no plans for increasing the prices of their automobiles, and it is inconceivable that any such price increase would go into effect. Most of them told me that they have no intention of increasing the prices on their cars at all.

And so it goes with the rest of the items. Where did the President get these figures? They were used, as Mr. Chester Bowles repeatedly has used similar figures, in an effort to frighten the public into thinking that terrible price increases would result from the Taft amendment. In all fairness, if the President of the United States uses figures, these figures are subject to call. And the people who run these industries say these figures simply are not correct, even now when we have no price control.

Senator WHERRY also said today that the President's reasoning is entirely unclear to him, when Mr. Truman says that because he thinks the Taft amendment would allow too much increase in prices, he solves the matter by removing price ceilings altogether and leaving nothing at all. That, he said, is like a doctor finding that the patient is not getting along as well as the doctor would like, so the doctor feeds him poison and kills him as a solution.

So where we stand tonight is that we have no price control at all. The President wants a temporary continuation resolution for a period of 20 days, while a new and more satisfactory bill is being worked out. It is very questionable, frankly, whether he will get that, particularly in the Senate. There are enough Members of that body who are opposed to any form of OPA continuation at all to delay this temporary proposal for a week or 2 weeks, or almost as long as they wish. In the meantime, of course, the responsibility for no price control at all is on the President's shoulders.

The deliberate intention among those Senate Members is to bide along here, watchfully, and see what happens with no price control at all. Here we have been regaled for months with the panic-stricken and hysterical bugaboo tales about what would happen unless price control would continue—horrible ghosts and specters in the haunted house. They contend that here is an opportunity to turn the broad light of the noonday sun on the haunted house, and see whether there really are any ghosts and specters, or whether it has all been a jack-o-lantern in the window and a loose shutter, slapping in the breeze.

And that's what's going to happen. The Senate is going to delay passage of this continuation legislation to see how things really go—not how the people in OPA who want to hold their jobs say things are going to go, and not how they tell the President, but how things really go. Do prices go skyrocketing? Here's the test.

In the meantime let me give you one warning. I have tried to show you from time to time the thoroughly unprincipled and immoral methods to which OPA and its supporters have resorted in their propaganda directed at you.

You have heard, since early morning, reports of tremendous price increases here and there, and rent increases at this city or that city. A press association carried, this afternoon, the statement that butter prices in the city of Washington increased today from 67 cents a pound, which was the old ceiling, to 93 cents a pound in almost all retail stores. I and my staff had been checking butter prices throughout the day, and I knew that statement to be untrue. Not only were butter prices by all of the chains in Washington held at 67 cents, but actual shopping tests showed that the same thing was true of some little independent retailers.

Investigation at the press association proved that the untrue story had been fed to them from the national publicity department of the Office of Price Administration. Our own WOL news staff here also checked, and we were told by OPA publicity the same story. They volunteered it. So be very careful of what you hear. If your rent is increased, that's one thing. Don't believe any stories you hear that come to you second hand.

How Surplus Is Sold

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the disposal of surplus property by the Surplus Property Administration through various agencies is becoming worse. The War Assets Administration evidently keeps no record and cares little as to how it disposes of surplus property, especially with reference to the purchasers. Even after payment is made the Surplus Property Administration evidently keeps no record and later informs the purchaser that the property had been previously sold to favored purchasers.

I am including herewith a letter from the Grieder Machine Tool & Die Co., Inc., of Bowling Green, Ohio, showing the shabby treatment given to purchasers:

GRIEDER MACHINE TOOL
AND DIE CO., INC.,
Bowling Green, Ohio, June 28, 1946.
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL: Approximately 3 months ago we negotiated with the War Assets Administration, regional office, Chicago, Ill., for the purchase of punch presses which we wish to use in the plant. In accordance with their direction and at their recommendation we visited the warehouses in Hammond, Ind., Indianapolis, Ind.; Vigo Ordnance Plant, Terre Haute, Ind., as well as the Chicago office itself. At the Vigo Ordnance Plant, Terre Haute, Ind., we saw many punch presses, some of which we would be able to use in our operations if we were able to purchase same. However, because of some technicality of which we are not familiar and contrary to the information we had, these presses have not as yet been offered for sale, although we were told by men in charge of the plant that they had been stored in this field for a 2- to 3-year period. Recent contact with the Chicago office of the War Assets Administration revealed information that it would be at least another 4 to 6 weeks before we might be able to negotiate a purchase. However, no assurance could be given us that even after that period we might be successful in obtaining some of these presses as well as other items such as tumbling barrels.

We believe you will be interested also to know that on April 17, 1946, we purchased 1,340,000 steel balls through the Chicago office and sent a check in full payment along with our purchase order. Approximately 6 weeks later, because we had not received the purchased items, namely, the steel balls, nor had received any information from them we contacted their office at which time we were told we would shortly receive the item in question. Several days later we received a call from one of the men in charge informing us that the balls they had offered for sale to us and which we thought we had purchased had been sold in December 1945, and were not for sale at all. You will note the interval there of approximately 6 months where apparently no record was kept or was available. After we had supposedly purchased the balls we went ahead with our production plans for manufacturing an item to be placed on the market early this summer and when we received a call that through some error we would not receive the items we purchased you will readily agree and can plainly see the precarious position in which it placed us and at the present time we are not as yet "out of the woods" so to speak.

Similarly the first week in May 1946, we purchased a punch press and approximately 3 to 4 weeks later were informed that the press had been sold to someone else. Consequently we did not receive same.

We believe that you will readily agree from the experiences we have related that some method of improvement is badly needed in the method of operation of the War Assets Administration as very much doubt has developed in our minds whether or not to purchase any more items through this agency even though we may be badly in need of same and they (War Assets Administration) have the items listed as surplus. Likewise, items that we have already purchased have not only taken weeks but months for delivery, consequently no planning for plant production can be accomplished with such indefinite delivery dates even after items have been purchased and paid for.

Briefly summing up our reaction it appears that either no interest is apparent in the sale of this surplus property or that certain groups are apparently more successful than others in the securing of same.

Yours very truly,
GRIEDER MACHINE TOOL AND DIE CO.,
By GERALD A. SHEIBLEY,
Sales Manager.

I believe that a special investigation should be made of the Surplus Property Administration concerning those sales and the utter disregard of the intention of Congress.

Truman's Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of July 1 entitled "Truman's Responsibility":

TRUMAN'S RESPONSIBILITY

The upshot of the dispute between Congress and President Truman on the OPA is that this morning there is no price control at all and it is uncertain whether these controls can be reestablished and if so, on what basis. Even assuming that the criticisms which President Truman expressed in his veto message and radio speech are substantially true, he was not justified in running the risk of a complete abandonment of price control because he could not get the kind of price control he wants. He did not like the congressional version and he ends by having none at all for the time being and by throwing the whole country into unexampled confusion and uncertainty.

It is difficult to credit the sincerity of predictions of great calamity when the author of those predictions prefers no price control to some price control. The President's veto has been called an act of courage. On the contrary it is the form of weakness that turns in desperation into blind folly.

President Truman's defense of his rash veto would have been more persuasive if he had devoted himself to a temperate and fair statement of the situation and of the differences that divide him and a large majority of Congress. Instead he permitted himself a one-sided statement which seemed to be as much intended to be a partisan political attack on Senator TAFT as a defense of his ideas on price control.

There is certainly room for a difference of opinion on the so-called Taft amendment which was Truman's chief target. It would have allowed some price increases where they are not needed. But the ability to raise prices is limited by the ability to sell at those prices.

Giving a manufacturer the ability to raise prices does not give him necessarily the ability to sell. The Taft and other supplementary amendments would have removed the price bottlenecks that have been retarding or preventing production. The theory of these amendments was that business would either find the right price level or the logic of the market place would find it for business. Production is a more effective form of price control than any law, and the unwillingness of the buyer to buy is another effective check which becomes operative at some point.

President Truman might have placed the responsibility on Congress by accepting its long deliberated bill. Instead he has assumed responsibility himself for whatever may ensue. Congress had hoped to "decontrol" by stages. The vetoed bill would have retained a large measure of control, particularly on rents. Now there is no control and confusion. This is the responsibility that President Truman has assumed.

Whatever the duration of this uncertainty, it is a time for the exercise of restraint and moderation on all sides. OPA Director Paul Porter thinks that price control will be reestablished quite quickly and that prices will be set back where they stand at present. This may not be so simple a task as he seems to think. The course of future controls will be determined in large measure by the restraint or lack of restraint that is displayed in this interim period of uncertainty.

The New Philippine Republic—Philippine Independence Proclaimed on July 4, 1946—Filipino Attorney Makes a Résumé of Philippine-American Relations, 1898–1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, on July 4, 1946, the American Government, pursuant to a law of Congress, proclaims the independence of the Philippines.

At Manila, a representative of President Truman and a delegation of this Congress, are taking part in the ceremonies that bring the new Philippine Republic into existence.

The occasion is the culmination of nearly 50 years of American stewardship of a people who have proved capable, responsive, loyal, and grateful to the United States. I salute the Filipino people and wish them all manner of success in their new life of independent nationhood.

Our record in the Philippines is a great honor to us as it is a great benefit to the Filipinos. The world must admit that that record is proof conclusive that America stands for fair play, for aid to the weak, for liberty and freedom, for progress and prosperity for other peoples.

I hope and trust that the American and Filipino nations will be close, cordial, and cooperative in their relations. Such would be but natural and logical as well as mutually beneficial.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make as part of my remarks a concise and clear statement of Philippine-American relations from their beginning by Mr. Vicente Villamin, Filipino lawyer and economist, who lives in my district in Los Angeles.

THE NEW PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC

(By Vicente Villamin, Filipino lawyer and economist)

On July 4, 1946, the Philippine Republic is born. America is its sponsor. An American law, the act of Congress of March 24, 1934, brings the new nation into existence. The President of the United States has issued a proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippines and withdrawing American sovereignty over them.

The Philippines came under the control of the United States as a result of the Spanish-American War. By treaty signed at Paris on December 10, 1898, Spain ceded the Philippine Territory of 114,000 square miles to the United States.

President McKinley announced that the American policy would be to develop the Philippines—the country and its people. There would be no oppression, exploitation, or imperialism. The policy would be radically different from the colonial policies of other nations. The American policy has been followed faithfully and the Philippines is a monument to American unselfishness and helpfulness.

On July 1, 1902, the American Congress passed the first organic law for the Philippines. In it is incorporated the Bill of Rights with two exceptions: The trial by jury and the right to bear arms which were both left for the Filipinos to adopt or not. In other words, the Filipinos since 1902 enjoyed the same civil liberty as is guaranteed to the American citizen under the Bill of Rights. No dependent people had had that boon before in all history.

A government suited to the genius and condition of the people was established. Filipinos occupied important posts. The chief justice of the supreme court has always been a Filipino. The overwhelming majority of the civil service were Filipinos.

In 1907 the Philippine Assembly was inaugurated. Its members were elected by the people. Its first act was to appropriate a sizable amount for the education of the Filipino masses. The assembly was in effect the lower house of the legislature and the commission the upper. The members of the commission were appointed by the President of the United States. There were Filipino appointees, but there was an American majority.

Free trade was established between the United States and the Philippines in 1909. That gave impetus to industries, particularly sugar, coconut oil, cigar, embroidery, and cordage. These industries became the main prop of the Philippine economic structure. Other industries are gold, chrome, manganese and iron mining, lumber, pearl buttons, and straw-hat making.

On August 29, 1916, Congress passed the Jones law. This placed the legislative power in the hands of Filipinos, reenacted the bill of rights, and established a nearly complete self-government. The chief executive, called Governor General, continued to be appointed by the President of the United States.

Finally, on March 24, 1934, Congress passed the Independence Act. This law created the Philippine Commonwealth, with the president and congress elected by the people, including women voters, a constitution drafted by their representatives, and a Government 100 percent Filipino in direction, personnel, and policy. American sovereignty was represented by the American High Commissioner, who watched and was consulted, but didn't take part in governing.

It should be made clear that the Philippine Government has always been self-supporting. Its budget had never been out of balance. It amounted to around $80,000,000 a year before the war. Its bonded debt is less than $40,000,000, or only a little more than $2 per person.

The prewar trade with the United States was about $181,000,000 annually, being 73 percent of the Philippine total overseas trade. There were in that trade less than 16 percent of American ships as compared to 27 percent of Japanese and 20 percent British. Filipino ships represented less than 4 percent.

The war has upset everything. The government treasury is empty. Most of the industries have been destroyed. Reorganization of different fields of endeavor is just starting. The Philippine Government is seeking a loan of $400,000,000, which is 10 times its present debt. The budget for the first year of the Republic amounts to $125,000,000 against an income of only about $20,000,000. This is, of course, a temporary condition.

But withal the future of the country is bright and far from gloomy. The challenge is to the Filipino leaders to mobilize the forces that would compel success. The 18,000,000 Filipinos are determined to progress and to make the new government succeed. That is the chief asset. The material assets are, if properly protected and employed, capable of increasing the Filipino people's national income of $1,000,000,000 five times over, giving the government a possible yearly revenue of around $350,000,000 without increasing taxes.

Two of these assets are the approximately $500,000,000 spent in the Philippines by the American Government and members of the armed forces during and since the war and the credits of more than $200,000,000 payable by the American Government to Filipino veterans, including the recognized guerillas.

Congress has recently passed the following laws: An act turning over to the Philippine Government about $73,000,000 in certain taxes collected in the United States; an act appropriating $400,000,000 to pay private persons for war damages and $120,000,000 to the Philippine Government for reconstruction work plus $100,000,000 worth of surplus property; and an act establishing free trade, fully exempt from duty in the first 8 years, and partially so for 20 years after that period.

In relation to these appropriations, two things should be remembered: (a) The Philippines didn't receive any lend-lease aid from the United States and (b) the Filipino participation shorted the war, saved American soldiers' lives and saved roughly $10,000,000,000 in expenses. The amount of destruction in the Philippines is estimated at about $1,000,000,000.

Two weeks ago Congress passed a law providing for military assistance to the Philippine Republic. Under a joint resolution of Congress of June 29, 1944, sites for naval, air, and military bases may be reserved by the United States on Philippine territory. The plan is to build a formidable American military establishment.

It is clear that, although the two countries have separated politically, their relations will continue to be very close, maintained as they will be by special economic and military arrangements and buttressed by nearly half a century of intimate relationship that has been sanctified by the war with the simple loyalty of the Filipinos to the American flag when it was under relentless attack by a determined enemy.

Feed for New England Poultry Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I called attention to the famous letter sent by President Truman to the junior Senator of New Hampshire. The Senator had urgently requested that the President take whatever steps might be necessary to provide additional feed for the poultry farmers of New England.

The President answered the Senator's appeal by virtually ignoring it, while at the same time the President criticized the Senator for blocking confirmation of oilman Pauley for Under Secretary of the Navy.

In my remarks for the information of the Members of the House I suggested that the President was treating farmers of New England as foreigners. I believe the Members must be interested in the reaction of the people of New England to the inadequate and inefficient program for distribution of available feed supply to the United States as expressed in a short editorial in the Springfield (Mass.) Union of Monday, July 1, 1946:

CHICKENS AND PEOPLE

Commenting on the President's letter to Senator TOBEY, Representative CLASON said that Mr. Truman shows little concern in the destruction of New England's dairy herds and poultry flocks and the inability of dealers to secure feed for distribution. To him, said Mr. CLASON, the farmers of New England are in fact Macedonians and foreigners.

The slight inconsistency here, which is nothing to quibble over, is that if Mr. Truman regarded New Englanders as foreigners, maybe they'd stand a better chance of getting the grain they need for their flocks and herds. The more familiar we become with the mess this country is in, with its inexplicable shortages and everything, the more we must marvel that this country succeeded in winning the war, and the more we doubt that we really did.

Protect the Poultry Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. O'HARA. Mr Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Paul Pioneer Press, St. Paul, Minn., July 1, 1946, issue, entitled "Protect the Poultry Industry":

PROTECT THE POULTRY INDUSTRY

It is time for the Federal Government to wake up to the fact that barnyard epidemics are no respecters of State lines, and to reassert its once vigorously exercised powers of fighting those epidemics while the chance to avert disastrous loss remains.

So far, the United States Department of Agriculture has done nothing effective to stop the spread of the dreaded Newcastle disease among poultry through the sale all over the Nation of hatchery eggs from diseased flocks in certain States.

That is why, when the leading poultrymen of Minnesota meet at the University Farm Tuesday to plan defense measures, they will be compelled to talk in terms of a lone-handed, uphill fight to protect an industry which today ranks with Minnesota's very topmost sources of farm income.

What is holding the Bureau of Animal Industry back? There was no such hesitation back in the days when John R. Mohler, until recently its chief, went out on his campaigns to exterminate foot and mouth disease before it spread ruin through the American cattle industry.

Nothing stopped the bureau when it faced the disease crises of two and three decades ago. Why should it be so slow today? Newcastle disease is known to spread swiftly among poultry of Asia, Europe, and now America. There is no remedy or cure, and no efficient preventive save complete quarantine and elimination of diseased flocks. Mortality from the disease among turkeys and chickens ranges up to 80 and 100 percent. And now this plague has broken out at several places in Minnesota.

For more than 10 years, the existence in California of a virus ailment similar to Newcastle disease has been known. Through all that time, the bureau has permitted the shipment out of that State of hatchery eggs which can transmit the malady that has been identified as the Newcastle disease itself. Still no steps have been taken. The plague has spread to several Eastern States to the Midwest and finally to Minnesota.

Why does not the Federal Government act? Maybe it is afraid of political opposition from California. Well, that State was about the last to eradicate tuberculosis from its dairy herds. It has let Bang's disease run rife among dairy cattle. Regardless of political consequences, California should be stopped from longer exposing the poultry industry of this and other States to disaster. Dr. B. A. Simms, new Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, is being challenged by developments to accept the tough assignment of an all-out fight on Newcastle disease.

Meanwhile, Minnesota authorities and poultrymen are to be commended for moving vigorously and promptly to the defense of the poultry industry of this State.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, with leave to extend my remarks I am sending the following telegram to all chambers of commerce in my district in an effort to stimulate control of prices:

With expiration of price control, which condition will maintain for several days and with some doubt that any price control act will be written which will meet the approval of the President, it is of tremendous importance that the retail merchants in the interest of their communities and in the interest of the Nation assume the great responsibility now resting upon them to keep retail prices at the lowest possible level even to the point of making some sacrifices to prevent inflation because of a shortage of merchandise. I believe it would be helpful and would be appreciated by the general public if through your organization an immediate effort was made by the businessmen in an agreement to hold prices down regardless of former controls. Am sure such a move on the part of businessmen would be most welcome to the public and would bring about a greater confidence and good will for the future.

C. W. VURSELL,
Member of Congress.

Tax Exemption of Annuities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the Committee on Public Employee Retirement Administration of the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada and the Association at its annual conference, held at Richmond, Va., on June 13, 1946:

Whereas the Congress and Treasury of the United States have totally exempted from taxation the pensions paid to so many of the 60,000,000 employees of private industry under the Social Security Act and the Railroad Retirement Act as survive to receive pensions; and

Whereas the Government of the United States continues to tax at full rates the pensions paid to so many of the 6,000,000 employees of the Government of the United States and of our States, counties, municipalities, districts, and courts as survive to receive pensions; and

Whereas such inconsistent taxation constitutes a grave, unwarranted, and unjustifiable discrimination against the public service and its 6,000,000 employees; and

Whereas exemption from taxation of pensions of Government employees was not included in the general tax bills enacted by Congress during the past 2 years; and

Whereas pensions generally are frozen while wages increase, the pensioners suffer through decreased purchasing power, and the Federal income tax cuts sharply into the nonexempt, reduced, deferred, unproductive, and fixed income of such pensioners, which pensions in most cases are their sole means of support: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Employee Retirement Administration of the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada, and the association, in regular meeting assembled at its annual conference now being held in Richmond, Va., this 13th day of June 1946, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal income-tax law so that it will provide that there shall be excluded from gross income, for the purpose of income-tax computation, all annuity, pension, or retirement income up to $1,440 in any year, in excess of regularly provided exemptions, which any participant or his beneficiary, or dependent, shall receive through a legally created and established retirement, pension, or annuity system, or fund, or by any combination thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive director of this association be, and hereby is directed to forward a copy of this resolution to the chairman and each member of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate, and to the chairman and each member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the end that they may initiate or support proper legislation to carry into effect the purposes and intent of this resolution.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House will soon be called upon to vote for or against the British loan. This proposal involves the direct loan of $3,750,000,000. This amount will be raised by issuing more Government bonds, which will be added to the United States public debt, which on June 21, 1946, stood at the staggering total of $268,756,307,859.

While the transaction is being designated as a "loan," it perhaps would be more accurate to regard it as a gift. England still owes the United States $6,415,664,782 from World War I, and if anyone thinks she can or will pay back this proposed loan, they are merely ignoring her past record as a credit risk. I have yet to meet a responsible representative of Great Britain that honestly believes it will be possible to pay back this loan. Thus, it is reasonable to assume that this vast sum will also have to be written off as a bad debt. In the long run, the money will be extracted from the pocketbooks of the already greatly overburdened people of the United States.

I am not unmindful of the claim that this so-called loan is needed by Great Britain to help her over the postwar reconversion period, to assist her nation's rehabilitation, and to restore trade. I am not overlooking the fact that it is claimed that we must make this loan in order to prevent the possible spread of communism. I am not overlooking the fact that if some of the trade benefits claimed for this proposal were to actually be achieved, it might result in some benefit for the industry of this country. However, a careful analysis of this proposal provides no assurance that this loan will produce any important stimulus for the foreign trade of this country. I am certain that it will add immeasurably to the complexity of the problems already confronting our domestic economy and contribute so viciously to the cause of inflation that it may very well be the "straw that broke the camel's back."

It is indeed surprising that the elder statesmen of the Nation, Hon. Jesse Jones, of Houston, Tex.; Hon. Barnard Baruch; Hon. Leo Crowley, and former President Hoover are in practical agreement that the proposed loan in its present form should not be approved.

The evidence seems perfectly clear that we should demand security for any loan that is made. The evidence is conclusive that England has sufficient collateral to enable her to adequately secure any loan that is made. Now is the time to determine the future of the island bases in the Pacific and the Atlantic. Now is the time to determine our rights to the use of air bases built with American men, money, and materials throughout the world. Now is the time to insist upon the settlement of the Palestine question recently unanimously agreed to by a joint Anglo-American commission. Now is the time to insist upon protecting the rights and credit of the people of the United States of America. Common sense demands that we must call a halt some time. The American taxpayers are now at the breaking point. We cannot bankrupt the American people, even though the cause of attempting to rescue England is a "holy" one. Because of the hundreds of letters and petitions that have come to my desk in opposition to this loan, I have given the whole subject long and mature consideration and study.

What is the present position of the people of the Sixth Congressional District of Wisconsin now? How much will this proposed loan add to the existing burden? I have prepared a table that clearly depicts the situation. Treasury statistics show that on June 21 of this year the direct public debt of this Nation exceeded $268,000,000,000. On a per capita basis, this staggering sum represents an actual debt of over $2,000 for every man, woman, and child in the Nation. Bear in mind that in the tables herewith presented we do not portray the whole sad picture. No account is taken of the contingent liabilities of the Federal Government—the guaranteed loans and insurance obligations which run into several hundred billions of dollars. We do not include the State, county, municipal, and private debt, which, according to latest available official data, aggregates another $176,000,000,000. In preparing the table included herein we only show the per capita debt as related to the admitted direct public debt as of June 21, 1946.

The tabulation follows:

What the British loan will mean to the Sixth District of Wisconsin

	British loan, $3,750,000,000 (exclusive of the $650,000,000 to be loaned to Britain to cancel $25,000,000,000 due United States for lend-lease)	Direct public debt as of June 21, 1946, $268,750,000,000. Thiensville	19,350	1,290,000	953,975
Winneconne	27,930	1,862,000	838,759

It will be observed from the above tabulation that the Sixth District's share on a per capita basis of the direct public debt as of June 21, 1946, was $568,228,000. If the loan to Britain is accomplished, the district share of the direct public debt on a per capita basis will be increased by $8,523,420, making the total $576,751,420 as against a total assessed valuation of all the real and personal property of the district of $450,848,031.

As a further illustration, the per capita share for the city of Sheboygan of the direct public debt on June 21, 1946, was $81,276,000, and if the British loan is made, a sum of $1,219,140 will be added, making a total of $82,495,140 as against a total assessed valuation for the city of Sheboygan of $53,743,140; the per capita share of the direct public debt for the city of Oshkosh on June 21, 1946, was $78,178,000, and if the loan is consummated, this will be increased by $1,172,670, or total of $79,350,670 as against a total assessed valuation of $48,186,125; the Fond du Lac share of the direct public debt was $58,584,000, and if the loan is made, this will be increased by $878,760 for a total of $59,462,760 of indebtedness compared with an assessed valuation of $36,538,880; the city of West Bend's share of the public debt in June was $10,904,000 and will be increased by $163,560 to a total of $11,067,000 if the loan is voted as against an assessed valuation of $8,821,572; the people of the village of Campbellsport owed $2,188,000 of the national debt in June, and this indebtedness will be increased by the British loan by $32,820 or a total of $2,220,820 as against an assessed valuation of $1,010,356.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have a right to demand adequate housing for veterans and for civilians. The proposed "loan" to Britain would provide 250,000 $10,000 furnished homes for American citizens and place an automobile in the garage of everyone of those homes. This staggering sum would provide a 500-bed hospital in every county in the United States and would enable us to carry out the educational commitments of the GI bill by providing suitable educational facilities to veterans. I cannot vote for such an additional burden on the American people.

Truman OPA Gamble Blamed on Muddling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, much is being said and will be said relating to the confusion resulting from President Truman's veto of the OPA bill.

Mr. David Lawrence, one of America's leading columnists, places the responsibility for this confusion squarely upon the President. His article dealing with this matter appeared in the Washington Evening Star on July 1, 1946, and the same is inserted herewith as a part of my remarks:

TRUMAN OPA GAMBLE BLAMED ON MUDDLING—COMMENTATOR DECLARES PRESIDENT HIMSELF UNBALANCED ECONOMY

(By David Lawrence)

President Truman took a long chance when he vetoed the OPA bill. In effect, he placed a bet that the confusion resulting from his veto on the eve of the statutory expiration of OPA would arouse the country and force a majority in Congress to reverse itself.

This kind of gambling with the public welfare is not the product of objective reasoning or dispassionate statesmanship. It is the tragic consequence of muddled thinking which seeks to shift the blame to others.

For actually it is President Truman himself who has unbalanced the postwar economy and forced prices up above ceilings and thus brought on a wave of black-market operations and inflationary trends.

CONSEQUENCES ALREADY HERE

Mr. Truman now cries out that failure to pass another OPA bill will bring dire consequences. But some of those consequences are already here. The grant of wage increases in major industries by White House intervention and political expediency was the first cause of the congressional revolt against price ceilings. It was an attempt by the President and his subordinates to squeeze out the profits and make industry and business bear all the increased costs. This finally provided an opposition strength in Congress that brought on the passage of the Taft amendment which Mr. Truman criticizes so clearly in his message.

It is the President who has blocked the progress of reconversion and if there were a parliamentary system in the United States such as prevails in Canada, Mr. Truman would be voted out of office today by a landslide, for he has failed to construe accurately the feeling of the people and he has abused the veto power in the interest of political minorities from which he apparently expects support at the polls.

The President's veto message has in it many plausible statements but Mr. Truman presented only one side of the story. He omitted to tell the American people what he and his officials had done to create the high costs which business and industry now want covered by increased prices. Mr. Truman alone is responsible for decisions in labor disputes that have added billions a year to manufacturing and distributing costs. Not a word is to be found in the President's message about the grasping policies of the labor union groups in the industrial communities.

INCREASED COSTS IGNORED

Instead, rather nonchalantly and almost indifferently, the President refers to the ending of major labor disputes as if the increased costs resulting from his own blundering policies were too trivial to speak of in a message discussing the economic structure of the Nation at a critical time. Naturally, the labor-wing leaders applauded the veto. For the President, transferring the blame for the high cost to management, had left the unions an alibi to help them escape censure.

The OPA died last night and it should not be revived. Theoretically, of course, a case can be made out for rigid controls of both wages and prices, but since Mr. Truman has a blind eye where wage increases are concerned and since he has insisted on stimulating the biggest wave of wage inflation the Nation has ever known, the only alternative is to put the question of prices up to the public and let nature take its course. There is no other way now. It is too late to try to reestablish controls where one-sided action has upset the national economy.

REJECTED LEADERS' ADVICE

Efforts will be made, of course, this week to continue rent control or some other special phases of price control, but the time has gone by when an orderly handling of prices can be expected. Mr. Truman was advised by leaders of his own party that it was the compromise OPA bill or nothing, and the President chose stubbornly to disregard that advice and take long chances. He chose to throw the Nation into confusion and uncertainty. He mistakenly assumed the public would blame Congress and not the White House. He assumed prices would skyrocket. They will not. For buyers will strike when prices get too high to bear.

The economy will have to balance itself and it will do so eventually, though a well-ordered system of both wage and price controls could have been established and thus would have saved the Nation the pain of reconversion that now faces the public. But since leadership vanished from the White House Congress had to assert itself.

The abandonment of the OPA is really more than a repudiation of inept bureaucracy. It is a repudiation of Mr. Truman by a majority of both Houses of Congress. It may mean that the politicians who have been advising the President that this is the road to reelection will discover that they have actually blocked the road to renomination. The poor record which Mr. Truman is making does not deserve a second nomination.

Statehood for Hawaii Supported by Committee for Maritime Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD I include therein the resolution adopted by the Committee for Maritime Unity at its convention of May 6–11, 1946, in San Francisco, supporting statehood for Hawaii. The resolution follows:

The recent recommendation by a congressional subcommittee that the Territory of Hawaii now meets the necessary requirements for statehood opens the final stage of the struggle of the people of Hawaii for full citizenship.

The committee's recommendation appeared on January 24, 1946, less than a week after the President's message to Congress urging "that Congress promptly accede to the wishes of the people of Hawaii that the Territory be admitted to statehood in our Union."

There are many grounds justifying statehood for Hawaii. Some are statistical and may be easily enumerated:

Hawaii's area is twice as large as the combined area of Delaware and Rhode Island.

Hawaii's population exceeds that of nine States—Vermont, Delaware, Wyoming, Nevada, New Hampshire, Idaho, Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah.

Honolulu, the capital of the Territory, is the fortieth city of the United States in size.

Hawaii's population density exceeds that of 31 States.

Hawaii's dollar volume of manufactures, including only the milling of sugarcane and excluding the value of agricultural production, exceeds that of Vermont, North Dakota, South Dakota, Delaware, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, and Nevada.

Hawaii's employment in manufacturing is larger than that of North and South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and Nevada.

Hawaii, in 1940, had 91,821 children enrolled in public elementary and secondary schools—more than in New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware, Wyoming, and Nevada.

Hawaii's children averaged 171.9 days per year in school—more than 20 days above the average for all of the United States and half again as high as in Mississippi.

Hawaii in 1939 had 22,699 people paying Federal income taxes, and the total tax exceeded that of 13 States, while the tax per capita of total population exceeded that of 34 States.

Hawaii's corporations in 1939 paid more taxes than the corporations of 14 States, including Oregon, Mississippi, and Utah.

Hawaii's record in the 48 years since it became a territory justifies granting of statehood and negates the claim of opponents of statehood.

Hawaii is not remote. Pearl Harbor proved that attack on Hawaii meant involvement of the United States in war. In the air age Hawaii is days and weeks closer to Washington than California was when it achieved statehood in 1850.

Hawaii is not small. No State excepting Oklahoma had a larger population when it became a State than Hawaii now has.

Hawaii is not foreign. The Territory of Hawaii, an American melting pot of the west, has today a smaller percentage of foreign-born residents than have the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, and California.

Hawaii is not different. Its language is English, its people thoroughly American, its Honolulu streets as typical of the United States as those of Hanford, Calif., or Hartford, Conn.

But what of the things Hawaii is?

Hawaii is vital to our economic life. Producing 80 percent of the world's pineapple pack and an enormous share of United States sugar, it is a vital link in the American economy.

Hawaii is loyal. No sabotage occurred in Hawaii during the war. There was no mass eviction of citizens of Japanese ancestry or citizenship, and without those loyal workers of Japanese derivation Hawaii could not have become our foremost military and naval base in the Pacific.

Hawaii has produced heroes. No outfit in the American Army won more medals and commendations than the One Hundredth Infantry, composed largely of Japanese-Americans from Hawaii, or its sister unit, the Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team.

Hawaii is of age. Denied direct voting representation in Congress, it has had only local self-government, yet the Territorial legislature is democratically elected and representative of the people of the Territory. The political record of Hawaii in recent years is proof of its right to statehood.

Hawaii is progressive. Democratic political action has changed the face of Hawaii and set Hawaii socially ahead of any mainland States by extension of minimum wage legislation to agricultural workers and inclusion of agricultural labor in legislation protecting the right of unions to organize and bargain collectively.

Hawaii would do credit as the forty-ninth State. Mature economically and politically, democratic, thoroughly American, Hawaii has earned the full privileges and benefits of statehood, by its splendid compliance with the obligations and duties of citizenship.

It is time for the Congress of the United States to open is doors and to extend to Hawaii the rights and privileges which the President and a congressional committee have found that Hawaii's people are due.

This national convention of maritime unions goes on record to:

1. Support congressional bills for statehood for Hawaii. Each union should request a specific commitment from its Senators and Representatives that they will support statehood for Hawaii and will speed a vote on statehood legislation.

2. Enlist the support of CIO, AFL, and railroad brotherhoods, unions, and on nonlabor organizations in the campaign for immediate statehood for Hawaii.

Business Goes On as Usual in Salisbury After OPA Dies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DUDLEY G. ROE
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. ROE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a news item from the Salisbury Times, Salisbury, Md.

Our people on the Eastern Shore are delighted that the OPA is dead, and that Chester Bowles who will go down in history as the great American dictator, has been relegated to private life where we trust he will remain the rest of his natural life.

The news item follows:

BUSINESS GOES ON AS USUAL IN SALISBURY AFTER OPA DIES

It was business as usual in Salisbury today and, unless a shopper had read the newspapers or listened to the radio over the week end he would never know that the OPA was dead.

One confusing point remained, that of sugar which was controlled by the Department of Agriculture through the OPA. With the probability that controls on that may be continued the American Stores here halted the sale of sugar until the question was clarified.

Grocery and meat stores are maintaining present prices but expect changes to come in dairy products such as milk, butter, and cheese and in meats.

Joshua H. Richardson, of Wicomico Meat and Grocery, said that milk, butter, cheese, and meat increases would have to come because the present prices have been held down through subsidies paid to the producers. With the end of OPA these subsidies are also at an end and, instead of making indirect payment through taxes, the payment is direct with the purchase of those commodities.

"Everything on our shelves is staying at its present price," he said. "We have no meat. When we get it at the new price we will just add the additional cost in. We are not planning any changes in our mark-up."

Charles Bloodsworth, American Stores manager, said that except for the freezing of sugar sales in his store no one would know that OPA was at an end. He said that no immediate change in prices was planned.

The end of OPA made no change in the cost of construction here. Fred P. Adkins, president of E. S. Adkins Co., said that there was no change in policy of that firm and that present prices will be adhered to.

Graham Gunby, of L. W. Gunby Co., said that no price changes are being made. "If they will just let the factories go to work Gunby's prices will probably be lower," he said.

There was no immediate effect in the end of rent control although, for most landlords, a new rent period begins today.

George Chandler, of Larmar Corp., said, "We have had some rents which have been out of line and should be raised but we are not going to do anything now. Although it was almost definite that a 15-percent increase in rents would be granted by the OPA we are not taking it at this time. Everyone seems inclined to take a conservative view and I hope everyone will go along and be reasonable without the OPA."

S. Denmead Kolb, local realtor, said that he did not contemplate any action on properties which he handles.

WELCOME OPA'S END

Restaurant operators agreed that no price changes were in sight and welcomed the end of the OPA as removing the black market which added to their costs.

John W. West said that if any businessman should favor OPA he should because his daughter, Margaret Louise West, is a secretary in the office of Paul Porter and was secretary in Chester Bowles office. "She was home last week," he said, "and I told her then I hoped she would lose her job."

The OPA was a wartime necessity, he said, but now it will be "a great saving to every man to be rid of it. It will keep the black market away from us."

James H. English, Jr., at English Grill, said that present prices would be maintained. The only change, he said, may be in the return of some items to the menu. Under price control some items had been dropped because of cost. They may be returned with a price which will give a reasonable mark-up. English said that he hoped common sense would demonstrate that the need for OPA had ended.

Richard T. Pillsbury, manager of the Wicomico Hotel, said that no changes were being made in menu or room prices. Any changes made necessary in the future, he said, would be reasonable and based to meet competition.

Boyd Brittingham, automobile dealer, said that the end of OPA had not affected his price schedules as to new cars, used cars, accessories or services. "It's business as usual and prices as usual," he said. "It's time for the country to use a little horse sense and get back to work."

Salisbury's leading department stores were not contemplating any price change. Arthur Ahrens, manager of Schleisner, said that pricing charts would be followed as usual in establishing selling prices. William Powell, of R. E. Powell and Co., said that no change was being made in merchandise they had. Owen Davis, of Benjamins, said that no mark-ups were being made.

All were awaiting word from various suppliers as to how the suppliers were holding to price lines.

Inflammable Play Suits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, inflammable cowboy suits worn by little children have caused death and injury in the Passaic, N. J., area, and again there is asked the question why the Congress permits the shipment in interstate commerce of such dangerous fabrics.

When several tragedies occurred last year, bills were introduced and hearings were held by a subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It was reported that action failed because spokesmen for several industrial and research groups could not agree on a formula to determine inflammability.

I believe the United States Bureau of Standards will be able to present a workable formula, and most certainly we cannot afford to delay further congressional action to stop traffic in quick-burning suits that so soon develop into human bonfires. Christmas is not so far away, and the innocent young Lone Rangers and Gene Autrys of America have a right to see this nefarious business stopped right at the source.

Last week the Eastern Association of Fire Chiefs, meeting in New York, heard the report that the United States is the No. 1 firetrap of the world. It might be well for the Congress, while ruling out inflammable-textile fabrics, to probe also the fire threat poised by dangerous toys and other articles.

The Passaic (N.J.) Herald-News pleads for action in the following editorial of recent date:

SO THAT IT CAN'T HAPPEN AGAIN

Two little boys died, four others were horribly burned while at play in Passaic and Wallington within the last 3 years.

Investigation by the Herald-News this month showed that the six accidents had a common cause—the highly flammable character of the play suits worn by the little victims.

Publication of the findings stopped Passaic retail sale of these shaggy, Gene Autry chaps, which ignite so swiftly in the presence of flame. The Passaic manufacturers discontinued production of that particular garment before the cause of the fatalities was publicized and replaced it with a garment of safer materials. It is unlikely that these bonfire tragedies will happen again in this vicinity but they could happen elsewhere.

Representative JOHNSON of California has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill, H. R. 5445, which would "prohibit the transportation of certain inflammable textile fabrics in interstate commerce."

The bill defines "inflammable textile fabric" as any wearing apparel of combustible fibers which has a nap or pile which will burn at a rate above 1 inch a second under National Bureau of Standards tests. It provides penalties for violation of the act and authorizes Federal district attorneys to ask the United States courts for injunctions restraining such commerce.

The Johnson bill has been referred to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in which—because of the congressional log jam—it may be pigeon-holed for the year.

Representative BOREN, of Oklahoma, has a similar bill ready for presentation.

Although merchants in the vicinity of Passaic removed these quick-burning suits from their shelves as soon as they read the results of this newspaper's investigation, all over the country there may be storekeepers stocking such lethal garments and little boys begging mothers to buy them cowboy suits. Surely Congress can spare an hour—it should take no more—to expedite a simple piece of legislation which requires no debate.

Political Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of June 28, 1946:

POLITICAL ACTION

"Politics" has been so abused and ridiculed that many otherwise patriotic citizens feel that this most important of all functions of citizenship is somehow dishonorable.

Politics is many things to many people, but at bottom it continues to be what the dictionary says: "The science and art of government."

In a government which, like that of the United States, rests in the hands of the electorate, everybody is in politics, and politics is what all the people make it.

For most of our national life, ours has been two-party government. These have not always been the same two parties, and also there have nearly always been several lesser parties with a following too small to have any bearing on the elections.

There are arguments for and against the two-party system, as contrasted with the multi-party system in many foreign lands. But one of the most important advantages of our method is that it tends to emphasize the party rather than the individual leader. This is wholesome; it brings up another phase of the old truth that rule by law is freedom—rule by man is tyranny.

The principles for which a political party stands, and the program and policies which it promises in a given campaign, are the products of many minds as well as of long evolution.

If liberty is really worth while—and many others besides Patrick Henry have believed it more valuable than life itself—mankind needs always to beware of putting too much power in an individual. One of the most important points in the American plan of government is the careful system of checks and balances by which the authority of the President is restricted.

How does a party function? There was a time when every voter had a clear understanding of the processes, but in recent years a mystery has grown up about this subject, largely because many men and women made no effort to enlighten themselves.

The Republican Party organization in Pennsylvania is a party government created by election. Every registered Republican is entitled to help start the process. The local committeemen are elected at the primaries. Each higher level is elected in turn.

This method, properly enough for the Republican Party, is the plan of representative Republican government. The real authority is in the hands of the registered Republican voters, and they delegate it by their majorities.

By this process the various Republican committees are chosen, local, county, and State. Each committee names its chairman. The State committee consists of delegates named on the basis of senatorial districts. This State committee is the highest Republican authority in the Commonwealth. It has such duties as selection of a State chairman, who is the chief executive of the party; creation of the machinery for financing campaigns, adopting the party platform, etc.

Only those who are ignorant of the facts, or willfully chose to disregard them, assume that the party organization is a sort of rubber stamp for mysterious background figures, often unidentified, who make the real decisions in smoke-filled rooms.

On the contrary, the State committee, representing every section of Pennsylvania, is the active and authoritative agent of the Republican Party membership.

There has been, for example, some misrepresentation concerning the selection of the official Republican ticket for the recent nominations. These were chosen as a result of a series of conferences held by Governor Martin and other high State officials and party leaders.

But the jury was the State committee. Various suggested names were ruled out when polls of the State committee showed opposition to them. The result of the conferences was the finding of a slate completely satisfactory to the State committee. Its endorsement was unanimous, and this verdict was backed up by 65 out of 67 county chairmen.

Groups such as the PAC are fond of arguing that this type of procedure is undemocratic. Doubtless a great many persons are led to believe, through the so-called education of the PAC in the field of political action, that they are left out in the cold and forced to accept decisions about candidates which they had no part in making.

The fact is that if any registered Republican in the State did not have a share in the selection and nomination of candidates in the spring primaries it was his own fault—not that of the system, nor of any individual or group of them.

The PAC itself has a wholly different background in politics. The names of the candidates it must back are picked for it by remote control—in New York or Washington, usually; in the spring primaries, from the CIO meetings in Atlantic City.

The Democratic elector does not have a word to say about whom the PAC supports or opposes. He is not consulted about the officers and press agents of the PAC, nor are these chosen through democratic processes, despite the name of the Democratic Party.

Similarly, the CIO employee who is forced to contribute to the PAC's campaign funds and who is bullied into voting for the PAC's list of candidates, has no voice in determining who those candidates will be, nor who will head the PAC, who will determine its political strategy, and what its methods shall be.

The PAC, for all its talk of being nonpolitical, is simply a new version of an old evil which has haunted the Democratic Party since its earliest days.

Unlike the Republican Party in many phases of its set-up, it is unlike it also in that it has rarely been self-governing—although that is a fixed principle of Republican organization.

Again and again the Democratic Party has fallen into the hands of outside groups over which the electorate had no authority. Frequently these have been social clubs—Tammany Hall is the best-known example. Tammany Hall was seized upon by Aaron Burr during his bid to buy the Presidency with corrupt political practices; and it has never forgotten some of the Burr lessons in tricky politics.

PAC has driven a wedge into the high command of the Democratic Party and forced upon it a socialistic program against which the rank and file of Democratic voters have revolted—and which would make the party's founder, Thomas Jefferson, roll over in his grave.

Secretary of the Interior J. A. Krug Favors Statehood for Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein the report of Secretary of the Interior J. A. Krug on legislation enabling the Territory of Hawaii to become a State. The report, which was addressed to the gentleman from Georgia, Chairman HUGH PETERSON of the House Committee on Territories, is as follows:

You have asked for the views of this Department on the question of statehood for Hawaii. I strongly recommend that the Congress now enact legislation enabling the Territory to become a State.

On December 22, 1945, this Department publicly endorsed statehood for Hawaii, for the reason that the Hawaiians have for 46 years had a political status which in fact has been provisional statehood. They have enjoyed the privilege of electing a Delegate to Congress, members of the Territorial legislature and other local officials. Through their elected representatives, they have enacted progressive social and economic legislation comparing most favorably with that of mainland States. Although the population of Hawaii is highly cosmopolitan, with a blending of many races, there is no race problem, as such, in the Territory. The fact that Hawaii imports from the continental United States most of its consumer goods and exports to it most of the products of the two major industries, sugar and pineapple, and the close social ties between Hawaii and the mainland, are largely responsible for the overwhelming sentiment in Hawaii in favor of statehood. At a plebiscite in 1940, the vote was two to one in favor of admission to the Union; there is a little doubt that the odds would be more heavily weighted if a similar poll were to be taken now. Mainland sentiment, too, as demonstrated in a recent Gallup poll, favors admission in proportions of more than three to one.

For a comprehensive and convincing demonstration of the Territory's present ability to assume the responsibilities of statehood, I refer you to the splendid record compiled by the subcommittee of your committee which held hearings on statehood in the Territory during January 1946. Every possible aspect of Territorial life was examined and considered by the subcommittee. Hearings were held on the principal islands and opportunities were afforded all interested persons, in favor of or opposed to statehood, to be heard. On the basis of the hearings and exhibits, your subcommittee's report found that despite the many racial groups, such evidence of bloc voting as exists indicates that the practice has not assumed and is not likely to assume serious proportions; that the Hawaiians are very politically conscious, 85.03 percent of the registered voters having voted in the 1944 election; that the total of internal revenue collections of the Territory during 1944 and 1945 exceeded that of several States; that the commerce of Hawaii with the mainland exceeds that between the mainland and all but a few foreign countries; and that illiteracy among native-born citizens is almost nonexistent. Your subcommittee concluded that the mixed racial complexion of Hawaii should not be considered an obstacle to statehood; that the people of Hawaii have shown themselves capable of self-government; that though there is economic dominance by the Big Five of a great portion of Hawaii's economy, it has not prevented establishment of many varied businesses nor the passage of progressive labor, educational, and social legislation; and that a majority of the people in the Territory are in favor of immediate statehood and that no organized opposition appeared. It was recommended that your committee give immediate consideration to legislation to admit Hawaii to statehood.

In this conclusion I heartily concur. The period of apprenticeship served by the people of Hawaii should now be brought to a close and on the basis of the amply demonstrated readiness of Hawaii for statehood, the Congress should fulfill its early and reiterated pledges to admit the Territory to the Union when it was qualified.

Sincerely yours,

J. A. KRUG,
Secretary of the Interior.

American Small Businessmen Strike Against America's Public Enemy No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, any man possessed with reasonable intelligence who is observing the political effort that is being expressed in various sections of the country readily observes the extraordinary activity of the Political Action Committee of the CIO. It is moving with force in every State in the Union. In each separate State it may have a different approach. Nevertheless their methods are readily discovered. Candidates sponsored by this organization are the beneficiary of campaign funds rivaling anything of the old days when we used to hear about sponsored candidates by large monopolistic business enterprises.

If in this new day, so generally referred to as the day of the common man, we have changed the system, we have certainly not changed the practice.

Under unanimous consent, I include herewith a statement from the Conference of American Small Business Organizations, the address of which is the Board of Trade Building, Chicago, Ill., the subject of which is entitled "American Small Businessmen Strike Against America's Public Enemy No. 1":

AMERICAN SMALL BUSINESSMEN STRIKE AGAINST AMERICA'S PUBLIC ENEMY NO. 1

Wake up America! A cash price has been placed on our Congress.

The Red hyphenates: "There can be no divided allegiance here. Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all. We have room for but one flag, and this excludes the Red flag, which symbolizes all wars against liberty and civilization, just as much as it excludes any foreign flag of a nation to which we are hostile." (Theodore Roosevelt.)

This advertisement is directed to Americans of every shade of political belief, every religious faith, every racial origin, every man and woman who believes in the sanctity of our Constitution and Bill of Rights.

Expression of differences in politics, religion, race, are our privilege, our heritage; they are a part of our American way of life, but sabotage of our Republic is not. This American way of life is now in danger from an enemy within. We designate this enemy America's public enemy No. 1 because the avowed purpose of this enemy is to tear down our time-tested, and, to us, our sacred form of government, and substitute for it the Communist philosophy of a totalitarian dictatorship.

The Political Action Committee of the CIO brands itself when it brazenly announces, through the public press, a drive to collect $6,000,000 by assessing its members $1 per head for a campaign fund to elect its stooges to the United States Senate and House of Representatives and State legislatures in the 1946 election.

This is the cash price the Communist-controlled PAC is willing to pay to dominate our Government.

This is a challenge to the American people.

If the Communists can raise six millions, the American people can, and we believe they will, raise 10 times that amount, overnight, to defeat these stooges.

WHAT IS COMMUNISM?

The following statement was presented and appears on page A1088 in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"Communism is not only a creed. It is a plan of campaign.

"A Communist is not only the holder of certain opinions; he is the pledged adept of a well-thought-out means of endorsing them. The anatomy of discontent and revolution has been studied in every phase and aspect, and a veritable drill book prepared in a scientific spirit for subverting all existing institutions. The method of enforcement is as much a part of the Communist faith as the doctrine itself. At first the time-honored principles of liberalism and democracy are involved to shelter the infant organism. Free speech, the right of public meeting, every form of lawful political agitation, and constitutional right are paraded and asserted. Alliance is sought with every popular movement toward the left.

"No faith need be, indeed may be, kept with non-Communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence from mob revolt to private assassination must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of liberty and democracy; and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the brotherhood, all opposition, all contrary opinions must be extinguished by death.

"Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterward broken; liberty but a sentimental folly unworthy of the logician. The absolute rule of a self-chosen priesthood according to the dogmas it has learned by rote is to be imposed upon mankind without mitigation progressively forever. All this, set out in prosy textbooks, written also in blood in the history of several powerful nations, is the Communist's faith and purpose. To be forewarned should be to be forearmed."

THIS CAN'T HAPPEN HERE?

Don't be too sure. It is going to depend entirely upon you—the real red-blooded American reader of this statement. Communism has made tremendous headway in this country by:

(a) Infiltration and taking over control of labor unions (as it has the CIO), and patriotic social, political, reform, civic organizations, and any others possible, to become "fronts";

(b) Infiltration of Government departments and bureaus with alien-minded philosophers and economists (see reports of the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities);

(c) Electing Communist stooges to our National and State legislatures;

(d) Passing legislation to regiment free enterprise into the Communist system of controlled economy.

The CIO-PAC is now propagandizing and promoting the passage of bills to perpetuate Government control of jobs (U. S. Employment Service), Government control of wages (U. S. Employment Service and Office of Economic Stabilization), Government control of prices (OPA), Government control of profits (OPA), Government control of raw materials (Civilian Production Administration), Government control of production (Civilian Production Administration).

These bills now before Congress are the entering wedge for totalitarianism. This is "planned economy"—planned from the allocation of raw materials to the ultimate consumer. And "balanced production" is the brain trusters' term for Government monopoly, which will tell us how much shall be produced, by whom, and at what price. By any standard it is economic dictatorship; pure and simple state socialism.

This plan is being put into effect insidiously now, day by day, by sugar-coated, sweet-sounding social legislation, each piece fitting into a perfect pattern of a Communist system of planned economy under which free, competitive enterprise cannot, and is not intended to, survive.

WHY A POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LABOR?

American labor does not need a Political Action Committee any more than does the farmer, the professional man, or the businessman. Neither the farm group, the professional group, nor the business group, as such, would tolerate alien-minded, self-appointed leaders to use them or their great influence to destroy their own liberties and the liberties of all our people.

WE DON'T BELIEVE LABOR WANTS A PAC

We don't believe that the rank and file of the CIO want it. We challenge the PAC to prove that more than 40 percent of the CIO membership joined the union willingly. The majority joined because the closed shop and maintenance of union membership compelled them to join before they could get and hold a job.

Any group which is organized to spread disunity, riots, rule-or-ruin anarchy, should be ostracized. Those alien philosophers should be put aboard a ship and headed for their Utopia, with a one-way passage.

WAKE UP AMERICA

A campaign fund of $6,000,000 to elect Communist stooges to the Congress and the legislatures is now under way. This sum, divided equally among the 432 congressional districts (plus 3 Congressmen at Large), would amount to about $14,000 to be spent by CIO-PAC to elect each stooge Congressman.

This is the cash price the PAC has placed on our Congress!

This treacherous act makes real American blood boil and it's high time someone dared to call it public enemy No. 1, and called upon the American people to make war on it—to destroy it.

Fellow Americans this is a challenge to you.

Don't let this happen here! Don't let the last remaining citadel of freedom disappear from this earth. Be as partisan or nonpartisan as you please, but be an American first.

WHAT CAN YOU DO?

You can help elect anti-PAC-Communist candidates to the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and your State legislature—men who you believe will live up to their oath of office to uphold and protect the Constitution of the United States. You know the Communists won't. This is your job.

You can also get behind and support the efforts of American small business to fight for the preservation of that free-enterprise system on which our revered form of government is based, and that traditional private initiative and driving power inherited from their forefathers, which has made this the greatest Nation on earth, and has given all the people of this country the highest standard of living on this earth for 170 years.

Seven million seven hundred and fifty thousand owners of the three million one hundred thousand small business concerns in this country constitute the backbone (92 percent) of our entire economy.

They employ 65 percent of all industrial wage earners.

They produce 45 percent of our entire industrial output.

Collectively they are the biggest taxpayers in every community, in every county, in every State, and in the Nation.

Collectively they are the biggest asset in America.

America can't remain free without them.

The American people can break the PAC stranglehold by:

1. Abolishing the closed shop, check-off, and maintenance-of-union membership. No law on the statute books of this country is more un-American than this provision of the Wagner Labor Relations Act. It is intolerable to compel any American citizen to pay tribute to any group for the privilege of getting and holding a job to support himself, his wife, and his children.

2. Abolishing jurisdictional and sympathy strikes in Nation-wide industries. The CIO was built on membership by industries. Under this plan of union organization a strike in one plant permits the national officers to call strikes in every other unionized plant in the particular line of industry, unless each local plant meets the demands of the first union to strike. This involves business and workers which have no grievances and no interest in a local dispute.

3. Make all labor contracts legally binding on labor and business alike and enforceable by court action.

This is what must be done before your individual right to live and thrive under America's free competitive system can again be secure.

Unless constructive 50–50 labor-relations bills are made ready, the owners of PAC will get exactly what they want—by default.

This conference has drafted a 13-point code of labor relations based on the basic principle that what is best for the country as a whole is best for labor as a whole, and best for business as a whole. Two hundred and fifty thousand copies of this 13-point code have already been mailed to small businessmen throughout the country, but we must reach the millions.

Finally, we will draft the necessary legislation and submit it to Congress as the deliberated labor-relations opinion of American business and the public.

As such, we shall make every legitimate effort to get it passed.

Join with us now. The way is described below.

AGAIN, WAKE UP, AMERICA!

It will require time, know-how, and money to pull the fangs of communism in America.

As far as we are aware, this conference is the only business group which has dared to challenge the Communist-dominated CIO-PAC to a showdown.

This is a battle for self-preservation for every businessman individually, and in which every trade association, chamber of commerce, and every other business group in the country should unite with us in a common effort to preserve free enterprise.

This conference will gladly devote its time and everything else it takes to do this job. But we must have the moral and financial support of the American people. This is absolutely necessary. You, the reader, must let your Senator and Congressman know how you feel about this. Within this conference you can make your voice heard and be effective.

After all, this is your job. We can only act for you—spearhead the effort of the people—to keep America American.

Send for your copy of the Fair Labor Relations Code, vote for or against each item and then send it, with your expressed opinion, to your Congressman.

THE CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN SMALL BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS.
CHICAGO, ILL.

Editorial Enlightenment on OPA Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the following editorials, taken from the Rockford Morning Star of Sunday, June 30, 1946, explain very clearly and bluntly the situation confronting the Nation today as a result of the President's veto of the OPA extension bill. The first editorial calls attention to the conflict in ideas that existed between Mr. Bowles and the Congress and the natural result to be expected from such a conflict. Certainly the people today are more confused than ever, if that is possible. No one can predict what the outcome of the veto will be. I believe the editorials correctly reflect the feeling of a great majority of the American people.

HE STAYED TOO LONG

Had Chester Bowles resigned at an earlier date, after it had become clear that one man's way was not to have clearance over the necessities and the mood of the country, an OPA extension bill would by now have been ready to take effect at 1 minute after midnight tonight. Bowles was given notice with passage of the House version of the bill, as how Congress felt about OPA extension without qualification. And since every Member of the Lower House is up for reelection, Bowles had notice of how the public felt, for those Representatives were staking their political futures on their verdict.

Bowles was convinced, apparently, that if he threw enough tantrums, he could have his way. At a time when the Senate was prepared to give serious thought to a price act extension bill that would provide a proper bridge from war controls to peacetime operations—a decontrol measure, to be sure, but one suited to the country's necessity—he stayed on. He needled the legislative branch; he made proposals that were quite outside our governmental philosophy; he interfered in the legislative process as no appointive officer has ever dared to do. The issue of Bowles became almost greater than the issue of price act extension.

He acted thus, to be sure, not as OPA Chief, but as Stabilization Director. But the public needed no demonstration that he was root, stock, and branch of OPA-ism. And with new official price advances greeting the public each day under the old act, the public needed no demonstration that OPA-ism is economic confusion.

There have been many who have pressed the logic of a complete dissolution of OPA. But Congress as a whole felt that a decontrol measure was more prudent. Other leechlike bureaus have been removed by graduated steps, and Congress sought to apply the same method to OPA. The bill which finally emerged from conference committee was not an unsatisfactory bill, and it represented a vast amount of study. A full year was allowed for a tapering-off process. Rent control was left untouched. There was provision that, as commodity production increased, subsidy and controls were to be removed. It was a safe and well-constructed bridge to eventual free economy.

To call it an explosively inflationary bill is untrue. Moreover, that label charges complete lack of congressional fidelity to the public; and Congress has to give an accounting to the public—an obligation from which appointive servants who seek to be masters are spared.

Mr. Truman has seen fit to veto this legislation, and, as in the matter of the Case bill, not for sound reasons but for political reasons. The House sustained the veto, 173 to override; 142 to sustain.

An effort will be made to blame Congress for the confusion which now ensues. The public will know where to lay the blame.

THE SAGA OF BARKLEY

Senator BARKLEY, administration leader in the Senate, labored manfully to get action on the OPA extension conference report in the Senate. He pointed out that it was the best legislation that could be obtained; he used every parliamentary tack; he even went so far as to seek the invocation of cloture to halt a filibuster—a step that naturally antagonized his southern peers.

Having taken these steps, and made the assumption publicly that the bill would be acceptable to Mr. Truman as the best he could get—an assumption which Congress would inevitably believe rested on BARKLEY'S counsel with Mr. Truman—BARKLEY now has the thing for which he labored thrown back into his teeth with a veto. And that veto was advised not by men elected to office, but by appointive officials, many of whom have never faced the electorate.

It is interesting to recall that this kind of snub has happened to BARKLEY before. Back in the early months of 1944, Congress labored on a tax bill. It went to the White House, where Mr. Roosevelt vetoed it with a spiteful message, calling it relief for the greedy and not for the needy. BARKLEY called on the Senate to override the veto. He termed the President's message "a calculated and deliberate assault upon the legislative integrity of every Member of the Congress." He announced simultaneously that he had called a Democratic conference at which he would resign as majority leader. The veto was overridden.

A "Dear Alben" telegram went to BARKLEY immediately from the White House, pleading with him not to resign and calling on the Senate Democrats not to accept his resignation if BARKLEY should resign. The conference maintained BARKLEY in his place.

There followed a great show of amiability. But when BARKLEY felt that he had an excellent opportunity to win the vice presidency in the 1944 convention, particularly after James Byrnes had been torpedoed, BARKLEY found that his courage in the Senate carried a penalty. Truman could be "cleared with Sidney" (Hillman); BARKLEY was likewise torpedoed.

Now the man who could be "cleared with Sidney," and who thus sits in the White House, throws a veto back into the face of hard-working BARKLEY. It is purely incidental that BARKLEY was not even considered for a Supreme Court seat, for which he is admirably qualified.

Such are the rewards of faithful service.

Kansas Farmers Curious Over OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of July 2, 1946:

KANSAS FARMERS CURIOUS OVER OPA—ASK WHO KILLED IT AND FIND EVERYONE WANTS PRICE CONTROL FOR SOMEBODY ELSE

(By James Reston)

HUTCHINSON, KANS., July 1.—It may be the heat or just the beginning of the annual "silly season," but the only point of general agreement in these parts is that the events of the last few days are slightly cockeyed.

This correspondent drove around the farms in the great bend of the Arkansas River yesterday and today and discussed current affairs with the farmers. Here, roughly, and with a little poetic license is a summary of these conversations:

"FARMER. Well, young man, what's new Down East?

"REPORTER. OPA's dead.

"FARMER. That's fine. Now we can get more for our wheat and meat.

"REPORTER. Yes; but the President says you'll probably have to pay more for what you buy. Maybe $225 more for cars and 13 percent more for farm machinery.

"FARMER. They can't do that to us. Prices are too high already. What we want is price control on what we buy and no price control on what we sell.

"REPORTER. That's what labor wants: price control on your wheat and no price control on their wages. Same with industrial management: price control on labor's wages and your wheat but no price control on its products."

JUST WHO IS FOR WHAT?

"FARMER. That makes it tough, don't it? Who killed OPA?

"REPORTER. The President vetoed it.

"FARMER. I thought he was for it.

"REPORTER. He was and he says he's just begun to fight for it, but he wanted more price control so he killed what there was. He blames Senator TAFT for the trouble.

"FARMER. How's that? I thought TAFT was against price control.

"REPORTER. No; he says now he's for price control.

"FARMER. I've missed a lot during the harvest. What ever happened to that fellow Bowles?

"REPORTER. He quit.

"FARMER. But I thought you said the Administration was just beginning to fight for price control. Isn't Bowles for price control?

"REPORTER. Sure, but he recommended that the President veto the price control bill and then he quit.

"FARMER. Don't those people down in Washington agree on anything?

"REPORTER. They agree on one thing: that everybody should use self-restraint.

"FARMER. Who said that?

"REPORTER. The President, Paul Porter, Carroll Reece, the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, Senator Taft, and the CIO.

"FARMER. They did? But judging from what you say that's just what they all lacked.

"REPORTER. You can say that again! What's new in Kansas?

"FARMER. We've had a whopper of a wheat crop. Over a billion bushels all over the country, nearly 225,000,000 bushels in Kansas alone.

"REPORTER. That ought to make you happy.

"FARMER. Happy hell! We're sore. We're restricted by the Government in everything we do. A guy has to be an accountant to run a farm these days.

"REPORTER. You're getting a good price for your wheat, aren't you?

"FARMER. Almost $2 a bushel at the elevator, but if they'd keep off these restrictions and stick to the good old democratic law of supply and demand we'd be getting $2.50 like we did during the last war.

"REPORTER. What did you get in 1931?

"FARMER. Don't even mention that year. That was when we had 'two-bit wheat.' Yes, sir, we got 25 cents a bushel and the crap-shooting wheat boys got cleaned out."

LIBERTY AND HYPOCRISY

"REPORTER. Wasn't the law of supply and demand working then?

"FARMER. Sure, but these restrictions from Washington drive a man crazy. It ain't right. It's an infringement on a man's personal liberty.

"REPORTER. Don't you infringe on people's liberty here in Kansas?

"FARMER. Whaddya mean?

"REPORTER. You have prohibition in this State, don't you?

"FARMER. Sure, but the people want it that way. Besides, nobody enforces it.

"REPORTER. Well, if the people want it that way and it's a law, why don't they enforce it? What kind of hypocrisy is that?

"FARMER. I guess its just plain old human hypocrisy. And speaking of hypocrisy, would you like a drink?

"REPORTER Boy, would I? After trying to make sense out of what's happened since Saturday, I need a drink!"

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I present two telegrams received today from Mr. Claude T. Haupt, Jr., managing director of the Passaic (N. J.) Chamber of Commerce, describing action taken yesterday by the chamber's executive board and its merchants division on the price control situation:

PASSAIC, N. J., July 1, 1946.
Congressman GORDON CANFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The executive board of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce today authorized the following ad to be inserted in our local daily paper, the Herald News:

"Mrs. Housewife, price controls have ended. We are at the crossroads. One way, reasonable prices; the other way, inflation. Members of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce, manufacturers, merchants, and others, are against runaway prices. Its membership is pledged to hold the price line. Do your part to fight inflation. Do not pay more than ceiling prices during this period in which we are all being put to the test. Watch all prices during the crisis."

CLAUDE T. HAUPT, Jr.,
Managing Director, Passaic Chamber of Commerce.

PASSAIC, N. J., July 1, 1946.
Congressman GORDON CANFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The merchants division of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce through their board of directors passed the following resolution:

"The merchants division of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce pledges its members to hold prices at the levels established by OPA.

"In the interest of combating inflation they urge all other merchants to hold the price line.

"The merchants division further urges the buying public to cooperate by refusing to buy merchandise which they know to be overpriced during this crisis."

CLAUDE T. HAUPT, Jr.,
Managing Director, Passaic Chamber of Commerce.

California Observes Dairy Month—Los Angeles County, Calif., and Eighteenth Congressional District, National Dairy Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, throughout my native State of California, and very emphatically in the county of Los Angeles and in the Eighteenth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent in this great Congress, there has been observed, throughout this month of June, Dairy Month. Because California is in top position throughout the Nation in number of cows under test for production, as reported by the Bureau of Dairy Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture, for the eighteenth consecutive year, and because of the many other manifest and adequate reasons for the observing of Dairy Month in California, it now appears also appropriate for me to take a few minutes to call attention of the Members of Congress to Dairy Month in California, and to the status of the California dairy industry and its relationship to that same industry in other States.

Having been attorney and counselor for some dairying enterprises for many years before coming to Congress, and always having had a natural interest in livestock and matters relating to agriculture, it has been an increasing pleasure for me, since coming to Congress, to further inform myself on the increasing relative value and importance of the dairy industry to California and to the Nation and to cooperate with the dairy industry of California in interpreting its needs at the national level.

Referring to some of the sources of my information, I quote the California Dairyman, a most progressive and authoritative monthly magazine published in Hynes, Calif., which is in the Eighteenth Congressional District of California. While it would bear repeating several times, I just wish to say once again, for the benefit of the gentlemen from Wisconsin, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Virginia, Iowa, Vermont, Washington, Minnesota, Arizona, and other States which think in terms of dairying, that the figures and data hereinafter set forth will no doubt cause them to further recognize that California, particularly Los Angeles County and the Eighteenth Congressional District, which I represent, is so far ahead of other States and counties of the Nation in number of cows under test, and other features of the dairy industry, that they will have to say "Hats off." The said California Dairyman recently said:

CALIFORNIA IN TOP POSITION IN COWS UNDER TEST

(By G. E Gordon and D. T. Batchelder, extension specialists in dairying)

California continues to maintain its lead throughout the entire Nation in number of cows under test for production, as reported by the Bureau of Dairy Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture. This is the eighteenth consecutive year that California has maintained this leading position.

KEEP PRODUCTION RECORDS FOR BETTER HERD MANAGEMENT

This is the fourth point of the eight-point dairy program for 1946, and it is obvious that California dairymen are already doing this to a very great extent. The use of milk-production records on each cow in the herd will enable the dairy farmer to develop a high level of efficiency in dairy production. These production records make it possible to cull out the low and inefficient producers, make it possible to feed concentrates to cows according to their needs, and also make it possible to develop sound breeding programs. Sires can be proved through dam-and-daughter comparisons, and heifer calves can be saved from the best cows and best cow families. The information which these production records provide can be used as the foundation upon which to build a successful dairy herd.

The dairy-improvement program in California has for many years emphasized production testing as the basis for sound dairy improvement. This work has also been stressed throughout the United States. The war years had a very great effect upon this production-testing program, as it was exceedingly difficult to secure satisfactory personnel to maintain this work at a high level. Testing throughout the country declined during the first year of the war, but in California it has been possible to build the volume back to the prewar level in spite of an exceedingly heavy turn-over in testers. The testing work in the country as a whole has shown a slight increase since a year ago, and it is anticipated that it will expand materially during the coming year.

The increase in number of cows under test during these difficult times is highly encouraging, as the directory published by the United States Department of Agriculture shows that there are 112,838 cows under test in the herds of 1,337 dairymen in California.

CALIFORNIA LEADS

In total number of cows under test, California is followed by: Wisconsin with 64,021, New York with 63,191, Pennsylvania with 60,215, Michigan with 29,729, Illinois with 29,270, Virginia with 26,243, Iowa with 22,553, Vermont with 19,644, Washington with 19,519, and Minnesota with 19,339 cows.

As stated above, California not only leads all other States in number of cows under standard test, but also has a higher percentage of total cows under test than any other State, with 13.3 percent of the total cows reported on January 1, 1946, being under test in regularly organized standard testing associations. Following California in percentage of their total cows under test are: New Jersey, 11.7; Arizona, 10.6; Connecticut, 7.9; Vermont, 6.5; Pennsylvania, 6.4; Nevada, 6.3; New Hampshire, 6.2; Maine, 5.8; Maryland, 5.6; Virginia, 5.6.

Pennsylvania has a larger number of associations than does any other State, followed by New York and Wisconsin, with California in fourth place. In total number of herds under test, Pennsylvania also leads, followed by Wisconsin, New York, Michigan, Illinois, and California in sixth place. Although California has fewer associations and fewer herds than some of these large dairy States, the large average size of many of our commercial herds results in a much larger number of cows per association than is possible in most States. Utah, with 410 herds under test, leads all other States in percentage of herds on test in comparison with the number of herds of 15 cows or more.

TESTING IS FOUNDATION FOR IMPROVEMENT IN PRODUCTION

Dairy herd improvement association work has been emphasized for many years by the United States Department of Agriculture and the State colleges of agriculture as a foundation for improvement in dairy production. California has emphasized production testing as the foundation for its entire dairy-improvement program, feeling that a high percentage of the total cows must be tested in order to increase the efficiency of dairy production in this State. This large volume of production testing has been an important factor in maintaining the high level of production of California dairy cows. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics reports that California has a higher average production per cow than does any other State in the Union.

California dairymen are to be commended for their efforts in maintaining production-testing at this high level in spite of labor difficulties. This program has undoubtedly been of great influence in increasing the total volume of our dairy products during the war years.

A BIRD IN THE HAND

Why does the American Dairy Cattle Club urge dairymen owning grade cattle to follow a breeding program with their unregistered cows instead of urging them to change to registered? The old adage, a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, explains it. When a dairyman has a high producing herd, he knows what he has. The fact that his cattle cannot be registered does not alter the situation.

Time again dairymen who have tried to replace good unregistered cows with equally good registered cattle—with the expectation that they will be better—have failed to do so. This was demonstrated many, many times when the TB test was eliminating whole herds. It is still demonstrated frequently, although to the credit of the owners of registered cattle, it must be stated that they are trying harder now to develop higher producing stock than they used to.

Then recently Paul L. Schwartz, dairy specialist of the California Dairyman, had a splendid article in the Los Angeles Banker for December 1945, which said:

DAIRYING IN LOS ANGELES COUNTY

(By Paul L. Schwartz, dairy specialist, the California Dairyman)

Most people know that the State of Wisconsin is the largest dairy State in the country, that it has the most cows, produces the most milk, and that it is referred to as America's Dairyland. But very few people are aware of the fact that Los Angeles County is the largest dairy county in the United States, and that the milk producers here receive more money for their milk production annually than do the dairymen in any other of the some 3,076 counties of our 48 States. For the past fiscal year this amounted to $44,423,000, exceeding the combined total of all other livestock production, such as poultry and eggs, beef, pork, lamb, horses, rabbits, etc., in the county. These figures are just about doubled when a breakdown of cost figures are examined, bringing the total sum of nearly $90,000,000 involved in our local milk production, viz:

Feed costs	$26,000,000
Labor costs	8,000,000
Miscellaneous costs	9,000,000
Total	43,500,000
Milk receipts	44,423,000
Total	87,923,000

Los Angeles County is the biggest money dairy county, not because it is one of the country's biggest counties in area, for, on the contrary, an exceedingly minor portion of the territory is actually utilized in dairy operations—but because of the highly professionalized, highly intensified type of progressive dairying conducted.

Unlike other dairy sections of America, Los Angeles County has a distinctive, superior, and different kind of dairy industry. Climate, economics, and a business versus "a mode of life" attitude on the part of the dairymen are responsible for this peculiarly advanced state of dairy affairs. Because of climate, we cannot raise our own hay, grain, or calves: we must draw upon the San Joaquin Valley, Lancaster and Imperial Valley for our alfalfa hay to the tune of more than half a million tons annually. For our concentrates, in normal times, we depend upon Hawaii, the Philippines, South America, East Africa, and other parts of the world in addition to our domestic sources—while our replacements of "burnt out" cows are obtained about equally from the central and northern part of the State, and from the other 10 Western and Northwestern States. We are increasing our cow population in the county a little over 10 percent per year.

The present milking life of a cow in Los Angeles County is less than 2 years and some dairies are replacing their herds at the rate of 15 percent per month. Unless a cow can produce around 40 pounds of butterfat monthly, we cannot afford to keep that cow. That's why we top the Nation in milk production, averaging more than 400 pounds of fat per cow per year, compared to the national average of only 180 pounds, and the State average of 269 pounds. There are around 1,000 dairy producers in the county averaging over 100 cows per herd, with a value per cow of around $200. The county cow population at present is close to 125,000.

Our milk producers devote their entire time to their dairy work, which is their sole source of revenue, compared to other sections of the country where the milk and cream check is a secondary and frequently a minor source of income. Our Los Angeles dairymen have long ago learned to appreciate the value and indispensability of high producing cattle. By increasing their butterfat yield per cow 220 percent above the national average, they have trebled their income above feed costs. There is still lots of room for improvement and bigger profits, as is manifested by the following compilation of data obtained from the dairy-herd-improvement associations showing how sharply income over feed costs rises as the production level increases.[1]

---

[1] These are national figures for 1944. Los Angeles County values and feed costs are about 30 percent higher.

Level of butterfat production	Value of product	Feed cost	Income over feed cost
100 pounds	$94	$83	$11
200 pounds	176	98	78
300 pounds	253	114	144
400 pounds	338	130	208
500 pounds	411	142	269
600 pounds	493	159	334

Nowhere else in the United States, if not in the world, is there such a high quality of milk produced as there is in Los Angeles County. Every dairy barn is compelled by law to have running water in it—every cow must be washed and scrubbed each time before she is milked, twice daily, and this milk is delivered twice daily to the processing plants in the cities of the county, where it is pasteurized, homogenized, bottled, and delivered to the consumer. A small percentage of raw milk is distributed, and this is on the decrease. Whereas in the big metropolitan centers of the country, such as New York City, Chicago, et al., their grade A pasteurized milk contains less than 10,000 bacteria per cubic centimeter, our pasteurized milk will persistently run around 100 per cubic centimeter; in many instances our raw milk will average less than 1,000 per cubic centimeter on a yearly average.

Our cows are out in the sunshine all year and producing an abundance of vitamin D in their milk. During normal times we supplement our alfalfa hay and concentrates with such highly vitaminized and mineralized feeds as Hawaiian pineapple, grape meal, olive meal, kuder (orange) meal, raisins, etc. No other dairy section in the country produces such superior quality of milk.

Milk consumption is still only about half what it should be, according to our national and State dairy councils, our dietitians, medical authorities, milk and dairy products handlers. Despite VJ-day, the demand still exceeds the supply of milk, with some 40,000 gallons daily going to the armed forces, an amount sufficient to take care of 112,000 families.

The Government subsidy, which expires next June, has made it possible for our milk producers to operate on a profitable basis. Most dairymen do not favor subsidies in theory and it is hoped that an early announcement will be forthcoming regarding provisions for sustained butterfat prices to the producer in lieu of subsidies.

The year 1945 was banner year for milk production on the farms of the United States for it topped all previous records by a substantial margin. I quote again from the California Dairyman:

1945 A BANNER YEAR FOR MILK PRODUCTION

Milk production on the farms of the United States in 1945 topped all previous records by a substantial margin. An unusually high spring and summer level more than offset a very sharp decline last fall. Estimates by States place the national total for the past year at 122,300,000,000 pounds, or more than 3 percent above the 1944 production of 118,600,000,000 pounds. Milk production per cow in 1945 for the entire country is reported at 4,790 pounds, 215 pounds above 1944 and the highest in the 21 years for which estimates are available.

In asking for further information as to the net income of California farmers, I was furnished information from C. V. Castle, of the Agricultural Extension Service and farm adviser of Los Angeles County, as follows:

CALIFORNIA FARMERS LEAD IN NET INCOME

California farmers have led the Nation in net farm income per farm since 1940, and Los Angeles County farmers are equal to or slightly above the average for the State, says C. V. Castle, of the Agricultural Extension Service and farm adviser in Los Angeles County.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics data for the Nation have been analyzed by Arthur Shultis, specialist in farm management, Agricultural Extension Service, University of California at Berkeley. The results of his study have been forwarded to Castle.

The gain in net income from California farms has amounted to 431 percent of the 1939 level, while the gain for the rest of the Nation, Castle points out, was only 273 percent.

In 1939, when California was second in rank, the net per farm amounted to $1,492. When the State moved into first place in 1940, the net income increased to $1,673. In 1944 the figure reached $7,079.

Expenses have likewise mounted, Castle points out. In 1939 production expenses were about $3,000 with the total cash receipts at $4,500. In 1944 production expense climbed to near $7,000 with gross cash receipts approximately $14,000.

According to Castle, a study of Los Angeles County crop and livestock incomes indicates that the gross income from the 13,000 farms of this county is very closely in line with the State average figure. Slight differences in methods of reporting make exact comparisons impossible.

These high incomes must be interpreted properly, Castle says. Demand has been tremendous, and consumers have had money to buy. These factors have resulted in the high net income. When prices fall, farm products as raw materials are the first to take the bump while farm costs will follow slowly. Thus, with expenses now more than twice what they were in 1939, it is not safe to capitalize on present net earnings as a means of determining land values, for it is doubtful if current high farm prices can be expected to continue indefinitely.

The California Dairyman again furnishes me the following articles:

1945 RECORD MILK PRODUCTION

SACRAMENTO.—Commercial milk production in California in 1945 established a new all-time record for any year. Utilization in the form of market milk and in evaporated milk, cottage-cheese curd, ice cream, and sherbet also established new records.

Receipts by all milk distributors (including producer-distributors) and manufacturing plants for the entire year 1945 exceeded 205,000,000 pounds of milk fat as compared with 196,000,000 pounds in 1944, an increase of 4.8 percent. This milk fat was contained in about 5,228,000,000 pounds of milk which had an average milk-fat content of 3.93 percent. December milk and cream deliveries by California dairymen continued at seasonal record levels and exceeded 15,700,000 pounds of milk fat, an increase of 5.4 percent over the same month of 1944. This milk fat was contained in about 388,000,000 pounds of milk which had an average milk-fat content of 4.06 percent.

Utilization of milk by consumers in the form of market milk continued exceptionally high, exceeding 842,000 gallons daily in December 1945, as compared with about 773,000 gallons a year ago, an increase of over 9 percent.

Butter manufacture for the year 1945 declined to 15,431,000 pounds—less than half the amount reported as manufactured in 1896, the first year for which such data are available. This compares with the total of 29,466,000 pounds in 1944 and with the 5-year average of 62,850,000. December butter manufacture totaled only 572,000 pounds compared to 1,555,000 in December 1944 and a 5-year average of 4,503,000.

Cheese manufacturers made 13,512,000 pounds of cheese during 1945 (exclusive of cottage cheese). This compares with a total of 13,232,000 pounds in 1944 and a 5-year average of 18,626,000 pounds. Manufacture of cottage-cheese curd exceeded 35,000,000 pounds as compared with 29,451,000 pounds in 1944 and the 5-year average of 26,328,000 pounds.

HATS OFF TO THE DAIRYMAN

Los Angeles County dairymen hung up a record of 406.4 pounds of butterfat per cow for all cows in their herds, those milking as well as the dry stock. Figured on the milking herd alone the year's production amounted to 490.0 pounds of butterfat, says Earl Maharg, of the Agricultural Extension Service, University of California.

These high rates of production exceed those of any other section in the United States, he points out, and are the result of careful feeding, a rather rapid cow replacement program on the basis of cow testing records, and good herd management.

Individual high records of production were also attained, he said, citing an animal in North Hollywood which produced 852 pounds of butterfat and another in Azus, 810 pounds. In addition, there were two herds of over 250 cows each with 506 and 518 pounds of butterfat and one 100-cow dairy with an average of 493 pounds per cow. Seven groups of five selected animals produced from 522 to 722 pounds of butterfat per cow.

"This remarkable production has been achieved by Los Angeles County dairymen in spite of an extremely adverse feed situation, difficulty in securing suitable cows for replacement and trying dairy help conditions. Cow replacement troubles lowered the herd average butterfat production this year as compared to 1944 by some 16 pounds, because dairymen were forced to keep more dry stock and older cows which should have gone to the butcher," said Maharg.

"The feed situation promises little improvement during, at least, the first part of 1946 because of transportation difficulties. It is more critical now than at any time during the war period. With this condition dairymen may have difficulty maintaining milk production at comparable levels during 1946."

According to Maharg, there were 20,209 cows under test in the county's cow-testing association at the end of the testing year, October 31, 1945. This total is the greatest for any association in the United States and, in fact, exceeds the numbers of cows in all associations in all but six States. He points out that Los Angeles County has the largest number of dairy cows of any county in the United States. This is not due to the size of the county, he says, because 75 percent of the dairy cows are concentrated in a relatively small area between Los Angeles, Long Beach, and the Orange County border.

As the 4-H Club program is one of national extent and import I was especially pleased to receive the following report by G. E. Gordon, extension specialist, Los Angeles County:

DHI PROGRAM REACHES ALL-TIME HIGH

REPORT OF DAIRY-HERD IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATIONS FOR DECEMBER 1944

(By G. E. Gordon, extension specialist)

California farm advisers, in their annual reports just analyzed, show that the dairy-herd-improvement program in 1945 has set a new all-time record for volume of work done. The large volume of activity under this program carried on by the Agricultural Extension Service of the University of California through its county offices is somewhat surprising in view of the difficulties confronting California dairy farmers.

The greatest difficulty was in maintaining the dairy herd improvement or cow testing associations, 1945 being the most difficult year of the war period in the securing of personnel to carry on this work. Some of the testers were taken into the armed forces and others transferred to other types of work; this resulted in a turnover of 48 testers during the year, or 57 percent of the total. In spite of this heavy turnover it was possible to increase the number of testing units and also to increase the volume of work done above the previous high level in the year just before the war. Interest in this testing program is greater than ever before, with a number of dairymen on the waiting list in many counties who could not be taken care of, due to the impossibility of securing adequate numbers of testers to do the work.

The production testing program, as carried on by the dairy-herd improvement or cow-testing associations in the State, showed 127,079 cows under test in the herds of 2,534 dairymen. This is an increase of 15,235 cows and 621 dairymen over the previous year. The number of cows culled from members' herds was 35,533. This heavy culling was due to the difficult labor situation and also to the fact that dairymen were making great efforts to increase their efficiency by eliminating the poorer cows so that they could use the available feed and labor for the better ones. Interest in the future efficiency of their herds was also evident, as indicated by their interest in improved breeding practices. During the year there were 436 dairymen assisted in securing new herd sires, while 556 dairymen were aided in securing better cows to improve their herds—many of them for the purpose of developing foundation breeding programs. During the year there were 37 bulls proved for their transmitting ability on the basis of dam-and-daughter production records.

The feeding of dairy cattle always receives a great deal of attention because it represents about half of the total cost of producing milk. Feed supplies, paricularly during the latter half of the year, were quite short; this was especially true of the high-protein oil meals. The farm advisers' reports show that in spite of this difficulty the dairymen throughout the State did an excellent job in adjusing their feeding practices through the growing of good forage crops designed to improve the quality and reduce the cost of their rations. Pasture crops received special attention, with indications that there was a great deal of expansion in the use of good pastures. Pastures also have the added advantage of reducing labor requirements since the cows do their own harvesting. The farm advisers' reports also show that members of the testing associations made good use of their production records as a basis for feeding concentrates according to the needs of the cows as indicated by these production records.

Although major emphasis of the program was placed on the securing of a maximum supply of milk in line with the war effort, attention was also given to the development of good future dairymen through the 4–H Club program. 4–H Club work always has been an important part of this State-wide dairy program, and many former 4–H Club members who have since become dairymen aided in producing milk during the war years. During 1945 4–H dairy projects were carried to successful completion by 1,078 boys and 210 girls. These dairy projects included 1,936 animals and returned a net profit to the boys and girls of $67,153.

This large volume of work, with the results secured, demonstrates the highly progressive attitude of California dairymen, who have produced a greater volume of milk in the State of California during 1945 than in any previous year. It is, therefore, evident that the forward-looking attitude of California dairymen will make it possible for them to meet post-war conditions in an efficient manner.

Having written the Los Angeles County Farm Bureau recently for further information, just yesterday I received from Robert G. Platt, executive secretary thereof, the following letter which sets forth some valuable data:

LOS ANGELES COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
Los Angeles, Calif., June 21, 1946.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: Through the courtesy of Mr. Gus Rothe of the Los Angeles office of the California State Dairy Council, we are enclosing some literature, relative to Dairy Month, June 1946.

You are perhaps aware of the fact that the figure for dairy cows in Los Angeles County at the end of 1945 was over 112,000, probably the highest for any county in the United States. Our farm bureau dairymen's department in cooperation with the Agricultural Extension Service operates the Los Angeles County Cow Testing Association. The business of this association for May 1946, set a record of testing 87 herds whose total cows numbered 21,325. This may also be a record for the United States. The average milk per cow in this May test was 957.3 pounds with an average butterfat production of 34.3 pounds per cow; 8,710 of the 21,325 cows produced 40 pounds of butterfat or more.

We trust that these figures from our cow-testing association will be of interest.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT G. PLATT,
Executive Secretary.

He favored me by a copy of the following statement from the National Dairy Council, 111 North Canal Street, Chicago, Ill.:

DAIRY MONTH MEETS URGENT NEED FOR QUICK UNDERSTANDING OF DAIRY PROBLEMS

An unparalleled opportunity for a coordinated, effective promotion, and public-relations campaign presents itself to a united dairy industry during Dairy Month.

Dairy Month is an established promotion of 10 years' standing, long enough to have been well accepted by the public. Because of this fact and because of other circumstances—most of them created by disruption of regular trade channels during the war—the dairy industry has an excellent opportunity to tell its story to the public during Dairy Month with the certainty there will be a large and sympathetic audience.

There is urgent need for a coordinated public-relations drive by a united dairy industry to preserve the confidence and good will built up over the years. Dairy Month has a stanch record of improving consumer demand for dairy foods during times of plenty, and a public-relations campaign during Dairy Month is more effective than at any other time because of its well-established purpose.

A recent meeting in Chicago of national, State, and local Dairy Trade Association secretaries revealed the startling need for immediate coordination of an aggressive public-relations job by the dairy industry.

"Never before in history has the public been so confused and so bewildered as to the availability of dairy foods," said an important dairy trade official who attended the meeting. "The hailstorm of conflicting stories coming out of Washington and flashed on the front pages of the press is rapidly destroying the confidence and good will that the dairy industry has so painstakingly built up over the last 20 years. There is urgent need for quick action to head off the rapid descent of the entire industry into the proverbial dog house.

"Above all things, it is a time for unified action and not just a self-centered, disorganized defense of any one dairy product by any special segment of the dairy industry. Whether it is milk, butter, cheese, or ice cream, they are all in the same family, and whatever public ill will is directed against any one product hurts them all.

"Because of this interrelated interest and interdependence," this dairy official continued, "a more effective and forceful public-relations job can be done and a public understanding more quickly attained by unity and coordination.

"An immediate opportunity for such unified action presents itself in the 1946 June Dairy Month campaign. This campaign has been carefully planned and developed by a most capable committee representing every branch of the dairy industry. It covers all major dairy products, and is directed straight to the public to let them know that the dairy industry is not responsible for the shortage of certain dairy products or the Washington muddle, but is doing everything in its power to produce, process, and distribute as rapidly as possible the dairy food supply demanded by the public."

It was the feeling of the dairy trade secretaries that a barrage of hard-hitting, factual publicity releases to the Nation's press and radio will tell the truth about dairy products and the problems of the dairy industry to the public throughout the month of June.

Organized cooperating groups of merchants throughout the Nation are telling the same story in their show windows and stores by use of the Dairy Month promotion material. National advertisers are emphasizing the story in magazines and on radio chains throughout June.

The Dairy Month publicity committee has made progress in combating some of the misinformation about dairy foods. This has been done by factual releases in newspapers, press wire services, magazines, radio, and the dairy trade and allied press.

The entire dairy industry has an opportunity to take part in the dissemination of the dairy industry's story by participation—active participation—in the promotion of Dairy Month. This can be done by the effective and liberal use of materials prepared by the Dairy Month promotion committee. It can be done by participating in an active public-relations campaign, by the preparation and distribution of factual releases to the press and radio repeating the dairy industry's story.

The promotion committee was in a quandary last winter when it discussed the theme to follow during dairy month. At that time it was apparent that the supply of milk would be abundant in many markets during dairy month, but it was equally apparent that butter and cheese would be scarce. With wartime restrictions lifted, ice cream promised to be plentiful. Cottage cheese and buttermilk would be available in almost unlimited quantities in most places.

The problem confronting the promotion committee was whether merely to mention the plentiful dairy foods and ignore the ones that were scarce, or whether to boost all dairy foods and concentrate on increased sales of those that were plentiful.

The latter course was followed, the committee deciding to "keep all dairy foods together" against the day when all would again be plentiful during some future Dairy Month, with emphasis on the important role that an aggressive and effective public-relations campaign would play in this year of reconversion.

The theme for the 1946 Dairy Month campaign was chosen after much thought and debate. It was "First in foods," and nutritionists say it was aptly chosen in this year of hunger and starvation for there is no food more important in the feeding of the starved and semistarved than the family of dairy foods—milk, butter, cheese, and ice cream.

The dairy industry is troubled this year by manpower shortages, equipment shortages, and machinery shortages. Thousands of former dairy workers have been discharged from the armed forces, but great numbers of them, especially from the dairy farms, have been lured away into other industries by higher wages, shorter hours—especially the 5-day week—and the advantages of big-city life.

This is the story that the dairy industry must get across to the public. Each branch and segment of the dairy industry must coordinate its public relations and publicity behind this drive in an effort to combat the half-truths and the whispers that are causing harm to the cause of the dairy industry.

"In unity, there is strength," as one dairy trade secretary said. "We must unite, and we must fight. Dairy Month provides the dairy industry with an ideal opportunity, and the essentiality of dairy foods provides us with valuable ammunition. Our future depends on the teamwork that we demonstrate during June Dairy Month."

As Paul L. Schwartz, the dairy specialist, is recognized as outstanding, the following letter to me from him dated June 14, 1946, adds further pertinent information and observations:

THE CALIFORNIA DAIRYMAN,
Hynes, Calif., June 14, 1946.

Congressman CLYDE DOYLE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CLYDE: We hope that you will be able to find sufficient information in the attached tear sheets and reprints to supply you with all that you need, as per your wire received this morning.

We are happy, indeed, that you are taking a real interest in our dairy industry, the chief problems of which at the present are: First, to guarantee our milk producers a price for their milk that will enable them, and encourage them, to stay in America's No. 1 industry. Second, to speed up, as rapidly as possible, the domestic production of feeds and the importation of our concentrates as before the war.

Before the war, the consumption of milk was only six-tenths of a pint per capita per day, and it hould have been at least 1 pint per capita per day, according to the conservative estimates and opinions of our National Dairy Council, our 48 State dairy councils, our dietitians, medical authorities, the processors and handlers of milk, etc. If this 1 pint per day could be achieved, we would require 5,000,000 more cows to take care of this increased consumptive demand.

Likewise, before the war, our consumption of butter is only about 40 percent of what it should be, averaging only 17 pounds per capita per year in the United States, with around 32 pounds per head per year in Canada, and some 45 pounds per year per head in Australia. Were we to at least catch up with our Canadian neighbors in butter consumption, we would require at least 6,000,000 more cows to take care of the butter requirements.

In the cheese field we find a similar condition prevailing which would necessitate the addition of another 2,000,000 cows.

Now, if you add up five and six and two million, you will see it amounts to 13,000,000, which could be added to our present cow population of around 27,000,000.

These are staggering figures, but they are true, and indicate the tremendous potentialities that exist in the efficient management and a common-sense Government regulation attitude.

Only in the consumption of ice cream does the United States lead the rest of the world, largely due to the superior position that we occupy in the matter of mechanical refrigeration. If our ice-cream cabinets were taken out of our wholesale ice-cream shops, we would have no ice-cream industry in the United States.

There is no reason whatsoever why the United States should fall behind any other country in the world in the consumption of the most perfect food that God has given us. And there is no earthly reason why you Congressmen in Washington shouldn't appreciate to the fullest the indispensability of our milk producers.

If you constantly think along these lines, you are certainly going to make history for yourself.

Milk production in California continued the upward trend which has been almost unbroken for many years. In terms of farm income, it is the most important phase of the State's livestock industry. The widespread significance of dairying is also indicated by the fact that there are nearly 25,000 commercial milk producers in the State, as shown by Government dairy-feed-program subsidy payments in 1945. Census counts also indicate that there are approximately 28,000 other farms producing milk mainly for home use.

On January 1, 1946, the number of milk cows in the State reached 851,000 head, or an increase of 3 percent over the previous January inventory. During the past year milk-cow numbers declined in most other States and the national total showed a decrease of 3 percent. The preliminary estimate of total milk production in the State during the past year is 5,720,000,000 pounds—an increase of nearly 5 percent over the 5,479,000,000 pounds produced in 1944. This total represents an average of 7,150 pounds of milk per cow.

One billion two hundred and fifty million quarts of milk produced in California last year, with a total value of $365,000,000.

With more power to you and with kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

PAUL L. SCHWARTZ.

Some of the voluntary dairy associations functioning in the Eighteenth Congressional District, and in Los Angeles County are as follows: Protected Milk Producers Association, Superior Milk Producers Association, Central Milk Sales Agency, Los Angeles Mutual Dairymen, Western Consumers Feed Company, Producers Distributors, and Natural Milk Producers Association. The California State Department of Agriculture and the County of Los Angeles Farm Bureau each maintain fully personneled and actively cooperating dairy departments.

Who Killed Cock Robin?

REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, who killed Cock Robin?

Strict rent-control provisions were in the bill President Truman vetoed. It also contained provisions for the gradual easing of all price controls. Who was it that killed rent control and removed price controls overnight? That is the question the people of this Nation should be asking themselves today. The answer to that $64 question is an easy one.

The President, against the advice of his Democratic leaders in both House and Senate, vetoed the bill. He preferred to follow the advice of his CIO-PAC friends, Sidney Hillman and Philip Murray, so he vetoed the bill that would have continued strict rent control and that provided for a gradual easing of price controls.

The President by his own ill-advised act killed all price controls.

The following newspaper articles taken from the Washington Evening Star of July 2, 1946, express my feelings in the matter of the President's veto of the price-control bill. For that reason I include them as a part of my remarks:

THE POLITICAL MILL
(By Gould Lincoln)

President Truman, against the advice of the congressional leaders of his party, vetoed the OPA extension bill and plunged the country into a vast uncertainty—which may linger for some time.

Of all the bungling by the Truman administration—and it has been plenty—this incident was the worst. The veto came to Congress at a time when it was impossible to get further congressional action before the Office of Price Administration expired at midnight, June 30.

What the President did was to decline to sign the bill and ask for legislation giving him greater powers. He could with more justification have signed the bill and asked for the additional legislation. It must have been obvious to him he could not get what he wanted—which really was an unchanged OPA extension. Had he signed the bill and put himself on record in a message to Congress denouncing the legislation, there would have still been on the books measures of control of prices and particularly control of rents. The last alone would have made the bill worth signing, as Majority Leader BARKLEY of the Senate told the President.

It may be that his advisers thought that Congress, after the veto message had been delivered, would pass the bill over the President's objection. That would have left Mr. Truman politically in the clear, and Congress holding the bag if disastrous inflation arose later. The political opponents of Mr. Truman in the House saw to it that no such event took place. As it is, Mr. Truman is holding the bag and will be blamed for allowing the OPA to die the night of June 30—whether it is revived or not.

The Truman administration has been wrong consistently in dealing with reconversion since the end of the war. It asked Congress for some $3,000,000,000 and a law making it possible to increase unemployment insurance up to $25 a week throughout the country. It did this on the theory that within a year there would be 8,000,000 unemployed. Congress was not impressed with the idea of increasing unemployment payments to a point which would encourage men and women not to work. So while the Senate put through a much-modified bill, that measure has been allowed to slumber in the House Ways and Means Committee ever since. And the unemployment prophesied by the administration experts did not materialize.

Next Mr. Truman and his Secretary of Commerce, Henry A. Wallace, insisted that wages in industry could be increased perhaps 18 to 20 percent without bringing about an increase in prices. Encouraged by this administration backing, labor unions immediately demanded even larger increases in pay. Many of them finally got 18½ percent wage increases. And prices had to be advanced in some degree. This was mistake No. 2, and a bad one. Inflation was already on the way, with the aid of the administration.

Then Mr. Truman, following the advice of his OPA director, Chester Bowles, insisted that the OPA must be extended as it was for another year from June 30. The country was flooded with Government propaganda to the effect that changes in the law would be disastrous.

All this time, the production of domestic, peacetime goods flagged—and production was the greatest need. Full production by itself can control and keep down inflation, if given a chance. But that was not what the Government planners wanted, apparently. They wanted to be able to tell the voters when the time came that they, and they alone, had been responsible for preventing inflation. Production, however, has not materialized in the quantity required by the people.

For example, monthly production of passenger automobiles is 50 percent below the monthly output in 1941. In the 9 months following the armistice ending hostilities at the close of the First World War, the automotive industry produced nearly 500,000 more passenger cars than have been turned out in a similar period since VJ-day last August. This has been due to strikes, restrictive governmental controls, loss of labor productivity, and coal and steel strikes. The industry was geared to produce more automobiles than at any time in history—but it has been able to realize less than a third of its goal.

Some controls may be needed, but not the kind of controls that interfere with production. It may be that Congress will reenact some, but whether Mr. Truman will approve of its work is another matter. The whole question is expected to get into the coming congressional campaign in a big way. Whatever happens now to the economy of the country—the Truman administration will have to bear the blame. It is in power, and the American people are not dumb.

TRUMAN'S OPA COURSE CALLED INDEFENSIBLE—VETO HAS WON HIM NO SUPPORT IN LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

(By David Lawrence)

President Truman's action in venting his resentment against Congress by punishing the American people has not won him any increase in support in the legislative branch of the Government.

The President's message has not changed many viewpoints on Capitol Hill. Even among supporters of Mr. Truman's views on price control are many who believe he was poorly advised in the tactics he used. It is pointed out that the compromise bill passed by Congress, bad as it might have seemed from the President's standpoint, was still far better than plunging the Nation into confusion and trying to get some legislative remedy overnight while decontrol acquired natural momentum.

The bill was, to be sure, a complicated affair, but this in a sense was its advantage. It was cumbersome enough to slow up any price increases of consequence, and even the much-debated Taft amendment would have taken quite a long time to operate, during which period the change to a better system or the adjustment of the national economy to the abandonment of price controls might have been worked out. The President's course is indefensible.

APPLAUSE FROM CIO-PAC

Mr. Truman can get plenty of applause from CIO-PAC followers, who are flooding the White House with mail and telegrams just as they did Congress. But this sort of organized pressure does not deceive anybody, least of all Members of both Houses, who have been listening for months to the stories of retarded or abandoned production due to OPA mismanagement of the price problem.

Members of Congress are not happy over what the President has done. Republicans who sincerely want rent control and a gradual easing of all price controls call the President's act a reckless adventure which cannot but shake the confidence of the country in the man in the White House. Democrats generally do not like the arbitrary way Mr. Truman has disregarded the advice of the leaders of his own party. Certainly in the coming campaign Democrats will be embarrassed by Mr. Truman's deviation from party solidarity.

Why did Mr. Truman choose the course of chaos instead of transition by means of the compromise bill? This question is being asked almost as often as any other—and there are many queries as to what is going to happen in the way of new legislation. The only answer that seems plausible is that Mr. Truman has decided to cast his lot with the left wingers who, through the CIO-PAC, think they have a political instrument with which to win elections for him which is more effective than the Democratic Party itself.

The President has been yielding to the CIO-PAC arguments right along, and the veto of the OPA bill was, of course, a policy vigorously pressed by the left wing. Their idea is that if business can be punished and profit margins can be cut, and economic chaos results, the way will be opened for socialistic experiments in nationalization of industries and Government controls of all business.

CONTROLLED ECONOMY IDEA

The chief difficulty with the OPA was that it set itself up as a judge of profits. This up to now has been left to the Treasury Department to control through uniformly applied tax rates. But the OPA decided how much profit was adequate as well as what price should be charged. Such control can be defended during wartime, but it is not the way to bring back a normal production and distribution of goods nor is it the way to kill off black markets.

Deeply imbedded in the present controversy is the ideological concept of a controlled economy. Mr. Truman has gone over to that side of the controversy and he has the backing of the labor union leaders, who have nothing to fear as long as the man in the White House applies no restraints or controls to wage rates.

Mr. Truman has increased prices by sanctioning heavy increases in wage costs and now, when producers want their costs covered, he refuses to let their costs or their profits come to the natural levels which follow when the public makes the prices. The Government has made a fizzle of price fixing. Industry and business left to themselves could do no worse.

In the case of housing, however—which is acutely short—a simple measure of control can be passed by both Houses of Congress overnight if President Truman will let Congress act. But he will seek through his supporters on Capitol Hill to get his original OPA proposals tacked onto such legislation as an amendment. This merely prolongs the controversy.

Mr. Truman has been defeated by Congress, and the legislation he will eventually get will be no better than that which he vetoed. But, in addition, the American people will suffer from the confusion which has been forced upon them by the recklessness of their President. Meanwhile, prices will rise and no legislation will really disentangle the web woven by Mr. Truman's colossal mistake.

The Eternal Struggle for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject, the Eternal Struggle for Freedom, delivered by me at the Southern California B'nai B'rith 1946 convention luncheon at the Biltmore Hotel, Los Angeles, Monday, June 24, 1946.

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In 1843, 12 men, who are now called liberal-minded immigrant Jews, who had immigrated to America, brought into existence the Sons of the Covenant. Since they were in America they followed American custom and wrote a constitution with a preamble which reads today more American than Hebrew. Were those men conscious of the fact that the liberal influence of America might destroy the best they had in their old culture? Did they turn their backs on America's promise, and, in a fear of what might come to a covenant-loving people, legislate in self-defense? I do not believe they did, because at that very time my father was being born, not of Hebrew parents, but of British. He immigrated, too, and he became identified with a minority group and his ideals became so much the ideals of B'nai B'rith's founding fathers that I believe that each represented the American aspect of the eternal struggle for freedom.

It would not be hard for me to allow my mind to run to another historical incident where liberal-minded immigrants into another country that was so free from prejudice, as far as religion is concerned, that it was only a matter of time before those Sons of the Covenant and their progeny forgot the covenant in the new freedom they had found. The Jews who went to China became Chinese, and in time sold the sacred symbols of their religion and lost their identity as Jews. Many have done so in America because America's offer of freedom is so all-embracing that forgetfulness to past loyalties is an ever-present invitation. But America cannot be great if she becomes a land of forgetfulness, instead of a land of liberty. Liberty is such a choice privilege and blessing that if it is not guarded and maintained, it is soon lost. Liberty is something which, in its logical sequence, must be absolute and all-embracing. Man, no more than a nation, can be half free and half slave. That lesson I learned in Sunday school years ago when my teacher, a fine old Englishman, began telling us about what a friend to mankind the birds were. And he ended by saying, "I myself love the little birds, we must not kill them, we must protect them; but when it comes to those darn sparrows, it is all right to kill them." That sort of liberty or freedom from the spirit of killing is so world-like.

It is fine for America to be a haven for the oppressed of the earth, where freemen from various climes and various places dwell side by side in unity and peace, but where, so often, we want everybody to be free but the "darn sparrows," the "whops," the "neggers," the Jews, the Japs, or the Chinamen. America has always had a peculiar peeve or hatred. One day we are against the Bolsheviks, another day the Mormons, another day the Communists, another day the Jews. And the saddest part of this fact is that the worst group hatreds against minorities are pretty generally always in minority groups themselves. That, too, is one of the good signs. I have been a victim of this. A worthy citizen of Utah, a member of your fraternity, and a man who was honored by our people, while here in Los Angeles in a convention, the like of which you are holding today, turned thousands of Jews against me as a result of a lecture I gave at the University of California, at Berkeley, wherein I explained the birth of anti-Semitism in the beginning years of Hitler's regime. The hatred engendered by that man, based upon hearsay, I could not live down for years. Of course, he would never come to one of my lectures. Knowing I belonged to another political party, he was out to ruin ELBERT THOMAS, and he nearly did. Could I have overcome that? Of course, I could not. If people told the simple truth in our political lives it would be very much easier for Americans to remain free. Do you think that the great University of California would honor a man with a visiting professorship to that great school if he were unworthy. Of course it would not, nor would my own university. But are university professors free in America from bias and hatreds engendered by given groups who cannot stand the truth. You know they are not. My plea is that we bebecome American, that we realize that liberty for all of us rests upon truth and common consent, that it cannot b maintained on anything but a simple basis of the Golden Rule. If we do not live up to the Golden Rule, if you lie about me, I am going to lie about you; but if you treat me halfway decent the chances are I will treat you halfway decent.

I was for 4 years an aide to the man, whom I think was Utah's greatest governor, a Jew. I had not seen him for several years because I had been away. When I saw him coming down the street, I, of course, did not think he could possibly remember me, and I felt I should not bother him. Of course I spoke to him, saluted, and took off my hat as I passed. He turned and said: "Hi, Major; what do you mean by passing me up?" "Governor, I did not intend to pass you up; it did not seem right for me to stop you." "Always stop me," he said. "Where have you been and what have you been doing?" I told him. "Well, the people treated you right wherever you went, didn't they?" "Yes; they treated me splendidly." And he said, "Of course they did, and they always will because you treat people right." I did not know as much about the origin of religions then as I think I do now, but when that great man talked to me in terms of basic Christianity, I felt a kinness of belief that was soul satisfying.

Loyalty does not mean selfishness. Revelation does not mean that you should carry your loyalties to the extent of hating all that is not like you. I have lived now in practically every nook and corner of the globe. As a religionist and a believer in religion, and a small religion at that, a religion based upon the concept of revelation, I think I appreciate revelation as much as anyone. But the concept of revelation has been responsible for most of the persecutions in the Western World. Wherever men who have descended under the influence of Hebrew, Christian, early Greek, and Mohammedan thought, those men have been influenced by the concept of revelation. They have all known what the truth was because God had told them the truth, and one cannot compromise with God; therefore, in the wake of these great thoughts have come persecutions, martyrdom, and the ills of unsympathetic elements in our society. Three hundred years ago men persecuted their neighbors and killed those who did not see eye to eye with them because they thought it pleased God. Think what that does to the concept of God. Since this is America, we can think of that concept and realize that it is bad. But my point is that within 300 years even the most advanced and most thoughtful of our immediate ancestors accepted, as right, the concept of persecution and acted accordingly, and men died at the stake to please God. Thank goodness, a spirit began to prevail among them, and pretty soon men said to one another—do not let us kill these people, let us put up with them. We do not have to mingle with them. We will live aloof and have nothing to do with them. There a spirit of forbearance took the place of persecution. It was a great advancement.

Then about the time our Constitution came into existence and at the time your forefathers in this great fraternity, influenced by that Constitution, wrote their outstanding preamble, a spirit of tolerance began to take hold of our people. Jefferson, Washington, and our founding fathers knew what tolerance meant and how essential it was to liberty, and it thus became part of our national ideal. But 1 year after your society was founded, in 1843, the founder of my religion was murdered because of his belief. So, in the land of tolerance, a minority became forgetful of the blessings of liberty and attacked a smaller minority and men died. That is part of the history of mankind.

We like tolerance in America, but tolerance is not enough for real America. In the religious field—and I say let us extend it to the international field, to the political field, to our social field, and economic field—if forbearance is greater than persecution, and tolerance is greater than forbearance, there is one more step we must take if America is to be free and peace is to come to the world. That step is appreciation. Let us learn to appreciate one another, let us learn to trust one another, and then we will not kill one another.

In my first political campaign for the senatorship I was made fun of. Had I resented it I would have been defeated. I did not. Every bad and belittling thing my opponents said about me I repeated to my audiences. No one can tell me that treating other people as you would like to be treated does not pay. You can work the Golden Rule in politics, international relations, in your business, and industry-labor relations. Try it. You might find out that it works. And the most interesting thing about it is that it does not call upon you at any time to be disloyal to your cherished ideals and your greatest loves. You can appreciate your neighbor without coveting his property and without having lust for his wife.

I had better stop or your treasurer, who, I am sure, is trained in the logic of a quid pro quo, when he begins paying me my honorarium will say he is getting cheated. So he will cooperate I am going to throw in a "bunch" of ancient history.

When I tried to think of a title for today's talk and hit upon the Eternal Struggle for Freedom, I meant that the word "eternal" be taken literally. As scholars unfold for us more of the origins of the ancient world we discover how very old this struggle is. We see, too, where the conflict lay. In addition we see how, as men put their faith in law, the concept of liberty burst forth, and they legislated so as to guarantee freedom from arbitrary caprice. That our land was to be one of law and not of men has a new meaning when we examine the idea in the light of one of the earliest struggles between an individual right and a single will. In the ancient world of the Near East with its Code of Hammurabi and in the ancient world of the Far East with its Code of Shun, we find the beginnings of the struggle for the protection of private rights. Those peoples who were influenced by these two great codes moved on toward the beginnings of the concepts of liberty and freedom. Through law and especially through the written contract came private property rights. The great civilizations of ancient China kept that mighty empire on a private property basis. The civilizations of Mesopotamia influenced the Hebrew. Hammurabi laid down the rule that a purchase without written document was a theft and was punishable by death. When we come down to the conflict in thought between the Hebrew and the Egyptian we discover many of the elements of the contest today between the theories of the single-will states and the democracies. In the later conflicts between theories in China and Japan the same elements are found. The Japanese state was one wherein the Mikado was law; he owned the land and could do with it as he saw fit. He ruled in theory by caprice. This was condemned by the code-influenced, private-property-respecting Chinese. The Hebrew could not stand the unrestrained power of the ancient rulers of Egypt, who had complete power of life and death over all. Thus we can say that more and more scholars of the ancient world are recognizing the very early beginning of this great conflict. The American concept of liberty, with its many freedoms and various permissible loyalties, is a result of long development. After what has just been said, the Liberty Bell quotation taken from Leviticus xxv: 10, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof," may have for us a deeper meaning. There was a beginning.

Hammurabi and Shun were a bit older than Abraham. And there is no doubt but that the Hebrew zeal for social justice had, as far as history is concerned, its origin with these early laws. But no code was ever struck off as some people assumed that the Ten Commandments were, or Solon's law, or the Roman Twelve Tablets. Hammurabi's code and the code of Shun, ancient and old as they were, like the Decalog itself, were merely codifications of truths that men had worked out before. I can hear someone say—surely that cannot be true. Does not the Bible teach us that God wrote the Ten Commandments with His finger on stone tablets? That must be the origin—but, it was not. Moses knew that there was a law against killing a man, even in the heathen land of Egypt, or he never would have hid after his affair with the Egyptian. The codes, as far as we can go back and pin to definiteness, like law, right and justice, are all found in some phase or other in the earliest of man's institutions. Take, for example, God's judgment on Cain. Can you find in the history of law a more splendid illustration of the fact that the crime of murder is not only a crime against the person killed, but also a crime against society and that society will be the judge of the punishment inflicted. God in His reasoning with Cain surely made that fact plain.

According to Hebrew tradition, the story of Cain and Abel is pretty early, and Cain knew his law when he entered his plea, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Society was pretty far advanced when Cain killed Abel. Logic was there; justice was there; the appeal to right was there, and, sad to relate, argument and debate were there.

The eternal struggle for freedom is still going on. Thus, we Jews and Christians may say—the concept of justice which must always have a characteristic and attribute of liberty had its origin with God. It comes as a result of revelation. But I have already pointed out some of the ills from a practical acceptance of the concept of revelation. By that I mean, if God is absolute His truth, therefore, must be absolute. If His truth is absolute there can be no compromise with it and revelation, therefore, means standing by an idea to the end. How does it appear then that nonrevelation believing peoples still have these fine concepts of justice? Would they get them from the canon of Shun? No, they are older than the canon of Shun.

The logic behind the Chinese golden rule or their commandment "Thou shall not kill," is different. It makes for peace and not persecution. I can illustrate that by a simple story. We take a Sunday school class anywhere in the West, Jewish, Christian, or Mohammedan, and the teacher asked the pupils the simple question, Why should we not kill? The brightest student will rise up and say, "We do not kill because God, in the Ten Commandments says, 'Thou shalt not kill'." That is a perfect answer for any western teacher and any western child. But if a Chinese father is teaching his child the lesson in regard to killing and he should ask the question, Why should we not kill? The child who made the perfect answer would say, "We must not kill because, if we do, men will lose faith in us and lose trust in us and they will try to kill us and then there can be no peace in society." Which child understands the real significance of the commandment "Thou shalt not kill."

Throughout the range of western thought in regard to the discovery or origin of most of our institutions and cultural habits, the blessings which man has received have come direct from Heaven. The stories about their coming are always told as was the story of Prometheus and the origin of fire. Prometheus, you remember, was bound by the gods because he stole fire which was a godly attribute and told man how to use it. The Chinese learned of fire from nature. Fire had its origin, according to their story, when an observing man happened to notice a bird pecking at a rock in such a way that it caused a spark. The Chinaman did not assume, as the ancient Greeks did, that Heaven was necessary in explaining a great gift to man. They did not need to bring the gods into the picture at all. They found fire in nature.

I believe we can come close to that today if man will stay with nature, because it is pretty hard to develop a martyr complex in support of what you see in nature. That is, man will not fight for a principle, that water, for example, will seek its own level and they will not kill men in defense of the principle that when two masses meet the greater one will prevail.

Now, I do not want to do away with revelation or the concept of revelation. I believe in it and we need more of it. The closer man can live to the will of God the better, in my opinion, man will be. To me, the millennium will be brought about and the Lord's Prayer will meet its culmination when man and God become partners in working out the eternal purposes, but I do want revelation to become more purposeful. I do want the concept of revelation to become a living, growing concept and not a dead one. Logically, Einstein's theory of relativity might even destroy the middle-age concept of absolutes if brought into the religious field. The Jews have learned something since Spinoza's time, because I have never heard or read of Einstein being excommunicated.

I have spent much of my life in religious work and endeavor. I am by nature a deeply religious person. By religious, I do not mean any narrow sect loyalty, but I mean it very much in its big, broad aspect. Religion to me is merely the bond which ties me to those things which have gone before and to those things which will come. Therefore, prophecy is not only God's word, as the prophets spoke for God, but since religion has to do with the past, the present, and the future, prophecy is that medium through which man continues his faith in the purposefulness of creation. Thus when this religious sentiment is brought over into the field of history, man's record upon this planet becomes a struggle for eternal ideals. When fundamental, religious concepts are made part of man's political thinking, then it is not hard for us to see that nations can have destinies and be given the responsibility for keeping their people in harmony with the eternal scheme.

One of the sacred books which I respect predicts America as a promised land, a land reserved until these great days of man's history for those persons and those people who, in harmony with God's plans, have come here to create a land where liberty can blossom forth and where the individual can, therefore, receive the ultimate potential of his development. Thus America, to me, is not only a land of promise but it is a land of purpose.

The ancients used to assume that heaven and earth dwell together so closely that when a just king ruled the people were prosperous and when an unjust king was on the throne people suffered. Our own Jefferson put this law of history in his own words, while contemplating American slavery, when he said: "Can the liberties of a nation be secure when we have removed a conviction that these liberties are the gift of God? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that his justice cannot sleep forever. Commerce between master and slaves is despotism. These people are to be free. That people will be happiest whose laws are best. Those worthy by education without regard to wealth or birth should administer them." Jefferson, the slave owner, knew history and understood the fundamentals of God's justice.

We of the democratic world, in contrast to single-will states, are animated by the religious impulse. We look upon the sufferings through which we have passed, in order to establish our basic fundamentals and principles, as the birth pangs of a new world. And we believe that a new day is dawning for many nations, a day when ancient bitternesses and wrongs will be purged away, and humanity, conscious of its solidarity, will march forward to a new opportunity. It is no swift and sudden utopia that I offer you, but the deep faith that out of the welter of blood and tears and sweat, which we have survived, mankind will set foot on the road to a brighter future and build a better world.

The progress of the world will not longer permit us to ignore China, Asia, or any other corner of the earth, because the earth has grown small and remoteness no longer exists. And because of this we are forced to learn the lessons of history, we are forced to seek that which connects the past with the present and with the future; we are forced to seek an understanding of basic causes and effects. We are at long last beginning to see that war anywhere is of concern to all everywhere; that poverty anywhere reduces wealth and living standards everywhere, and we are learning to understand that history proves that nations who persecute their minority groups do not thrive. Terrible as is the sacrifice of those persecuted, nature in her judgments brings punishment a hundredfold on the persecutors. Six million Jews were destroyed in the late war. No account is made of the destruction of those who were responsible for the destruction of the 6;000,000.

In a sense, the coming century is likely to be the century of Asia. By that I mean that in the generations which are to come we shall witness a mighty reawakening of that mother of continents which now shelters almost one-half of the whole human race. There is no power on earth which can arrest this process. Our world today is a world with the center of interest shifting fast away from the Western Hemisphere to the East. Asia, like Europe, is allied with distant powers and divided within. Yet the preponderance of Asiatic populations will throw the center of gravity to the Eastern Hemisphere. Asia will be predominant for the three great social, political, and economic revolutions—the Chinese, the Indian, and the Russian—are essentially Asiatic. And here the eternal struggle for man's freedom will be so aggravated that it will command the attention of the entire world.

While the great revolutions and evolutions are taking place in Asia, a new era is at hand for America. The eternal struggle for man's freedom will also be in process here, but America has reached a higher degree of accomplishment in that struggle and, therefore, the struggle will be unlike that in Asia. The West has gone far in developing the rights of the individual while in the East those concepts are just dawning.

As a result of intolerable conditions in those nations which have been ruled by single-will tyrants, thousands of refugees, dubbed intellectuals, and among them many of your people, have come to America. The effect of the thinking and working of these men and women is not yet apparent. I predict a great new birth of learning in this glorious land of ours which will affect the whole world, a new birth of scientific thinking and political idealism which will be pointed out by future generations and which will make the last half of the twentieth century a century of inspiration such as the world had in the sixth century B. C. and the first century A. D. We are living in mighty times; times which will result in universal acceptance as significant in the history of ideas as were the democratic ideals of the gospel of Buddah and the antiaristocratic ideals of the Confusian philosophy based upon the training of man whose nature is good; as great even in the lasting significance as was the greatest of all contributions in the development of democracy, the discovery of the individual and the individual's worth in the eternal scheme of things. But in this new birth of learning every idea developed will be complementary to those of the sixth century B. C. and the first century A. D. And that the ideas will be lasting is assured because they will be developed under the auspices of that Government which has evolved upon the theories of our American founding fathers.

Our fundamental concepts of democracy and our religious and political recognition of the dignity of the individual and his inherent rights are necessary to the solving not only of Europe's problems, but also of Asia's. Our belief in the rights of revolution gives us confidence in the face of change. With faith, then, in our idealism, the world will go forward as it follows American leadership.

Under the American system liberty is attained by having a respect for many loyalties. That is—in America a man is free to associate in many activities, and liberty is found by this free association. He can belong to any labor group he wishes; he can belong to any fraternity; he can affiliate with any religious group or no religious group; he can worship God as he sees fit; and there are no class barriers in social or economic life. He is free to go and come; and there are no taboos which Government prescribes. He may even have complex citizenship, such as being a citizen of the United States and a State within. He can eat what he wants; and he can marry whom he likes. In other words, the ideals of American society are castless and classless. And thus our liberty is maintained.

Our national objectives may be identical with the national objectives of a single-will state wherein one loyalty is recognized. But we attain freedom and liberty by allowing man to move in any direction he wishes. True, he sometimes tries to go in all directions at once and as a result we are a bit confused. The aim of the single-will state, with its single loyalty and that to the state, is that man will attain liberty by following in the groove. These two theories are in mighty contrast in the world today. They are the 1946 aspects of the eternal struggle for freedom. The danger is that this clash comes in our international relations. Where two states have exactly the same objectives but the methods of approach are so different that a clash impinges, our only hope in avoiding a clash of arms under the circumstances is a complete understanding on each side. The educational process, therefore, is the all-important one. It alone will save the world from more war, confusion, and chaos.

I advocate a positive American foreign policy built upon American experience and traditions. I stand for Washington's dream when all men will live as brothers. I stand for Jefferson's fundamentals as the best way to attain liberty and freedom. I stand for the courage of Abraham Lincoln, who knew the difference between right and wrong even in international relations. I stand for Jackson's internal policy wherein he understood that the mission of the American Nation in the world could only be achieved by a preservation of the Union and the development of our Federal system; and for his external policy wherein he followed his internal ideals so well that he realized that bordering lands should be brought into the Union on an equality with all of the States. I stand for the assertions and the strength of Franklin Delano Roosevelt; for his fundamental belief that he could lead the world to a good peace resting on justice. I stand for the great fundamentals of President Truman whenever he has been positive, as, for example, his support of the internationalization of waterways. I am opposed to the tough and rough attitude in our Nation or with other peoples. The bully in international relations is no more effective than the club-swinging cop in national relations.

Why should America be backward in putting forth a policy based upon her own experiences? Our Constitution is now the oldest one on earth and is, in a sense, a mother of them all. Our Federal history is proof that world organization is practical and possible. Our defense of individual rights in law is proof that individual man can live in great government without fear. Can we say to the world, These things we have done, and we have found them beneficial both to individual man and to the communities of man? They are yours if you want to use them. They are theories which can be forced on no man or no group. They come only by common consent. Take them and make them yours as you wish. We are not selfish in their use.

The People Have Met the Crisis Nobly—Will the Administration Do as Well?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, despite the efforts of Bowles, OPA & Co., to precipitate a stampede, the American people have thus far answered President Truman's reckless veto of price control in magnificent fashion.

The following excerpts from messages are typical of those coming to my office.

From an apartment house owners and managers association:

The apartment division of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Omaha, meeting at noon Monday, representing over 4,000 residential rental units, pledged themselves to make no rent increases at the present time. We urge all owners of residential rental property to cooperate with us in this program.

From a homemaker in Connecticut:

I heard 14 "little people" express astonished joy Saturday at the ending of OPA. Only the owner of a soda fountain-newsstand was skeptical. "It's too good to be true," he said. "They'll find some way to keep it on our necks." One neighbor says she thinks there ought to be some kind of price control. She and her husband drive weekly into Pennsylvania to a black-market source and supply neighbors with flour, butter, and meat; last week $104 worth of meat.

From a housewife:

I hope to heaven you-all can keep OPA dead. If you can, this will be a historical turning point to be remembered as long as Paul Revere's ride.

From the executive committee of the Omaha Hotel Association:

It is the opinion of the officers and the executive committee of this association that they concur in a recommendation to our member hotels as well as all hotel operators of Omaha that we hold the line and make no room rate or menu price increases.

From a clothing merchant, Plattsmouth, Nebr.:

As for ourselves we have decided on the following policy—Every item of merchandise in our store at this time will be sold to you at exactly the same price it was sold last week under OPA regulations. * * * We are doing this in hopes it may contribute in some small way to the fight against inflation and show what the reaction of one small store is to the termination of grievous OPA regulations.

Mr. Speaker, despite the foregoing, the people of America cannot keep prices down long if the administration continues to dilute our currency by deficit spending.

The people can treat the effects of inflation, higher prices. But only the administration and Congress can stop the outpouring of paper currency that causes higher prices.

If the British loan is passed, and other inflationary hand-outs continue, prices will go up despite the patriotism and self-restraint of the people.

The radicals who demanded the veto must not get away with any effort now to shift the blame for 14 years of Roosevelt-Truman New Deal inflationary spending. That wild spending—and not prices—is the cause of the rise in the cost of living.

OPA WAS FAKE WEAPON AGAINST INFLATION

The noise and furor about continuing OPA to stop inflation is futile and useless as long as only effects of inflation, and not inflation itself, are attacked.

The genuine remedies to high prices are to cut expenses of Government, reduce the national debt during this prosperous period, reenact one-half the wartime excess-profits tax, keep OPA and subsidies dead, and return purse strings of Government to Congress.

Unless these steps are taken, the current magnificent fight by the people against a heart-breaking rise in the cost of living will eventually be lost.

The left-wing columnists shout "The fight against inflation is now up to business and the people. If they can't restrain prices, Government must again step in."

What a damnable lie that supposed warning is!

An honest Government will stop the cause of inflation—Government deficit spending.

Has the administration the guts to balance the Budget and recapture by taxes some of the billions of inflation dollars it has issued in 14 years?

That courage, or lack of it, in Government will determine the outcome of the present fight by the people.

Whether or not we have ruinous inflation depends on what President Truman and Congress do about Government spending—and not what business or the people do.

The people and industry are doing their part. Let the President and the Congress now live up to their responsibility.

Victory can result only if the administration reverses its pork-barrel spending. If it has the courage to make that about-face, the present brave skirmish will end in general victory.

How difficult the task will be is demonstrated by the financial table appearing below. This index illustrates the currency debauchery of 14 years of the New Deal. It should be kept in mind. Otherwise the cunning New Deal efforts to shift the blame for the inflation they have caused will be successful.

We Keep a Promise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES W. HUFFMAN

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. HUFFMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "We Keep a Promise," published in the Cleveland Plain Dealer of June 26, 1946. It comments on the freedom we are granting to the Philippines tomorrow.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE KEEP A PROMISE

A week from tomorrow, on the one-hundred-and-seventieth anniversary of its own independence, the United States of America will carry out on schedule a promise made 12 years ago. On July 4, an American soldier in Manila will haul down the American flag and then stand by as the flag of the new Philippine Republic is hoisted in its place.

Thus, by purely voluntary action, the United States will relinquish its political control over its largest dependency, taken twice from other powers by the blood of American boys, and give to the world its fifteenth largest independent nation. Population-wise, the Philippine Republic will be larger than 55 other independent states, including all the members of the British Commonwealth excepting Great Britain an all the Latin American nations excepting Brazil.

Technically, this is a unique event in the history of the world, for never before has a dependency of a great power achieved complete political independence without force. Actually, however, the precedent was set by Great Britain when it granted, through peaceful and friendly agreement, what amounts to political autonomy to five of its former colonies—Canada, Australia, the Union of South Africa, New Zealand, and Eire.

Actually, moreover, the relations between the United States and the Philippine Republic will remain, for some time at least, very similar to those existing between Great Britain and the independent members of the commonwealth. Official economic ties between the United States and the Philippines will be loosened only gradually, our State Department will assist the new republic in the development of its foreign diplomacy, by agreement we will retain naval bases in the islands for their and our own protection, and the constitution of the new republic is essentially a copy of that of the United States.

And yet, if this is not the first actual example of a great nation voluntarily granting independence to one of its possessions, it is of special significance in this period when another of the world's three greatest powers seems intent on gobbling up, by one means or another, sovereign states in its sphere of influence.

When the smaller nations of the world compare this action of the United States—and that of the British in their withdrawal from Egypt and their apparently sincere offer of political independence to India—with the Russian action in the Baltic and Balkan areas, they must have some difficulty in believing the Communist propaganda that in Russia lies the world's best hope for leadership toward a free and peaceful world.

Protests British Actions in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news release:

LEAGUE PROTESTS BRITISH ACTIONS IN PALESTINE

NEW YORK, July 1, 1946.—The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League today sent the following cablegram of protest to the Right Honorable Clement Attlee, Prime Minister of Great Britain:

"On behalf of an organization which for 12 years has insisted upon fuller and stronger support by the American public of a common cause with our British allies we protest your government's unilateral and uncalled for onslaught in Palestine against the remnants of a people preeminently distinguished for their loyalty and suffering in fighting our military enemies. The action taken in Palestine has deeply shocked us, as has also your support of the Arab League, an agency of countries most of whose leaders were of inestimable help to Hitler in the destruction of American and British lives and property, and whose paid propagandists are operating in the United States to spread an agitation of race and religious hatred. We believe that British steps against Jews in Palestine are comparable with Hitler's actions and that coupled with your failure to seek punishment of Arab war criminals including the Mufti and other Moslem quislings whose aid to the Nazis is a matter of record, these steps must appear to American Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish veterans as acts of treachery against a friendly people committed at a moment when peace treaties are still unwritten and while England is engaged in negotiations seeking financial and other aid from the United States. Your government's suggestion that American troops be sent to Palestine as a condition to living up to your pledged obligations cannot be understood unless the purpose of such troops is to protect the people of that unfortunate land from the violence of British armies already quartered there but now failing to take effective steps to arrest pro-Axis Arab leaders or to carry out the program of the Anglo-American Commission of Inquiry on Palestine. Americans are also disturbed by the censorship over recent events in Palestine imposed in a manner identical with practices of the totalitarian countries of which your spokesmen have been quick to complain. We have always supported a policy of intimate political and economic cooperations between America and Great Britain on the assumption that Great Britain would pursue a democratic world policy, but candor compels us to say that if present developments are symptomatic we and much of the rest of organized American public opinion will be compelled to reconsider our positions toward other aspects of Anglo-American cooperation and to question the motives for which England has been fighting. We have urged the President and Congress of the United States to implement the position taken above and are mailing copies of this cable to the Right Honorable Winston Churchill and to leading members of the British Parliament along with evidence to indicate our point of view is that of a majority of Americans.

NON-SECTARIAN ANTI-NAZI LEAGUE,
JAMES H. SHELDON,

Preparedness for World Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Preparedness for World Unity," delivered by me at the twenty-second session of the Institute of World Affairs, June 25, 1946, at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Calif.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A well-trained citizenry is America's best dream; it should be the world's best dream.

American education based upon the great public-school system recognizes the place for the home, the church, and private organizations in our educational set-up. The endowed schools are too well established and are functioning too successfully for the benefit of America ever to attempt to do anything but to aid them in a better functioning of their contributions to American life. The church schools have found their place in the American system and are contributing to the evolution and development of their own objectives, as well as to the growth and development of American democracy. The home, too, through such agencies as the parent-teacher associations, and as a result of the thoroughly democratic manner in which teachers in our public schools are trained and selected, is contributing its share to the proper growth and development of our Nation. The great problem—which is a fundamental problem of a democracy—is that of preserving the individual that he might attain the maximum of potential enlargement; always in theory and practice stressing the importance of maintaining the concept of the individual, that the welfare of the citizen shall be the reason for government; and at the same time developing the community so that it will exert the influence of society upon the individual and thus temper him, that his aims and activities shall be bent toward social helpfulness. Education's task is to serve the leaven that will preserve the individual, yet mold him to a thoughtfulness of his place as one of many others. That is democracy's mission.

Was there ever a time for a greater need? Pay attention to world trends and see if those ideals and those ideas which have made us a nation stand in danger. As a reader of history, I count the American experiment definitely worth while. This land is one where many peoples and cultures mingle and from the contributions of all receive an enhanced appreciation of each. As one who has been made by America—who is a product, or should I say, a "victim" of our American school system—I count this land blessed and its ideals and ideas worthy of preservation. And in the preservation of those ideas and ideals I count our schools the greatest contributor. Can government ever have a greater function than that of its own preservation? Education is the path democracy trends; propaganda is the way of the dictator and dictatorships, and there is a vast difference. Shall the people learn the truth, be free to express it, discover it, expand it, and use it, or shall they be given just what is for their good? Thoughtful American citizens demand the first. He who would destroy democracy in America will picture the second as attractive. Equality of early educational opportunity offers democracy's greatest chance.

Conditions are not perfect, but ideals controlling and governing education in America are more widely and universally accepted today than they ever were before. In fact, educators are in reality a unit when it comes to these things. All recognize the place for the home, the place for the church, the place for the endowed private institution, and the place for the public school in our educational scheme. There is in reality no conflict. The great American Government settled once and for all that it was possible even in the individual for many loyalties to exist without producing an inconsistency. Thus, all contribute to the building of our Nation. American citizenship has become so complex that we no longer divide our all into those things which are to be rendered unto Caesar and to those which are to be rendered unto God. American citizenship has now evolved to the place that even in our constitutional system itself the complexity of the citizen is recognized, for in the Fourteenth Amendment we laid down the principles that persons born in the United States, and under its jurisdiction, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. There are, you see, at least two political loyalties in each of us and there is no conflict. With the adoption of that principle of citizenship came a tremendous significance to our constitutional scheme and new America had its beginning with that theory. This theory expanded—the recognition of the fact of dual or triple citizenship—the notion of many loyalties inherent in man—and you have all of the essential constitutional elements for world organization. World unity, thus, is made possible without destroying national unity or local unity. That, too, is America's contribution to the world.

We fought our Civil War because men could not see that a person could have a dual loyalty. For the first 75 years of our national development, concepts in regard to sovereignty controlled the thinking of all of our statesmen. The Constitution itself was a symbol of sovereignty and so were the constitutions of every individual State, and therein came the clash. "Sovereignty is indivisible," said Webster. "Sovereignty is surely indivisible," said Calhoun. "Sovereignty must therefore rest in the Nation," said Webster. "Sovereignty must therefore rest in the State," said Calhoun. And then we fought.

A better light dawned and wiser heads, after the shedding of our brothers' blood, realized that we were fighting over a principle that need not be, and we learned that our Federal system could be preserved through the creation of a dual citizenship without loss to either state or nation, but with benefit to each. That is America's promise for world unity.

Various thinkers approach our constitutional development in different ways. I like to do it in this way: The Constitution came into being that moment that various men throughout our Thirteen Colonies recognized the fact that there were some things which were of common concern to all of the Colonies. It was that thought which made us a nation. World unity will come when men throughout the world recognize that there are many things which are of common concern to all of the nations.

In April of 1775 we had Lexington and Concord; in May we had the meeting of the Second Continental Congress; in June we had Bunker Hill; in July we had Washington taking command of the Army of the United States at Cambridge. Those four steps are history. Their significance is the thing which I would stress now. Lexington and Concord were Massachusetts incidents. The meeting of the Second Continental Congress was a reaffirmation of the fact on the part of the leaders in all of the Colonies that there were elements in the various local conflicts that were of common concern. Bunker Hill was, therefore, the first fight after the discovery of this concept. By that fight the de facto government of the United States came into existence and Washington the following month ratified that concept in accepting the command of the Army of the United States. The Declaration of Independence in the following July turned the de facto United States Government into a de jure government, and the American nation was born. As the nation grew, written descriptions of these fundamental concepts were created by the preparation of the Articles of Confederation and our Constitution. This gave us a Federal system, creating one out of many but based upon the theory that each State should take care of its local affairs, but the Nation should take care of those affairs which were of common concern to all. And our Federal system based upon this simple concept actually existed before our Constitution and was the mother of it, not its child as so many seemed to think. Today this distinction is not essential because both mother and child are fused in the dim past.

In August 1914 a great clash came between the nations in Europe. America thought that that clash was no concern of hers, but by April 1917 America realized that war anywhere was of concern to her. And in November 1918, she, with the associated powers, forced a peace which accepted the fact that the peace of the world was to be of concern to all of the world, but the world did not accept this thesis, nor did we. Then came the second great clash. Again we were made conscious of the fact that war anywhere was of concern to all everywhere, and before the war was won nations, which called themselves peace-loving, had accepted a charter based upon the theory that if each nation would give a little all might be benefited—a charter looking forward to world unity in peace. Once again we have made the steps toward world organization based upon the theory that there are many things of common concern to all. The promise is yet to be realized.

Now I revert back to our own history to make my point doubly clear. In the beginning our national citizenship was not thought of. Today, world citizenship is not thought of. The Constitution remained a symbol of sovereignty, thought of more or less as a static affair. Then it evolved into a living organism, much as a result of changing concepts in the world and as a result of judicial review and Marshall's great reasoning in expounding the doctrines of a Constitution that was established to endure through the ages. Then came the Civil War, and after it came the concept of dual citizenship. And today no longer is the Constitution a mere symbol of sovereignty; no longer is our Constitution a mere embodiment of a living organism, but today it has become in every deed the companion of the American people in the accomplishment of their objectives. Thus it is not only the word and the letter of the law but it is its living spirit.

Now let us turn to the growth of some of our national educational habits as they have evolved in relation to our constitutional development. Federal aid for education is not new. That which has been done has in no sense harmed the local control or marred our Constitution's spirit. It was in Buchanan's administration, I believe, that the first bill to create the land-grant colleges was introduced. You all know how our country had grown politically and economically, how the movement to the West carried the ideals of the American educational system, but not the facilities for its preservation. My own State and territory reflect the theory very well, for the second act of our territorial legislature created the university which became one of the first to be established west of the Mississippi and one of the earliest to inaugurate the coeducational system.

You will remember that after the bill creating the land-grant colleges passed Congress, President Buchanan vetoed the bill on the score that there was no provision in the Constitution of the United States for Federal aid for education. But with the coming of Lincoln, and with the necessities growing out of or incident to the Civil War, Lincoln found a sanction in our Constitution and signed the bill and our land-grant institutions became a fact. Probably this act of Lincoln's has meant more to the growth and development of American democracy than any other single act. When one realizes what has been accomplished in research alone by the great institutions which have evolved from this simple act of Lincoln's, sanctioned undoubtedly as an act consistent with the national defense provision of the Constitution, one realizes its importance not only to our country but to the whole world. Yet if we had remained strict constructionists in constitutional theory, if we had conceived our Constitution as a mere symbol of sovereignty and the division of rights merely between the State and the Nation, we could not have taken this great step. But on analysis we see that what was taking place was merely the same as that which took place when our Nation came into existence. Lincoln discovered one more thing which had been conceived of as being merely of local concern actually to have been something of national concern. Pause long enough and consider, if you will, the retarded growth of our country had Lincoln persisted in maintaining Buchanan's constitutional outlook.

Today we stand on the world's threshold in much the same position that our Nation stood when Buchanan vetoed the Land-Grant College Act. The United Nations has a Division of Educational, Cultural, and Scientific Research. Will the nations of the world accept the thesis that these great factors in our world life are of common concern to all and, with the foresight of Lincoln, cause the nations of the world to accept this fact and make education everywhere a concern of all?

That also is the story of the building of our railroads. That also is the story of the evolution of Federal relief and Federal aid for the distressed. We must remember that during the extremely hard times of Cleveland's administration, when the farms throughout the Mississippi Valley were left so dry and desolate that even seed crops were not preserved, a bill was introduced into Congress to provide for Federal aid to farmers, but Cleveland vetoed that bill as a strict constructionist on the theory that the Government of the United States was set up to be supported by the people and not to support the people of the United States. But with the growth of the need for relief and the development of the cooperative activities between the State and the Nation has come, of course, the necessary change. Thus internationally UNRRA is logical and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Constitution is another recognition of this growth toward world unity. Yet who today would call Buchanan or Cleveland illogical? Constitutional development is not a matter always of logic; there come times when it is a matter of necessity. This is one of those times.

Just as our Constitution came into being the moment the Colonies recognized the fact that there were some things which were of common concern, world unity can come into being because the nations of the earth recognize the existence of things which are of common concern. The constitution, charter, or whatever document which may be set up as the companion of the people of the world, just as our Constitution has become the companion of the American people, will also go through a similar process of evolution and development. And along with that will also come a further development and evolution of our educational scheme to meet the necessities of the times. Jefferson with the fullest faith in the ability of man to govern himself, nonetheless realized that the responsibility of self-government could be assured successfully only by an enlightened people.

We had statistics about illiteracy as a result of the last war and we learned that the one privileged group under the Selective Service Act were those who were deferred because they were not able to understand a simple written order. We should have learned that illiteracy did not pay, that poverty produces illiteracy, and that many a fine boy lost his life because he had taken a place ahead of his time because so many others were proved unfit. The records of our Selective Service System reveal that more than 2,000,000 men were rejected because of health or educational deficiencies. States where educational opportunities and educational standards were high provided more men per capita to our armed forces. The greatest number of rejections occurred in those States where educational standards are low. It could, therefore, be concluded that the raising of educational standards and the granting of greater educational opportunities automatically raise health standards. The two go hand in hand. The First World War brought to light our educational weakness, but the advantages which America is capable of giving to her citizenry and of which our founders dreamed do not yet exist. In comparison with Russia, Germany, and other European countries, America is strong in the applications of science but weak in its program of developing mastery in fundamental sciences. Through the experiences of the last two great wars we have learned that a nation's greatest asset is well-trained minds.

There can be no peace in the world until there is some contentment, until living standards are such that men and women can produce not only enough to live on but a surplus to keep that living bigger, better, and more complete. I shall take my illustration for the accomplishment of this from two pieces of legislation, both of which were deemed very impractical. First, the soldier education bill, and, second, the Full Employment Act. I believe that for the first time that a nation has attempted to express itself with thankfulness to those who have served it well, by offering educational advantages to the individuals who have come out of hat service, place the philosophy of education where it should be put. The soldier education bill is not a bill primarily for the benefit of the soldier boys and girls, it is for the benefit of the Nation and the American people. Realizing what happened to France and what happened to England as a result of the last war, we recognized the loss of a whole generation of leadership and the American Government was determined that a generation of leadership should not be lost to us as a result of this war. The soldier education act is based upon that theory. Build us a better nation is its slogan. No one knows that better that I do because I myself wrote that theory into the bill.

The Full Employment Act is not a pitiful piece of fragamentary mutterings based upon a flimsy interpretation of the slogan "the right to work." The full-employment idea had its concept in the notion that it was Government's duty to see that its people are well fed, well housed, and well schooled. The Government is not entirely unselfish in this. We have, you know, the Federal income-tax system and the more you earn the more all of the people get through a distribution of taxes collected. At one time, when governments belonged to kings, taxation was a burden for the benefit of the few. I know of no privileged class under the theory of our tax system. But 10 years ago there were many groups of overly privileged. The strange thing is, hard as it was to bring about these simple reforms, no one complains over their accomplishment today.

I like our dollar economy as it works today. Some make greater profits than others, but the theory of the leveling remains. There will always be those who are ahead, who are brighter, who live better by their wits, who gain more than others. That is America. I have no objection to it as long as it is not done by advantage-taking, and there will be no advantage-taking that will last very long if the problems of our economics are made part of our educational scheme. We must see basic causes and effects. In the individual you will note that the cure for many a clash in our economic life is attained through the simple device of equal opportunity, a real life of interdependence, a spirit of mutuality.

If demagogues come into being because of slogans based upon assumed or actual injustices, is it not better to have a just peace and make the demagogue impossible than to spend all of our energies knocking out his contrivances and overcoming his ambitions? Cure the ills of inequality throughout the world and the type of peace we have in America will become possible. This does not mean a time of bliss, a world of inaction, nor a world without strife. But the strife can be of a different type; contest, competition for constructive purposes instead of destructive purposes might pay if we would only get the idea.

In the last war, through lack of preparation and training, boys died getting them into the service. In this war there has been less of that. In the last war boys died of lockjaw and other preventive diseases. In this war there has been less of that. Look to your community health standards, your educational standards. Has it paid to have them a little better? That is my point; simple, so simple that you will say that everyone knows that. But does everyone? The next time a great problem faces you try to settle it on the basis of fundamental understanding of that problem instead of a basis of force. It is only through the schools that such an understanding can come. It is those who know the history of mankind and the advancing march of civilization who do not lose faith in the great fundamentals of America and her mission.

I suggest two great historical events that should form the basis of a new educational approach to better industrial labor relations at home and the advancement of peace throughout the earth. First, is the establishment of the International Labor Organization, based upon the simple theory that the raising of the standards of the people of the world is the only sure way to the peace of the world. In the wake of such philosophy has come all of the aspirations of the common people of the earth. Never has the world seen that which has taken place today among the common people of the whole world. World War II was called the people's war in more places than in America. Study contemporary art, drama, and literature, and see how simple concepts, laid down in the basic theory behind the International Labor Organization, have become the aspiration of literally millions of people in the earth.

As a result of intolerable conditions in those nations ruled by single-will tyrants, thousands of refugees, dubbed intellectuals, have come to America. The effect of the thinking and working of these men and women is not yet apparent. I predict a greater intellectual renaissance in this glorious land of ours, a renaissance which will affect the whole world, a renaissance of scientific thinking and political idealism which will be pointed out by future generations and which will make the last half of the twentieth century a century of inspiration such as the world had in the sixth century, B. C., and the first century, A. D. We are living in mighty times; times which will result in universal acceptance as significant in the history of ideas as were the democratic ideals of the gospel of Buddha and the antiaristocratic ideals of the Confucian philosophy based upon the training of man whose nature is good; as great even in its lasting significance as was the greatest of all contributions in the development of democracy, the discovery of Jesus of the individual and of that individual's worth in the eternal scheme of things. There will be no single concept quite as great as that given the world by Jesus. But, in the renaissance, every idea developed will be complementary to those of the sixth century, B. C., and the first century, A. D. And that the ideas will be lasting is assured because they will be developed under the auspices of that government which has evolved upon the theories of our founding fathers.

The next historic event which I say marks the very acme of decent industry-labor relations in the United States and the one on which we should have based all of our industry-labor actions since its inception was the industry-labor conference held in Washington in 1941. A new thing happened in industry-labor relations at that time when the representatives of industry and of labor unanimously accepted my motion that there should be no strikes and no lock-outs but that all disputes should be settled by peaceful means. That is the foundation upon which to build. Make your industry-labor techniques rest upon that constitution and you will have industry-labor peace in America. Whoever was responsible for a different approach and for the belittling of the great action taken in 1941 is responsible for much of the industry-labor suffering we have had in the past few years. Whoever is responsible for not living up to the principles of that great promise made is responsible for keeping back the peaceful evolution of our industry-labor relations for a whole generation.

We missed an opportunity when the going was hard and men crusaded. Gains are more difficult to achieve now that we have war prosperity. Who cares about labor, except to resent the newest strike? Who cares about employment so long as most people can get some kind of job in at least a few weeks of mild effort? Our muscles relaxed after a hard war, we are soft as putty. There will be strikes; there will be clashes; there will be contests; there will be resorts to courts, mediation boards, and conciliation, but you cannot, by law, do away with the evils incident to the stoppage of pay, the idleness of strikes, the slipping back into poverty and debt, the keeping of kiddies from schools, and the actual killings which have sometimes resulted. This is the lesson of our times. I repeat, a guarantee of labor technique in law will not make for peace. A recognition of the broad objectives for which all should strive in our society is the key to final labor peace, higher standards, decent schools, honest hours, protected savings, and equal opportunity; for each to move into the field of his great aspiration and into the sphere of his potential capacity.

What is the great fear in America today that underlies the threatening industry-labor unrest? Despite our full employment act and despite our prayers, the unconscious juggling for position in our present-time industry-labor strife is a fear of future unemployment. We may be in for it, I do not know. But when we again come face to face with this problem, let us recognize it. It is a religious undertaking and will be attained only through zeal amounting to a religion. Who today in the United States will defend some of the practices we proved right here in California in our civil-liberties investigation.

The constitution of decent industry-labor relations is the motion accepted by industry and labor in 1941. That did not destroy any rights. That merely said that we will turn to the techniques of peace rather than the techniques of war for the settlement of our disputes and for the attainments of our objectives. That should be fundamental in America.

That man could destroy his civilization has been known, theoretically, for many years; now there is actual proof that he can. Atomic bombs have been unleashed in international society, the results of which have no comparison in history. However, the atomic bomb is proof of something more. It is proof that man's ideas can be mightier than man himself and mightier than the matter which surrounds him. The new atomic weapon is a product of the minds of brilliant scientists; it is not, in a real sense, a military development. It is an idea materialized, a frightful idea that only a few erudite physicists can grasp. It is the product of scientific laboratories and of remote electronic investigations. It is final proof that man's ideas have become superior to the very matter from which the thinking brain itself is constructed.

Much as the atomic bomb has been praised by persons of all classes since the destruction of Hiroshima, probably because I am so close to so many great and seemingly miraculous discoveries, the place of the atomic bomb in the history of culture does not seem to me to be as epic making as the invention of the wheel, the discovery of the storability of cereal foods, or the domestication of animals. From a military standpoint, to my mind, it is just another weapon. It is not as deadly as biological warfare would be if we stooped to that, nor as destructive as the use of rays or chemicals on major scales. I say all of this despite the commonplace statement that the destructive strength of 70 bombs, such as the Hiroshima one, would be equivalent to all other types of bombs dropped from the air over Germany and Japan. If total death, complete destruction become the objectives of actual warfare there are many instruments more deadly and more destructive than the atomic bomb. Those who have zealously assumed that the invention of the bomb would guarantee peace because it makes war so illogical are merely echoing what was said by so many persons when international control of money was certain to make war impossible and when, through the invention of the airplane, spherical warfare became a fact. War has never been logical.

In international society man's ideas are also paramount to physical matter. Law and custom will continue to be the controlling factors in that society, and they are but a product of man's thinking. The development of a new technique of destruction will not upset men's way of living together; only a change in law and custom can do that.

We can conceive of the world being a desolate place without life, for we have studied the moon We have heard for 20 centuries the undeniable truth that "he who lives by the sword shall perish by the sword." If mankind could be transformed by fear of consequences, however, he would have been reformed centuries ago when God sent the flood down on Noah's land. Yet, within a generation after the ark had landed at Mount Ararat, the Bible suggests that sinning was just as bad, qualitatively, as it was before the deluge descended.

The fact that the use of the atomic bomb may have done more good than harm is a matter of blind luck. The facts appear to be that a number of powerful nations have the formula, or something like it, and that others came so close that a correctible accident in one of the experiments changed the whole path of victory. It is not difficult to assume that the United States and Germany might well have discovered and perfected the bomb, gone into production, and come out with the weapon simultaneously. With such an hypothesis it is not difficult to appreciate the weapon, not as a fright used against a Japanese city, then a repeat performance to show we meant business, with no real thought that we should be compelled to continue its frightfulness, but as an actual day-by-day working tool of war. Add to this prospect the radar discoveries announced by the Chief of our Army Air Forces together with other new weapons which have a way of constantly coming along in greater intensity and abundance in any war, and we have the world's match boxes in two pairs of hands. We do not need to guess whether the war would have continued if we had razed Berlin and Germany had razed Washington; if we had traded Essen for Pittsburgh, the Redwood Forest for the Black, and ruined the Mississippi for exchange of the Rhine. So long as there was authority in either land there would be striking power and there would be striking. Nations slug it out to the death in the manner of the old prize fighters who went through tens upon tens of rounds until they could not longer stand. This was true of the civil war in Spain. It was true of the War Between the States in America. It was true of cornered Japan, cornered Germany, cornered Italy. They did not quit as up-and-coming, going concerns. They dropped from their last legs.

Nor are combatants discouraged by the prospect of total decimation of a race, or a people, or a world. What sterner lesson in history than the reduction cited above, when only mates of man and of animals, two by two, were left in the Ark? What more awful contemplation than that a whole Carthage again be wiped out to the last Carthaginian, as Germany told Germans would happen if the Allied Nations should win, as Japan told Japanese if the Allied Nations should win, or as we would hope for in merciful comparison with the actual contemplation in the event that the Axis should win.

Enduring peace cannot come through fear; it cannot be maintained by any technique of physical destruction, nor by fear of any single piece of war matériel. Peace can come only as a result of a respect for law and a desire to have such law justly enforced. Thus, the structure of the world's law is more important than any bomb could ever be. The bombs can, and perhaps may, destroy much of world civilization. Only a structure of law can save it. Peace may come from hopeful and honest effort.

Yet, if man insists upon keeping his concepts of strict nationalism, absolute independence, and complete state sovereignty, this common effort must fail and man's new inventions, such as atomic dissolution, will be used for destructive purposes in the ultimate collisions of states' wills which are bound to occur. Physics may again dominate politics and the theory of relativity may thus save the world.

Could man endure to live in such an anarchic world with the seeds of destruction sprouting all about him? History, unfortunately, suggests that he can—and may—until catastrophe eventually overtakes him. Famines and plagues have periodically carried off millions of people in India and China. Both Italy and Japan have been areas of terrible natural destruction from volcanoes and earthquakes. Yet persons have continued to live in the most dangerous areas of those lands. The Japanese devised earthquake-proof houses; the Italians did not even bother. Both India and China are apparently as far from a solution of the famine question as ever. Man can, and often has, lived uncomprehendingly upon the very brink of disaster. The uncertainty of life has often given it zest. Who wants anything but a brave young world?

The atomic bomb in many of its aspects is more terrible than any natural disaster. When an earthquake destroys man, it is Nature's doing. When the atomic bomb destroys man, it is man planning his own destruction. Those who contend that the horrible prospect of future warfare will cure man of his bad habits reckon without the ability of man to live carelessly, blindly, and nonchalantly in the midst of a physical situation that may threaten to destroy him at any time.

In all of the world's history civilization has never before presented so many excellent possibilities nor have the destroyers of civilization ever perpetrated so many ills. If, as some of the philosophers held, good and evil exist eternally, never have they dwelt side by side in such close proximity as they dwell today.

In many ways the world we have today is like the world implied in Cicero's great orations against Cataline. Cataline, a boy, a choice one among the youths of Rome, with all of the opportunities that anyone had opened to him, and he deliberately chose evil. Perhaps the world is not so different after all. At any rate the good and the evil are side by side. Man must awaken from his lethargy. We and the world cannot be indifferent. We and the world must make a choice.

In 1904 in the Russo-Japanese War General Nogi of the Japanese Army performed one of the most notable acts in all the history of warfare when, in a battle to capture Port Arthur, he sacrificed several brigades of men and his own sons in order to capture a certain strongly defended hill. He wanted the hill so that he could direct his artillery fire against the Russian naval base. He could have fired over the hill without taking it, but refused because blind fire would have endangered innocent noncombatants in the city below.

Less than 30 years later, January 1932, the Japanese first practiced wanton, deliberate killing of massed civilians by their bombing of Chapei, a suburb of Shanghai. The entire world was horrified by the murderous act. Sometime between those dates Japan had changed. But it was not only Japan that had changed. The United States had changed, too, and so had the other Western Powers. Americans put up barricades to bar stampeding Chinese from the International Settlement. Hundreds died as they fought for safety. We were indifferent to their deaths. An American naval captain and his party callously climbed to the top of the tallest hotel to "watch the show."

As this and other events of modern barbarism swept the world during the past 13 years, Americans have asked themselves in the words of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

We can look in retrospect at the war's contribution to the horrors of history. There was Buchenwald and the others like them, where German atrocities almost defied comprehension. There was the death march of Bataan. The atrocities were so horrible from the other side, that soldiers, American soldiers, have told me; these are not people; I have no more feeling in killing one of them than I would an animal In fact, I would prefer to let the animal live. Such is a retaliatory feeling. One of the first developments of the war was the instruction to our trainees not to be so lady-like about the whole thing. They were told to forget the sportsmanship they had applied on the football field. They were taught to kill suddenly in the dark and without warning They were not told to kill a helpless enemy soldier who might be taken prisoner, but I leave it to you whether our boys or any other country's boys always let them live. The competition was pretty fierce for dastardly conduct, and while we did not meet competition, we compromised our best standards, and did lower them. There began to be things, which under 1939 standards very definitely would have been American, and Russian, and English, and Chinese atrocities.

Today, few citizens pause to realize that we, once the defenders of humanity and the foremost advocates of international law, have unleashed the most horrible weapon of all horrible war. The atomic bomb takes no account at all of women and children. It destroys indiscriminately and mercilessly everything in its path. Will the effect of the atomic bomb be to make Americans even more calloused toward human life? Will it brutalize the men who wield it? Will it make us even more indifferent toward our international responsibilities?

War has been bad enough, but the drift away from morality and human feelings on the part of all the world during the past decade has been even worse. Never was a reminder of the sound principles in the conduct of world affairs more urgent. No one can foresee the tragic results of failure to reestablish international morality, which has so completely disintegrated before and during the present world struggle. Once again, what is happening to men's minds is more important than what has happened in the physical realm.

The world is not going to be changed overnight by any single invention. Man's mind moves slowly over a period of years, and his laws and customs change slowly with his thinking. It is not war and not the atomic bomb which has changed the world; it is man's mind, making use of these terrible tools, that has changed it. So long as man lives upon the earth and is the social animal that he is, man's relationship with man will continue to be the most important thing in civilization. Men have to work courageously together to improve their relationships in world society.

The world must be regarded as a unit. An unwholesome condition in any part affects the entire world. Despotism, treachery, and treaty-breaking in any part of the world must have their evil influence on every other part. On the other hand, "A single good government is a blessing to the whole earth." The interdependence of the nations, their differing abilities to produce various things of universal need, makes it necessary to think of the world as a unit economically as well as politically. There can be and there must be a universal respect for law if not for government. By that I mean, governments can maintain separate jurisdictions within themselves and at the same time live in harmony with the will of all among themselves.

World organization and world peace must be based upon reason, morals, and law. Why cannot men today see this as clearly as Jefferson did and realize, as he did, that the liberties of a nation cannot be secure "when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the gift of God?" If the peoples of the world are not convinced that there is such a thing as international immorality, how can we ever expect to establish international morality? Perhaps the sense of morality still exists in the world. Perhaps the world feels as helpless to do anything about the matter as Jefferson did about solving the slavery problem in his day. If we still know the difference between right and wrong, surely we should not deceive ourselves with the notion that we have no responsibility to pass judgment on the acts of nations. To tell people that they should remain indifferent to international injustice is to corrupt and mislead them.

Had the statesmen of Jefferson's day faced the moral issue of slavery they would have prevented a great war and years of painful readjustment. Surely the time has arrived for the statesmen of the world to realize that the time to check international immorality is in its incipiency. It is never wise to postpone the choice between right and wrong.

Address by Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, on Compulsory Arbitration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last night over Station WWDC I delivered an address on the subject of compulsory arbitration: An Answer to Industrial Chaos. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this address be reprinted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The talk was delivered over the "Congress Reports" program, a splendid public service feature of Station WWDC, designed to afford legislators the opportunity to present their views, without censorship of any kind, for the information of the people.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION: AN ANSWER TO INDUSTRIAL CHAOS

My Fellow Americans: There are over 2,000,000,000 human beings that inhabit this globe. Only about 200,000,000 of these people believe in a government by the people, of the people, and for the people—a representative republic or a democratic form of political life.

These 200,000,000 and their ancestors have learned through the centuries to live by and under law. At this very hour in the world's history, we are seeking for the way that will lead to a working world-wide legal order.

We have seen the startling advances and discoveries of physical science in the field of atomic research and in kindred fields. These advances are of such significance that all thinking people see the immediate urgent necessity for doing something more than we have done in the past to cause the peoples of earth to learn how to live together and work together in peace.

This same urge based on the reality of atomic force, which causes us to work and pray for the solution of international conflict, also is a factor in urging us on the domestic scene to find the solution to racial frictions and industrial strife.

If civilization is to survive, this globe must be governed by law. If our beloved Nation is to survive, we have to change much of our thinking. We have to cultivate a better way of human relationship, in order that we can better live together and work together.

THE RULE OF LAW IN INDUSTRY

Tonight, I speak to you on the subject of compulsory arbitration—a law for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes in utilities and vital Nation-wide industries.

In my opinion, such a law is eminently needed. I would have this law follow the general pattern of the accepted procedures of the Railway Labor Act, except that it would make arbitration compulsory rather than merely voluntary.

THE NATURE OF COMPULSORY ARBITRATION

What is compulsory arbitration? It is this: Suppose a strike threatens in a key industry. Labor and management would be required to choose arbitrators. The arbitrators would review the merits of the case and hand down a decision on wages or hours or working conditions. That decision would be binding on both labor and management. It would be enforceable by the courts. There would be no strike. That is what we mean by compulsory arbitration.

WHY COMPULSORY ARBITRATION?

The reason for a compulsory arbitration law is evident to any thinking person. It is to protect the public interest and the welfare of the public. It is to make impossible a general strike in utilities and vital Nation-wide industries in this atomic age.

I believe that mere mediation and voluntary arbitration machinery are not enough to save America from strike chaos. To be sure, the compulsory arbitration that I suggest would go into effect only after the previous steps of collective bargaining and mediation and voluntary arbitration had been fully exhausted.

I believe that in this critical period in the world's history it is inconceivable that we should rest our hopes in mere chance machinery, such as mediation and voluntary arbitration. Our recent experience clearly demonstrates how inadequate our present law is.

I believe further that a nation which can and did take 16,000,000 from its farms and its schools and its industries and place them in the uniform of our country can and should have a compulsory arbitration law in order to save the very values for which our men and women in the armed forces sacrificed so much.

America must be governed by law—by a compulsory arbitration law—if we are to prevent industrial chaos.

Heretofore, in our legislative halls, we have forgotten the interest of the public to a large extent. We have legislated employer-wise or labor-wise. Up to the present time, compulsory arbitration has been opposed generally by unions and employers, the employer thinking that arbitration might threaten the managerial rights of the employer, and labor thinking that it places in the hands of the arbitrators the power to injure the rights of the union. Both beliefs are mistaken. Compulsory arbitration will help both honest labor and management and harm neither.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PUBLIC INTEREST

In industries in which there is no public interest, in which the public is not vitally concerned, at the present time I would say that compulsory arbitration should not be used.

But where the industry is tied up with the general welfare and where the employer or labor or both neglect the rights of the public, there should be no question about the public's rights.

In other words, when we talk about compulsory arbitration, we talk about the action of the state to protect the general welfare. When collective bargaining, mediation, and all other steps have failed, then the state must step in as a last resort to prevent ruinous strikes. This step is justified under the police power, when it is applied to public utilities and to essential industries, and where the result of a labor dispute is likely to cause national stoppage of work, which would be disastrous to the public. Under such circumstances, if the legislature has spoken, compulsory arbitration is due process of law.

Justice Holmes, the great liberal, said:

"I have no doubt that when the power of either capital or labor is asserted in such a way as to attack the life of the community, those who seek their private interest at such costs are public enemies and should be dealt with as such."

Said Governor Coolidge, of Massachusetts:

"There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time."

Similar pronouncements were stated time and time again in the recent debate in Congress. But, we are asked, is compulsory arbitration the real answer to strikes in public utilities and in essential industries, where there is likely to be a national stoppage of operation which would be disastrous to the public?

I might answer the question by asking a question: "Are a police force and a court system the answer to roughnecks fighting in our streets and creating a public disturbance?"

You would probably answer "Yes," but with a qualification. You would probably say: "We have got to have a police force and a court system in order to enforce the peace and prevent public disturbances. But first of all it is up to our citizenry to keep the peace by themselves, without calling in the police and the courts."

That is my position. I believe it is up to labor and management to keep industrial peace by themselves. But, if they fail in their voluntary effort and if they create a situation which menaces the public safety and the public welfare, then it is up to government to see that adequate legal machinery is set up that will take care of that situation.

Suppose there is a dispute in a public utility, such as gas, water, electricity, transportation, and suppose efforts at voluntary mediation and arbitration fail? Then what? Shall all the lights in our cities go out; shall all the street cars and busses stop running? Shall the water supply be cut off? All because labor and management in vital industries could not get together?

From the thousands of letters that I have received in the past, when the labor bill was under discussion, I hear an emphatic "No." From laboring men, yes, from labor officials, there is a demand that Congress legislate for the public welfare and establish machinery for compulsory arbitration.

We know that this recent strike epidemic was the worst that we had experienced in our history. We know also that the strikes created the greatest menace of inflation because there was a stoppage of production. We may be in for another strike epidemic. Shall we fold our hands and wait until our country is again paralyzed by strikes? The public says "No." The time for action is now.

COMMUNIST AGITATION AGAINST ARBITRATION

Due to a lot of false propaganda, there is much misunderstanding about this idea of compulsory arbitration as a last resort, after all other efforts have failed. I don't know where this false propaganda originates, but I have an idea that our Communist friends have something to do with it.

As you know, the pattern of the Communist is to irritate and disrupt the orderly process of the democratic system so as to help stir up the world revolution. One of the basic techniques of communism from the days of Karl Marx to the present has been to create frictions between people, to disrupt the orderly process of a democratic system, cause people to be bewildered and disheartened, and get folks to mistrust and misunderstand one another. The Communist propaganda must be antidoted and Communist attempts at creating chaos must be checkmated by establishing a compulsory arbitration law.

NEED FOR CASE BILL

We also need the Case labor bill, which Congress passed, but which the President vetoed. You know there has been much misrepresentation about the Case bill, too.

I have an illustration about this which I think worth while relating to you. While the debate was on in relation to the Case bill, a labor friend of mine from my own State came to my office to see me. He was all "het up" over it and said he was dead set against the bill.

I sat down with him and cited the points which I am not stating. First, I asked, "Would you object to a bill which contained a provision for a Federal mediation board which would assist in the mediation and voluntary arbitration of labor disputes? This bill would provide that once the mediation board had offered its services the employer and the employee would not be able to strike or lock-out during a period of 60 days, during which there would be opportunity for mediation and arbitration."

He answered, "No; I would not be opposed to such a bill."

Then I asked, "Would you be against a provision in law which authorized special emergency fact-finding commissions to look into disputes involving public utilities and to make recommendations regarding wages, hours, and working conditions?"

He replied again, "No." (Remember that he had said he was dead against the Case labor bill.)

Then I said, "Would you be against making it a felony for anyone by robbery or extortion to obstruct commerce?"

Again, "No."

I said then, "Would you be against a provision which would prohibit the making of royalty payments to unions, except for specified purposes, such as health and welfare funds, which must, however, be administered jointly by labor and management?"

On that point he had the usual argument that if it was too narrow, he might be against it, but if it was broad enough he would be for it.

But I said, "Would you agree that the fund should be administered jointly by labor and management?"

His answer was, "Yes."

I then said, "Would you object to a provision which would make unions legally liable for damages for breach of a contract concluded after collective bargaining?"

He looked me straight in the face and said, "No."

I thrilled to his response. That is a great concept in America—that a contract is a meeting of minds, and that one cannot break it without responsibility.

Then I said, "Would you be against a law that would outlaw the use of secondary boycotts?"

He replied, "No."

"Why," I said, "My dear friend, that is all that the Senate version of the Case bill provides."

He said, "Is that so?"

I said, "Yes."

Fellow Americans, you will note that when my labor friend secured the facts in the case, he became of the same mind as myself. He supported the Case bill, as I believe all Americans—thinking Americans—should support it. So, too, I feel that folks generally will support compulsory arbitration, when they see what I mean by it, as a last resort, to be used only in utilities and Nation-wide industries.

The alternative to compulsory arbitration is industrial chaos, such as we almost experienced in the recent threatened railroad strike.

CONCLUSIONS

I conclude with these thoughts.

The public welfare is supreme in the case of utilities and Nation-wide industries.

No strikes should, therefore, be tolerated in these fields.

Ours must be a Government of law.

The Case bill should be enacted into law.

And, lastly, we should enact, too, a compulsory arbitration law.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. HUFFMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt concerning the equal status of women, published in the Washington Daily News of June 1, 1946.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON STATUS OF WOMEN

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

HYDE PARK.—As I was leaving the United Nations meeting a newspaper woman stopped me to ask if there was a cleavage in the Human Rights Commission on the subject of the report made by the subcommission on the status of women.

I was glad to be able to tell her that there has been no disagreement that I know of on the part of any member of the Commission.

Some of us felt that the report, because it was the work of a nuclear subcommission operating under very definite terms of reference, had perhaps covered too much ground and gone into too much detail. However, except for this one criticism, which certainly meant no fundamental cleavage in thinking, I heard no criticism of any of the recommendations made.

It is known that I have opposed a group of women in this country, who have been in favor of an equal-rights amendment to our Constitution.

As some of them have been active in working on the outskirts, so to speak, of this subcommission, I suppose they felt that I would be in opposition to the report. That, of course, is not true.

I believe that, if the ladies who are so anxious to have a Federal amendment for equal rights would devote as much energy toward changing the State laws which really interfere with the rights of our women, they would soon find they had little of which to complain.

I am still opposed to an equal-rights amendment, which would make it possible to wipe out much of the legislation which has been enacted in many States for the protection of women in industry. This, however, has nothing to do with the report in question.

We cannot change the fact that women are different from men. It's true that some women can do more than men, and some can do men's jobs better than men can do them. But the fact that they are different cannot be changed, and it is fortunate for us that this is the case.

The best results are always obtained when men and women work together, with the recognition that their abilities and contributions may differ, but that in every field they supplement each other.

The report of the subcommission on the status of women frankly recognized this difference and the need for special considerations where women are concerned.

I do not know whether the group I mentioned are opposed to this section of the report or not, but I am quite sure that, as this is an international report, they will have comparatively little influence on the thinking of the Economic and Social Council in its consideration of the report as a whole.

Independence for Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the text of addresses delivered over national hook-up of the American Broadcasting Co. on June 18, 1946, by the distinguished former Senator from Iowa, the Honorable Guy M. Gillette, president of the American League for a Free Palestine, and myself.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF RADIO ADDRESS BY FORMER SENATOR GUY M. GILLETTE, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR A FREE PALESTINE

It appears from the study of Great Britain's record on Palestine that she supports the lofty ideals of democracy provided they happen to coincide with the interests of the British Empire. We have watched the dilly-dallying of the British Government in the almost 10 months since President Truman's request to open Palestine. With reference to the recent extraordinary statements of Mr. Bevin, it would be well to remind the British Foreign Secretary that when American soldiers were transported to Britain, Mr. Bevin did not ask that Jews and New Yorkers stay home; and today, when Britain is seeking a $4,000,000,000 loan, he has not specified that the taxes paid by citizens of the Jewish faith be excluded.

We in the United States do not conduct censuses, levy taxes, or draft soldiers on the basis of race or religion. We are all Americans.

There is a conflict raging in the Middle East, and I am not one to minimize it. We are not so naive, however, as to believe the transparent story that the battle is between the oppressed Arab and the persecuted Jew. The conflict in the Middle East is between the interests of empire and the happiness of peoples. We cannot remain neutral, for, when the contest is between the strong and weak, neutrality is in itself a form of participation on behalf of the oppressor. Americans must choose between the Nazi Mufti and the people of Palestine; between the investments of empire, and the rights of man.

We made our choice when we went to war against tyranny and oppression in the name of the "four freedoms." As Americans we have but one course: To support actively the cause of Hebrew freedom and liberation.

Regardless of Mr. Bevin's gratuitous attack, America must follow an independent course of action and pursue a positive, dynamic program.

Today the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation announced a complete solution for the future of Palestine and the fate of the Hebrew people. It is most fitting that the architects of this program are the people directly concerned—the Hebrews in Palestine, those exiled in Europe, and their representatives in America. It is my conviction that we can find no better answer to Mr. Bevin than the program enunciated by these people—a program based on freedom and justice for Arab, Jew, and Christian. The solution calls for the immediate establishment by the Hebrew Nation of a provisional government for Palestine under the close supervision of the United Nations.

The Hebrew Nation exists in fact, and it must now be recognized in law. It must be accorded representation in the United Nations organization. Its historic right to the undiminished territory of Palestine, both Cis-Jordan and Trans-Jordan, was formally proclaimed by the League of Nations. Today the majority of the Hebrews remain scattered, Palestinians in exile, solely because the force of British arms prevents them from exercising their legal right to go to the only home that waits for them. This program calls for the revoking of Britain's mandate over Palestine. Great Britain was granted this mandate for the sole purpose of assisting the Hebrews in reconstituting their national home, but in the administration of the mandate she has established an iron dictatorship over Palestine, changing its rule from trusteeship to the claim and exercise of despotic authority.

The time has long passed for mandates, trusteeships, and protectorates. The Hebrews do not want a guardian, nor do they want charity. They want independence and freedom. The Hebrew wants a chance to stand proudly, in Palestine, as a first-class citizen. And today he is showing that he is prepared to fight just as valiantly for political independence with whatever weapons are at hand as our forefathers did at Lexington and Concord. Peace can be restored in the Holy Land only by restoring justice. As long as British bayonets bar Hebrews from their own land, the River Jordan may be stained with blood and the civilized world will know where to assign the responsibility and accountability.

A provisional government may have to be established abroad if circumstances prevent its establishment in Palestine. First, this provisional government will proclaim the independent sovereignty of the Hebrew nation and establishment of Palestine as a free republic. Second, the United Nations should appoint a supervisory board to assist the provisional government in repatriating to Palestine the Hebrews who are now arbitrarily excluded. Also it will see that a constitution is written and national elections are held not later than 1948. Third, the provisional government will immediately abolish restrictive laws imposed by the British and see to it that there is a separation of state and church, that universal suffrage is granted, and that all civil liberties are restored.

The American League endorses this program and we will submit it to the State Department in answer to their request for suggestions regarding the future of Palestine.

Many will ask what the role of the Arab will be under this plan. Palestine will be a republic in which all Palestinians, of whatever lineage or creed, will have an equal stake and equal opportunities. We in the United States have conducted an experiment along these lines since 1776. We have not achieved political perfection, but all must concede that our democracy has worked well enough to provide the pattern.

The Hebrew nation, free and united in Palestine, will be a beachhead for democracy in the Middle East. They would be America's political and spiritual ally. Opening the gates of Palestine would immediately solve one of the most grievous world problems by removing the Hebrew people from the war-ravaged countries of Europe, where they are not wanted and where they themselves refuse to remain. And finally, as we settle this problem, the threat of anti-Semitism will diminish in the world.

America did not fight two world wars to support disintegrating empires or to underwrite the oppression of one people by another. The time has come for an independent American foreign policy on Palestine, in which we support a solution based on the wishes of the people involved. Our first step must be to secure for the Hebrew nation a government of the people, by the people, and for its people. I am convinced that Americans of every race and creed are willing and anxious to aid them in reaching the goal.

RADIO ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS

When our victorious armies raced across Europe destruction wrought by Hitler was revealed, the high price for the victory paid by the Hebrew Nation was appallingly evident. Their losses amounted to 6,000,000 dead.

After the most thorough investigation had been made, President Truman said, "No other matter is so important for those who have known the horror of concentration camps over a decade as the future immigration possibilities into Palestine." On August 31, 1945, our President wrote to Prime Minister Attlee, asking that Britain immediately admit 100,000 to Palestine. The President was concerned with the 100,000 neediest cases, and he wrote "If this is to be effective, such action should not be long delayed."

Our President made this request 293 days ago. And the British Government has done nothing in response to this urgent request except to delay, pause, and postpone. We have had a joint inquiry, consultations, surveys, and, of course, the usual promises. Meanwhile the Hebrews waited in concentration camps where many died.

After every device in the art of evasion and postponement had been exhausted, the American people were shocked on June 12, when the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Bevin, proclaimed these words: "The agitation in the United States and particularly in New York for 100,000 Jews to be put into Palestine" is because America "did not want too many of them in New York." And Mr. Bevin slammed the door of Palestine in the faces of 100,000 Hebrew martyrs. The people of America are as disgusted by Mr. Bevin's words as they are impatient with his inaction.

First it must be pointed out that 98 percent of the Hebrews of Europe want to go to Palestine and think they have a right to go there America, recognizing the principle of self-determination, stands foursquare in back of the right of the Hebrew people to reestablish their homeland in Palestine. Shortly after the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation was formed in May 1944, I called for the recognition of the Hebrew Nation; had I been heeded then, much of the anguish and strife of the past year would have been avoided, and this historic people would now be an honorable member of the society of nations.

Mr. Bevin said that Palestine is really a Colonial Office problem. Palestine is not a problem for the British Colonial Office or for the Foreign Office or for Great Britain alone. Palestine is not British. Britain is a trustee for Palestine. Palestine is of international concern; Britain and the United States are bound by the Anglo-American Convention of 1924. Congress has gone on record repeatedly, backing free immigration and the establishment of an independent commonwealth in Palestine. We intend to see to it that the solemn pledge of civilization to restore the Jewish people to their homaland is accomplished. America will give ever-increasing support to the stalwart Hebrews in their fight for survival and freedom.

Mr. Bevin pleads weakness, saying that Great Britain lacks the military force to secure Palestine if Hebrew repatriation is resumed, because of trouble with the Arabs. We have been told that American troops are necessary. From what quarter does Mr. Bevin expect an attack? Does he expect the Hebrew resistance movement to object? The 80,000 in this movement have been fighting night and day to get the Hebrews into Palestine. The Palestinian Moslem, in many cases an immigrant, will certainly not fight when he has no cause, no instigation, and no arms. And there are 100,000 British Tommies in Palestine. Does Mr. Bevin imply that these are too few to take care of the tranquillity of an area the size of Kentucky?

The British know very well there is no need for a single American soldier to keep the peace in Palestine. If they really want peace, first of all, all should stop promoting war. If they want peace, all should put the responsibility for it on the people who want it most—the Hebrews. Yet the Hebrew Brigade is doing police duty in Belgium. Other Palestinian troops are scattered elsewhere. All these units should be quickly returned to duty in Palestine to meet any threat to their own country. If, instead of making provocative public requests for American troops, the British would call Hebrew volunteers into a Palestine homeguard, they would have all the troops they could possibly need to preserve the peace.

External threats to Palestine are brewing. We hear reports of some plotting disturbances and bloodshed. One of the most active troublemakers is said to be returning to the near East. Before the war this man instigated violence in Palestine, causing the death of several thousand Arabs as well as Hebrews. He was Hitler's friend, organizing Arabs to fight against the United Nations.

If there is bloodshed in Palestine tomorrow, it will be the responsibility of the British for failing to take preventive measures. Continued trouble will be the direct outgrowth of those supporting and financing the troublemakers who are now rattling their sabers at the civilized world.

If the Arab states constitute any actual threat to the external peace and security of Palestine, then let Mr. Bevin not call for American troops. Let him tell the Security Council of the United Nations which countries, which armies, which generals plot the attack. The United States is committed to the preservation of world peace through the United Nations, and not through independent military expeditions into other people's lands. And if Great Britain is not capable of maintaining the internal tranquillity of Palestine, then it is proof of her unfitness to continue to hold the mandate, and indeed another reason for quickly relieving Britain of her trusteeship and her power over Palestine.

Peace in the Middle East can be obtained tomorrow by the application of simple justice. As to America's course of action, I turn you over to a man of vision and courage, our distinguished statesman, the Honorable Guy M. Gillette, for many years United States Senator from Iowa, now the President of the American League for a Free Palestine.

The Lapse of Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, last night over the Columbia Broadcasting System my seat-mate and colleague the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MOORE] delivered an address having to do with the OPA. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Forty-two hours have elapsed since price control was ended. I have not heard of anything that indicates we will suffer a national collapse or that uncontrolled inflation will consume our economy, and I don't believe you have. It is my firm conviction that we will not experience national collapse or uncontrolled inflation.

For the first time in more than 4 years the people are free from the shackles of price control. Whether we shall remain free depends upon the good judgment and restraint exercised by all segments of our economy. Any producer, manufacturer, wholesaler, distributor, retailer, or consumer who seeks to take unjustified advantages of our suddenly regained freedom will be lending color to the argument of Chester Bowles and other top regimenters that the American people are incapable of assuming the responsibility of freedom. OPA supporters divide the country into two groups—the selfish, greedy, and dangerous that must be controlled; and the weak and incompetent that must be protected. Many have blandly assumed that chaos would follow the termination of OPA, and have, therefore, thoughtlessly agreed that some sort of price control must be reenacted. Such is the result of a long campaign of radical propaganda. Others are advocating reenactment of a price-control law because they think it good politics. These advocates are found in both major political parties. As for myself, I am not impressed with political persuasions. The issue of whether we are to accept permanently controls imposed in war or revert to a free economy under the Constitution transcends political considerations.

The OPA was a part of the administration's war machinery. Without serious objection from the Congress, the law was dictated by administrative agencies. It was geared to a wartime economy operating under the conditions of total war. In peace, we face an entirely different problem. Today, reconversion to peacetime production must be our first concern. The administration, however, has failed to offer a single suggestion to change our governmental machinery to meet this new situation. On the contrary, the administration has steadfastly demanded an extension of the same wartime emergency controls. Mr. Porter told the Senate that all OPA wanted out of Congress was an extension of the wartime act implemented by controls over commercial rents and more money for enforcement. The President is in complete sympathy with this position. The President resorted to a veto apparently in the hope that Congress would be stampeded into reenacting the same old wartime machinery for our peacetime economy.

Although I voted against the extension bill, the law vetoed by the President held out some hope that price controls might eventually be removed. This, however, is not what the administration wanted. The President, by his veto, has refused to recognize the disgraceful maladministration of the wartime act. He has refused to concede the obvious truth that it has led to scarcities; seriously impaired our standard of living; resulted in unconscionable black-market inflation; and was fast destroying the legitimate enterprise of the country, which was the very force that enabled this Nation and its allies to win two world wars in one generation. The President by his veto refused to heed the earnest advice of his party leadership in both the House and the Senate, who frankly and vigorously urged him not to veto the bill. I quote the statement of the majority leader on the floor of the Senate:

"With all the force that we could command, in view of the situation which presents itself to us and to him, we urged him to sign the bill when it reached him, on the same ground that I urge that we adopt it here, because the choice is between this bill and nothing. To hope that a joint resolution continuing price controls after next Sunday will be adopted by the two Houses of Congress is an idle dream. We might as well understand that, because that is what it is. It cannot be done."

I hope the remarks of the majority leader were prophetic.

Likewise, the President ignored the judgment of the Congress after many weeks of hearings. Instead, he chose to accept the counsel of the CIO, Bowles, and Porter. By his veto, the President has denied the constitutional right of the Congress to make the national policy or to legislate the standards by which it will be enforced. Rather, he insists that national policy shall be made by the Chief Executive and its administration left to the discretion of his executive agencies. Such is in harmony with the whole action of the administration on price controls. Let us remember that it was the President who, immediately following VJ-day, approved wage increases up to 30 percent, but insisted they must be absorbed by industry. Thus an almost irresistible tide of inflation was set in motion against the American people to satisfy CIO demands.

The veto raises the distinct issue of whether we shall revert to a free peacetime economy, or shall we humbly accede to the President's demand for the full reimposition of wartime controls? On this issue I think the people have spoken. The almost complete disregard for price controls, as reflected by existing black markets, is eloquent proof that effective price controls have broken down and that the regimentation of such controls is unacceptable to the people.

Concededly, the long duration of the war has developed a serious situation in housing and rents. This problem must be met fairly and squarely, possibly by State and local government and local public opinion, but it should not be used as an excuse for control of our entire economy. The President has charged that the extension bill enacted by Congress would have resulted in increased prices amounting to billions of dollars because of the requirement that prices must be adjusted to reflect profits comparable to a prewar base period. In fact, this is the chief ground on which the President has based his veto. It is asserted that automobiles would be increased $225 to $250, that steel would be raised $4 to $8 per ton, and that household appliances would be increased from 13 to 30 percent. If the President is correct, and assuming that such price rises would materialize, is it not then clear that many units of industry have been forced to operate at subnormal prices? If this be true, then production in these industries has been severely retarded, and thus the President admits that price control has caused shortages, which, in turn, are the seed of inflation. Continuation of this policy will not encourage production.

The question which the President wholly ignored is why the Congress felt impelled to enact price standards that would permit industry to live. Neither the Administration nor Congress can force production at a loss. The Administration now begs for the reenactment of the 1942 law for a brief period of 20 days, with the promise that in the meantime acceptable legislation will be worked out. The proposal cannot be accepted in good faith because the act vetoed by the President plainly provided no price rises under the standards of the law could have been effected for at least 30 days. Under the Taft amendment, which seemed to be the chief objection to the bill, it would have been at least 60 days before price rises could have been accomplished. Therefore, if the President had been sincere in this respect he could have accepted the law and, in the meantime, sent a message to the Congress expressing his views on additional legislation. The plain fact is that the Administration is a captive of the CIO, which demands complete wartime control of prices as the basis for an over-all regimentation of our economy and is willing to use any means at its command to effectuate this un-American, unconstitutional policy. It is appalling to hear the stream of propaganda from some of our radio comentators and some youthful newspaper correspondents who have largely reached their maturity during the last decade. Many of these young men have never known a completely free economy and many of our older, more experienced and more mature minds have fallen into intellectual lethargy and accepted a controlled economy as a part of the so-called new order. We should understand that it is morally wrong under our Constitution for either the Government or any individual to fix the price at which the seller must sell and the buyer must buy. No one would condone a law that delegated authority to any Government official to take property without just compensation, and then only in the interest of the general welfare. No one would condone a law that delegated authority to any Government official to take property at the point of a gun. Yet, under the provisions of the 1942 Price Control Act, any person accused of violating regulations of the Price Administrator may be arrested by OPA agents, and if they should resist, they might be shot with the same immunity as any criminal resisting the duly constituted authorities.

I, therefore, earnestly urge that we conduct ourselves in such manner to to demonstrate our capacity and willingness to assume the responsibilities of a free economy and to use every possible legitimate influence to that end. Let us be slow about accepting the regimentation of price controls in peacetime. Let us wait and see if the wild orgy of inflation that the prophets of doom have predicted will develop. Let us see if the prices which we are called upon to pay are as bad, or at least any worse, than the black markets under which we have suffered so long. A few days of waiting and calm deliberation certainly cannot hurt us. The Congress is always available for emergency legislation. I urge that we not be stampeded back into regimentation without fully understanding that such is the design and purpose of those who have gained control of our Government. If we do it, let us do it with our eyes open and with full understanding of the consequences that must follow.

We went to war with foreign foes to preserve liberty and Americanism. I fervently hope we will have no less courage and the fortitude in preserving these precepts at home. We are now gathering together the threads of peace. Peace at home or abroad cannot be founded on fear and distrust.

There is nothing in the history of those seeking to maintain these emergency powers to justify you and me turning over to them the complete management of our lives. Let every one of us fully understand that to prolong OPA is to play with the same fire that consumed both Germany and Italy.

Address of Hon. James Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., June 16, 1946:

Today I should like to talk to you a little about Williams as a symbol of the American scene and the American system and what is involved in keeping that system a vital and dynamic force for the world of the future in which you will live and act.

Williams College is one of those liberal arts colleges of moderate size which are essential foundation stones to American culture. The larger endowed universities and the great State institutions provide a diversity of graduate training which is necessary for professional life. But without colleges such as Williams, colleges relatively small in size but wide in their influence, American education would lose an important leavening force.

The privately endowed colleges and universities serve as a balance to State education. The State college and university provides an essential service in making higher education available for a great number of our young men. But in the nature of things, if all education were left to them there would be the danger of subordination of academic freedom to political expediency.

The trustees of Williams, I know, are painfully aware of the problem that the future presents in securing the continued endowments necessary for their support. The means must be found, and I am confident they will be found, to replace the large individual endowments which have made possible these fine and time-hallowed institutions. I suspect it will take the form of more widely spread contributions of alumni. Provided the sums are sufficient, this in itself can well become an advantage because we are all apt to take a greater interest in the things which we support and to have greater pride in institutions which we must work to maintain.

The place of Williams College in American life is a great heritage from those devoted scholars on the early New England scene who put religion and education high among the necessities of existence. They were the spiritual pioneers who helped greatly in the development of institutions singular to us in terms of politics, of education and of our economy. The values of those institutions, I believe, we are inclined to underrate rather than to estimate at their true worth.

In general, Americans have been susceptible to imported philosophies and to an admiration for the things of other times and other continents. It is quite proper that we should draw upon the wisodm and culture of the past and that our minds should be open to the intellectual and artistic achievements of the rest of the globe. But self-depreciation can be as overdone as self-esteem. It has been my view that the overprecise rationalism of Kant, Fichte, and Hegel pervaded much of the university thinking in this country from 1840 to 1910. The admiration for those admittedly great German philosophers of the nineteenth century is too often duplicated today in the admiration for another philosophy deriving to a considerable extent from the same origins and equally inapplicable to American life.

In this Nation in terms of government, education, and general culture, we have developed, and are continuing to develop, a philosophy and a government essentially our own. Both, it is true, have had their roots in English tradition and in the Anglo-Saxon conception of law, equity, and administration, but the trunk and branches and the fruit are wholly and uniquely American.

It is a philosophy understood by few other nations. One of the great problems of modern times is the difficulty of getting other nations to understand it and ourselves. And I must add in all humility that we frequently have equal difficulty in understanding theirs.

The essence of American life, whether at the local, State, or National level is that government exists to serve the individual and not to be his master. The belief of the founders, expressed in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution, that the collective judgment of individual men is preferable to the absolute decisions of any one man or group of men, continues as an essential of the American faith. We continue to be skeptical that either one man or one group of men can safely be entrusted with the interpretation of the needs and wishes of the masses. We are, indeed, suspicious of men who set themselves up as the interpreters of the common man. We prefer to let the common people do their own interpreting. We believe that the judgment of men from many communities, and reflecting many interests, will produce a better composite of law and government than can flow from a hierarchy, whether it is a hierarchy of intellectuals, of business magnates, or leaders of pressure groups.

I take my position with those who believe that American political institutions have within them greater possibilities of development for the freedom of men than the conceptions of statism which are now sweeping Europe.

But statements of convictions are not sufficient by themselves if America is to retain the benefits of this system that we believe in so strongly.

Let us admit at the outset that government under our method is more difficult and sometimes less efficient than government by a central authoritarian group. Therefore responsibility for maintaining our kind of government cannot be discharged by such speeches as mine today or by reliance upon casual lip service to the validity of our beliefs. Our society and our form of government can only be maintained by work and hard work. To be specific: I mean that every level of the community—in the village, the township, the county, the State, and the Nation—young men who comprise such audiences as this one today must by their own action take a part in shaping and developing the future course of the state. Polemics and intellectual exercises are not sufficient. The same self-discipline that went into the molding of the tremendous armed forces of the United States during the war must be drawn upon again. You will have to take your active part as citizens in the field of politics if the Nation is to be preserved just as you and your contemporaries performed your duty in the ranks of the Army and Navy in wartime.

You must seek membership in a political party. You must be active in that party. You must participate in governing through expression of your opinion by vote and by voice. Finally, some of you must be willing to accept the sacrifice involved in the holding of appointive office in government or in running for elective ones.

In this connection I cannot refrain from observing that an encouraging step in the improvement of the machinery of our Government was taken by the United States Senate last week in the passage of a bill increasing the salaries of its Members and providing increased allowance for expenses of Members, as well as a provision of a moderate pension to men who have reached a certain age and have given at least 5 years of service to the Government.

I have long felt that this was the first step in the process of securing improvement in Government administration which I believe is essential. The next step, I hope, will be in the direction of creating career opportunities for young men such as yourselves by lifting the level of rewards open to those qualified for such careers. The creation of a class of civil servants recruited from the schools and universities and refreshed, if possible, by the introduction of men from the practical fields of activity—business, law, and engineering—can go far toward elevating the standards of our Government administration.

I have little patience with the tendency to ridicule and derogate the Members of Congress of the United States. My own experience has convinced me that, broadly speaking, they are a conscientious and patriotic group of men representing quite accurately the broad range of American life. Many of them remain in Congress under handicaps and at substantial sacrifice. To hold them up to abuse and ridicule is to hold ourselves up to abuse and ridicule because after all it is we who either by action or inaction put them there.

Claude Bowers, our present Ambassador to Chile, has pointed out that one of the first steps taken by any aspirant to dictatorship has been the destruction of the reputation and character of politicians. He remarks that when the politicians go the Hitlers usually come along in their wake.

I shall close with a few remarks about international affairs in which, whether or not your tastes lie in that direction, you will have to take a far greater interest than did those of my own generation. Today there is no curtain, either iron or silk, behind which we can shut ourselves from the rest of the world. The fires of disturbance that may begin in the Middle East, in India, or in the Balkans, must inevitably have a profound influence upon your lives. A century ago it may have been possible for this Nation to live remote from the rest of the world but the foreshortening of time and space that have occurred since, the development of lethal weapons capable of spanning vast distances, the increased speed of communications, all make it clear to any thinking person that, as the Secretary of State recently observed, "Unless we realize that peace is indivisible, we shall be forced to take part in a war that is world-wide."

There are two great forces which challenge the minds of men in the world today, competing, in the words of Mr. Churchill, "for the empire of the mind." One is the force of democracy as we know it—the democracy of liberty, of individual freedom, of equal opportunity, of religious and political tolerance—the goals, in short, of the early settlers of New England. The other is the thesis of total authority in a central government, the creation of a monolithic state for solutions to all problems, for the expression and direction of all the hopes and aspirations of men. It cannot be taken for granted that because our system is the best for us, it will necessarily be accepted by the rest of the world. If the Anglo-Saxon concept of democratic government is to hold its present high place in the contemporary and future world, we shall have to keep our democracy dynamic. Fortunately, that dynamism will be a benevolent one, expressed in terms of help to the distressed millions of many countries. The story of democracy will be listened to only by people who have sufficient physical strength and spiritual faith to believe that they can successfully govern themselves. It is only after people have enough to eat that they will concern themselves with the abstractions of free government and of individual liberty. Conditions of hunger, of anarchy, and of economic chaos make fertile the soil in which dictatorships spread.

For our democracy to provide the leadership which it must give if it is to prove that there is an alternative to totalitarian concepts, it must have the support and understanding faith of the people of all of the United States. To you will fall a major part of the task of continuing the education of your generation and of sharing in the leadership which will give that confidence. We ourselves know that America does not seek conquest of territory or any other selfish interest, unless the desire for a peaceful and progressive world can be called selfish. These motives we must make clear to the rest of a stricken world as beacons of hope shining through the darkness. You and your generation who have so ably and nobly served in the crisis of war must shape the course of history. If through you this Nation takes the part proportionate to its capacity and its strength, if it provides the leadership which the democratic and liberal world awaits, we may reasonably expect that the lamps of liberty, of tolerance, and of peace will once again be lighted throughout the world.

Keeping Down Inflation

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it is about time that President Truman and Chester Bowles throw what weight they have left in with the American people to prevent a raise in prices instead of Bowles continuing to give out statements which are encouraging inflation.

Chester Bowles, who few should believe on his past record, bellowed out in the press yesterday that prices of meat will raise 75 percent. He has spent $650,000,000 of the people's money, much of it spent in false propaganda, to deceive the people. The policies of the President in hiking wage raises, and with the bad administration of Bowles—between the two of them they have made a failure both in securing added production and in holding the line on prices. In their attempt to desert a sinking ship they seek to shift the blame to the Members of Congress.

It is apparent that Bowles has had his eye on the senatorship from Connecticut and, to a great extent, has used the people's money for political propaganda not only for the administration but for himself. It would be interesting to know the real facts behind his resignation. He sought at the height of the confusion which he drummed up over the radio to dramatize his resignation and make of himself a martyr. He has also failed in this effort. The facts are, for months he has been losing caste and confidence in high places here in Washington.

The head of the great A & P food stores chain, operating over 3,000 stores, has promised the public there would be no raise in the prices of food. Other great business concerns issued like statements. From the heads of the motor organizations, the meat packers' organizations, the electrical appliances organizations, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and the NAM have come the most urgent appeals to all businessmen to hold down prices to prevent inflation.

All civic and business groups in the Nation are banding themselves together agreeing to hold prices at present levels. Every chamber of commerce in my district, including all of the leading merchants, are promising the public to hold prices down to defeat inflation.

The country will be better off if Mr. Bowles will take his vacation at once. It is time for the President to join the great throng of the American people who are talking aginst inflation.

It is time the President muzzled the Secretary of Labor and the bureaucrats working under him and stop their encouraging by news releases the labor leaders to take advantage of the present condition to begin talking about further wage raises and strikes.

The President can render a greater service to the Ameircan people if he will cast his lot with them now instead of listening to the PAC and the New Deal bureaucrats who want to continue price control and the perpetual regimentation of the American people.

The British Loan

REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, as the time is near for the debate on the British loan, it appears in order to bring to the attention of the House some basic facts concerning our fiscal policy and the financial status of the Federal Treasury today.

As respects the British loan, the plan is to advance Britain the sum of $3,750,000,000. Britain will pay interest at 2 percent, and will have 50 years to clear up the debt. The 50 years will not begin, however, until 1951, as to either principal or interest. In lean years, Britain could forget the interest—would not have to make it up the following year. We give no such consideration to our veterans.

Recently, it has been brought to our attention through the press that England will have to increase her foreign or export trade enormously in order to maintain her postwar economy; then we are told by the proponents of the loan in this country that in the event we make the loan England will surrender some of her foreign markets. These statements certainly are not in agreement. You are reminded that there is no promise in the loan agreement that Britain will drop any of its Empire preference tariffs so as to give United States business a fairer break in the British Empire markets. It is my intention to deal more specifically with this subject when the proposal comes to the floor.

Today it is my purpose to emphasize what our national debt and the British loan represents to the people of this Nation and specifically to the people of West Virginia.

Most of us are inclined to consider the national debt as something foreign or detached from our daily lives, but such is not the case. Our national debt affects the life and economic well-being of every living person in this country every minute of every day. It is a debt just as real as a note in the bank; just as binding as a mortgage on our property; and we have the same obligation to pay if we are to remain a solvent and free nation. In view of these facts, I believe most of us realize that a termination of deficit spending, a balanced budget, and maximum production is the only cure for inflation and high prices. There is no place for loans or gifts to foreign governments in this picture.

Before we consider the British loan we should see how we are affected by the national debt and what the British loan will mean to us as individuals. Our national debt is approximately $272,000,000,000. West Virginia's share of the national debt, based upon a per capita calculation, is $3,978,404,516. The portion our people in West Virginia will have to pay if the British loan is granted is $43,248,244. The share in the national debt in Kanawha County, which includes Charleston, is $408,709,856; the obligation under the British loan, if granted, would be $5,470,304. The share of Ohio County, which includes Wheeling, in the national debt is $152,956,580; their share of the British loan would be $2,047,220. The share of Harrison County, which includes Clarksburg, in the national debt would be $173,449, 812; their share in the proposed British loan would be $2,321,508.

The following tabulation presents the amount of debt obligation and the amount which would be assumed if the British loan is granted as respects the counties and communities in the Fourth Congressional District:

Share of national debt and British loan by counties

I want to say to the people of the Fourth Congressional District that I will not support a proposal to give $3,750,000,000 to the British, which will eventually cost the people of this district approximately $9,400,000.

I am not going to tell the veterans of West Virginia that I voted an assessment on them for $9,400,000 to give to the British Empire with little hope of any return whatsoever.

Our contribution to the British in two wars was in excess of $35,000,000,000. Our national debt is greater than all other United Nations combined. We supplied all the world with materials of war and we were occupying three-fourths of the front in Europe on VE-day. We had more than 1,000,000 casualties.

It is time for us to pull in our belt and stabilize our own economy. It will be years before we can supply our own people with needed merchandise. There is no justification to give money to foreign governments which would be used to compete with our people in our own markets for merchandise which we need so badly. We need 5,000,000 dwelling units. We are short of merchandise, materials, and commodities in most every category. We need jobs and houses for our veterans and do not want to saddle them with any more debt; consequently, I think it is time for Uncle Sam to stop playing Santa Claus to the entire world.

The Polish Referendum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial that appeared in the Washington Evening Star in today's issue on the Polish referendum:

THE POLISH REFERENDUM

Reports from Poland seem agreed that the referendum held there on Sunday was carried out in a reasonably orderly manner and without any serious interference at the polls. Nevertheless, the results—which are still unofficial but which indicate an easy victory for the Communist-favored proposal for a one-house Parliament—appear to be more than a little suspect, the reason for this being that Vice Premier Mikolajczyk and his Polish peasant party were hampered on all sides in an effort to make their views known before the voting.

Thus, although Mr. Mikolajczyk and his party were strongly opposed to the one-house plan, they were unable to campaign along that line. They wanted to deliver speeches and distribute leaflets calling upon the voters to write "no" against the proposition, but the provisional government, made up largely of Communists, gave orders to the security police to break up any effort to spread such a message among the Poles at large. As a result, thousands of Mr. Mikolajczyk's partisans were arrested or otherwise intimidated before the referendum took place, and Mr. Mikolajczyk himself, though a vice premier in the government, had to confine his activities pretty largely to giving interviews to American correspondents. Moreover, now that the voting itself is over he has been moved to suggest that the ballot counting may have been something less than honest.

About the only encouraging feature of the referendum is that Mr. Mikolajczyk has refrained up to now from describing it flatly as a fraud and that the American correspondents reporting on it, though unflattering to the predominantly Communist provisional regime, have been completely uncensored. Otherwise, with the opposition not having had much of a chance to campaign and with the extreme leftists apparently in control of the vote count, it would seem to have been a Polish version of the way Tammany operated in the old days. Accordingly, unless the news stories from Warsaw have been inaccurate, it can hardly be regarded as a reassuring prelude to the free and unfettered Polish elections promised at Yalta and Potsdam and still waiting to be held.

Railroad Retirement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the operation of the Railroad Retirement Act over a period of years has demonstrated that there are valid reasons for its amendment at this time to provide for more generous benefits for railroad employees. I do not consider the legislation which is now before us and designed to accomplish this as being preferential in nature. Due to its strategic position in our national economy, it has been found necessary for many years to give special treatment to problems affecting the railroad industry, such as rate making and regulating the practices of railroad carriers. I feel that Congress is fully justified and will be taking a great forward step in the realm of social-security legislation by enacting this measure, which has been given most careful study by highly qualified people and which has been the subject of extensive hearings.

In order that the railroad retirement system may adequately perform the function for which it was originally designed the benefits must be made more liberal.

OPA Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, this morning's New York Herald Tribune carried the following article by Mark Sullivan which I think will be of interest to my colleagues and to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

TRUMAN'S VETO OF OPA BILL IS TERMED A CHOICE FOR CHAOS—MARK SULLIVAN SUGGESTS HE SHOULD HAVE ACCEPTED MEASURE, SOUGHT A BETTER ONE LATER IF NEEDED, TO MAKE THE ENDING OF OPA ORDERLY

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, July 2.—In the welter that has been created there is one thing that is wanted by the largest number of Members of Congress. It must be stated carefully. It is termination of price control—but orderly and gradual termination. The number who, throughout the months of controversy, wanted an abrupt and complete termination on June 30 was negligible.

For orderly termination of the Office of Price Administration, the plain first step in the condition that has been created is to extend the OPA as is for a brief stop-gap period, with use of the time thus gained to write a permanent bill.

For the stop-gap bill the House has voted overwhelmingly. Even after chaos had been created, and angry emotion had arisen, the number who opposed the stop-gap bill—the number, that is, who voted in effect for complete and immediate termination—was only 61. The vote for temporary emergency extension of the OPA as is was 283.

In the Senate the proportion favoring either temporary extension or immediate writing of permanent legislation is probably as large as in the House. But the Senate rules make it impossible for action to be blocked or delayed by the very small number who throughout have wanted complete and immediate termination.

This brings up one of the far-reaching questions forced to the front by the present condition. It is, to put it starkly, the ability of Congress to function. Something can be said for a Senate rule which gives much power to a minority—when the rule is used for the purpose for which it exists, namely, to prevent hasty action on long-range legislation. To use the power to prevent promptness in an emergency is different and indefensible.

LEGISLATIVE RULE ON TRIAL

The most thoughtful men in the Senate, and a large majority of the body, know that the ability of legislative government to function in the modern world is a present problem. To the end that Congress be able to function adequately, the Senate recently passed a bill reorganizing the congressional mechanism. The present postponing of action upon a measure dealing with a serious and immediate emergency makes the problem concrete. If the Senate is determined, it can get action on the OPA. It can show that the Senate can function.

But there is also a question of proper functioning on the part of the Executive.

To describe what Congress wants as an orderly and gradual termination of the OPA is to go to the heart of the hot contention now boiling. For what actually exists, until and unless Congress acts, is the opposite; it is abrupt and complete termination of the OPA For this, who is responsible?

Plainly, Congress did not want abrupt and complete termination—if Congress had wanted that, it would have legislated that. What Congress legislated was extension of the OPA, in modified form, until next year. What brought about immediate termination was President Truman's veto.

But instantly the President and those who conseled him to veto, including persons responsible for conducting the OPA, make charges against the act that Congress passed. They say it would have been impossible to administer successfully, that it would have resulted in chaotic conditions.

HE CHOSE IMMEDIATE CHAOS

Yet the President is in the position of choosing immediate and certain chaos, as against what might have been—assuming the charges against the bill are sound, which is by no means admitted—potential and delayed chaos.

In the contention now boiling, and likely to be a political issue for a long time, it will be difficult to deny there was a better course for the President and the administrators of the OPA. It would have been to accept the bill that Congress wrote, and do the best possible under it, with expectation that, in a spirit of cooperation with Congress, new legislation could be asked for if needed.

Whether the bill Congress wrote was what Mr. Truman says it is, or was wise and well considered, is a thing the average person cannot readily decide. A Senator who is a Democrat, who is more or less impartial on the present question, and who has been in the Senate many years, says that in all his experience he has never seen any House or Senate committee give more intent or more thoughtful deliberation to any bill than was given to the present OPA bill by the Senate and House committees that handled it.

The Housing Bill Is Needed Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, a fair question and one that cannot be too often explained is why, now that we have passed the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act, we need also to pass the general housing bill, S. 1592.

The answer is that the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act sets up the powers necessary to break bottlenecks in the production of materials and by premium payments increase the production of materials needed to build veterans' housing.

When materials have been produced, however, we must face a second problem of major importance. That is, the production of the housing at prices that will be within reach of the veterans' pocketbooks. The means for the solution of this second problem are embodied in the general housing bill. It contains the tools that will get us both sale and rental housing at prices that the great mass of veterans can afford.

Of particular importance to veterans unable to purchase homes are the provisions of this bill that will make it possible for private enterprise to provide large-scale rental housing at moderate cost. The bill contains the most specific and workable proposals yet advanced to provide large volumes of privately financed rental housing, at moderate rentals.

The primary reason for a comprehensive housing program at this time is, of course, the veterans' need for such housing, but we cannot overlook its importance in maintaining full employment. Home building can make the greatest single contribution to full employment in the months and even years ahead. Moreover, it can do more than any other single thing to assure an effective market for the products of industry. Veterans need this program not only because they are desperate for the homes it will produce at prices they can afford, but also because it will make a major contribution to a fully productive and prosperous America.

We in the House of Representatives say that we want to meet the veterans' needs. If we sincerely wish to do so we will act now on the general housing bill. To do otherwise would lay us open to the just charge that we have deliberately passed by an opportunity to make good on our commitments to veterans. Let the Banking and Currency Committee report out the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill in time for us to do what so clearly we must do.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 2, 1946]

THE HOUSING BILL IS NEEDED NOW

The enactment of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, the general housing act of 1946, is essential to meet the acute housing shortage from which the entire Nation suffers. It is necessary to the success of the veterans' emergency-housing program already approved by the Congress. It provides financing for the kind of housing veterans—and most others—can pay for. It looks to the building, with accent on encouragement of private enterprise, of 12,500,000 dwellings in 10 years.

The prerequisite for such a program is unification of Government-housing activities. That the bill provides. It would then offer Federal aid under centralized leadership to encourage private building, slum clearance, urban redevelopment, low-cost public housing, rural housing, and technical research and planning. It would increase the Federal Housing Administration insurance coverage from 90 to 95 percent on loans up to $5,000, extend the amortization period from 25 to 32 years. An FHA insurance system would protect life-insurance companies and savings banks—institutions upon which we depend for city-redevelopment projects. The bill would offer matching sums to local housing agencies for slum clearance and public housing, sums for research and planning. The annual cost is put at $143,000,000, the amount gradually tapering off as the program gets under way.

The bill is the result of long study by leaders of both parties. Local and State housing programs the country over are predicated in part on its passage. New York City's housing program, New York State's housing program count upon it—now, this summer.

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee unanimously approved the housing bill on April 4. Its bipartisan sponsorship was reflected in the vote by which the Senate passed it on April 15. There was controversy over an amendment exacting prevailing wages. Senators TAFT and ELLENDER objected. But controversies can be ironed out by a Congress determined to make an immediate and effective attack on housing, the most important domestic problem now facing the country. This Congress should pass the bill. No preoccupation with other matters can excuse the postponement of an over-all housing measure which is so urgently needed and upon which there is so large an area of agreement.

Will Higher Prices Bring a Crash?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 26, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Eugene Whitmore, which appeared in the American Business of March 1946:

WILL HIGHER PRICES BRING A CRASH?

Rising wages and costs, shortage, and delays step up resistance to price controls. But if prices continue to soar, how long can we go without a crash? Before reaching any decision on price policies, it seems well worth while to look at a previous business period when conditions were similar to those which prevail now.

Perhaps the nearest approach to present conditions occurred in 1920, when we had been at peace for more than a year, after a brief but costly war. Production had not been so completely suspended on civilian goods as it was during World War II. But there existed a shortage of goods, a scarcity of labor, labor troubles, and high prices; and consumers had plenty of money.

Here is a group of 1920 headlines, with marked similarity to 1946 newspaper items: Reds pouring troops in Persian ports; big wages of workmen put brake on buying of homes; avert rail strike—22-percent raise in sight; new rail pay crisis.

Despite all these troubles and rumors of troubles, business went merrily on its way. The newspaper editorial writers were worried about the way workmen were buying silk shirts at $8.95 each.

Prices were high and going higher in mid-1920. Early in September best hogs went for $17.30, top beef at $18.25, and lambs at $14.25. The price of sugar shot up to 31 cents, and everything else seemed proportionately high.

Then began a series of events which slowed buying. Consumers, harassed by high prices of clothing, began wearing overalls to work. A few overall clubs were formed. Actually few people wore overalls, but it was a feature story in many newspapers and the cause of much conversation. Office workers were urged to bring lunch buckets to work, because it was claimed that hotels and lunchrooms were gouging the workers. Few office workers did carry lunch pails to work but, coupled with the overall story, the news that they were doing it struck a vital nerve in business.

Then on September 22, 1920, Ford prices were reduced as follows: Stripped chassis, $550 to $395; touring cars, $577 to $440; coupes $850 to $775; truck chassis, $850 to $745. The Ford price reduction generally appeared on front pages; it was big news. In a few days Franklin automobile prices were cut. Then the avalanche began. Jordan, Overland, and Paige automobiles suffered a price cut. Kissel cars offered a $600 reduction per car. Federal truck prices were cut.

While these cuts were being announced, bankers rushed into print to announce that all danger of a panic had passed. But the price cuts continued. On September 24, the Chicago Tribune appeared with an eight-column line across the top of the front page: Slash in prices goes on.

And that was putting it mildly. Julius Rosenwald, then president of Sears, Roebuck, announced general price cuts of as much as 30 percent on mail-order goods. Similar cuts were announced by Montgomery Ward and Butler Bros. Mr. Rosenwald said: "Foulards, silk linings, taffetas which sold a month ago at $3.50 to $4 a yard are now $2.50 a yard. Dresses which sold a month ago at $75 to $80 are now selling at $50 to $60. Furniture prices are down 25 percent."

On the same day, newspapers said steel prices were weak, and cotton was off 100 points. On September 25 Marshall Field & Co. cut wholesale gingham prices 30 percent. Flour was down 35 cents a barrel; woolens dropped 15 to 30 percent; and wheat broke 11½ to 12 cents a bushel.

On September 25 more front-page headlines announced additional price cuts. Lumber prices dropped 16 to 35 percent. Ford tires, which had sold in August for $18.10, dropped to $13.45; sheeting fell from 27 to 15 cents; percale from 40 to 19 cents; and gingham from 39 to 23 cents.

Bankruptcies increased; wages were cut, mills and factories shut down. Corn fell 32 cents a bushel in less than a week, and the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, commenting on business affairs in its November 20 issue, observed that there were "violent declines, far from orderly." By December this same journal announced that "Christmas will be shrouded in gloom."

What happened to the stock market is too painful to mention. War-inflated wages and salaries were slashed brutally.

It is now 10 months after the close of the war in Europe; 7 months after the end of the Pacific war. When the lightning struck in 1920, it was 1 year and 10 months after the close of World War I.

Are we approaching a similar period now? Are we getting along toward the period when the public will revolt and refuse to pay high prices? Or do we have 2 or 3 years more? Do we want prices to reach the point where nothing but 30 and 40 percent slashes at one swoop will correct conditions? Is OPA's attempt to hold the line worthy of support, even though it does harm certain companies, hold up production at times, and harass business almost beyond endurance at other times?

Is there no alternative between violent reactions, similar to that which occurred in 1920, and some sort of price control? Is there no way to raise prices slightly, enough to cushion the shock of higher wages, higher costs, but hold prices down to the point where inflation will not result in frantic deflation a few months later?

The property owner who complains that wages, maintenance, and other costs are high may overlook the fact that his properties are 100 percent occupied, when they were once only 70 percent occupied. The retailer who complains that costs have gone up must remember the big increase in volume he now enjoys. The manufacturer whose wage payments are at an all-time peak must remember that he has not an idle machine in his plant, which may have been 30, 40, or even 50 percent idle in 1938. The hotel owner complaining and petitioning for higher rates ought not to forget the days of 40 percent occupancy, as compared with today's 95 to 97 percent occupancy.

Prices are a paramount problem today, and nothing less than the best judgment of business everywhere can prevent a catastrophe. If sound judgment prevails, if business charges no more for its goods and services than is absolutely necessary, there is a chance that we can escape the disaster that overtook the Nation in 1920.

Consumer Credit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William J. Cheyney, executive director Retail Credit Institute of America, Inc., from the June issue of Consumer Credit:

Half of the 2,000,000 people in my home town live in row after row of attached brick houses, presumptuous if you call them residences.

These neighbors never have enjoyed the highest wages because our employers habitually think of them as "labor," an available source of working brawn to dovetail with machine-age power to produce the products that make the city famous. As such they're paid what the market demands—no more.

Up to last night our employers had not caught on that the townfolk are also potential consumers—customers. Had they discovered this years ago they might have paid a little better; for, as Henry Ford concluded some long time ago, consumers buy more when paid more.

But it would have taken a lot more than just increased wages to make the old town hum.

One time I asked a good old Irish housewife downtown: "Did you ever put in the tile bathroom? Do you have a new-fangled kitchen? Have you one of those new console radios yet? Did you buy the new furniture for the room grandpop used to snore in? Did you ever try these new venetian blinds? Are you still carrying that gold watch of great aunt Edna's? Did Harry ever trade in his Maxwell?"

Yes, she still had Aunt Edna's watch, but it hadn't run for 7 years. To the other questions her answers were, as I expected, "No." You see, I know these people.

I thought to myself, though, "What a market she'd be for countless new and comfortable ways of living—what a market for a score of things they make right here in the old home town—things being shipped all over the world but missing the free-freight area around the corner."

This dear old lady should be so dissatisfied with her lot. But she wasn't. "Why should I need a new kitchen? Pea coal is the best for cooking. It does make the kitchen a bit warm in summer, though. The old tin bathtub works as good as any. We're clean. I need a new rug for the living room, but it would be hard for Harry to get it, and I can do without. The furniture upstairs may not be modern, but it is pretty comfortable—particularly the bed with that old feather mattress on it you used to like when you were a kid. So we don't need coil springs and Harry isn't worried about bills all the time."

In the United States perhaps 50 percent of the people whose incomes were below $3,000 and above $1,000 purchased all types of consumer durable goods on credit in 1941; but Harry and Mrs. Harry in the old home town were not among them. They have nothing against credit in their hearts. It never hurt them. It hasn't helped them either. Their church has 7,500 members down the street, and I venture 5,000 of them live in the same combined economic independence and want, happy without what the world has made possible in this generation. And, it seems to me, not helping the world raise its sights much either.

Your first guess is that Harry's family income is too low to purchase much on credit or any other way. But you are so wrong! These families, and this family in particular, have incomes that range well up in the three thousand dollar bracket. Millions like them have successfully used consumer credit the country over.

You say, "Well, then, these good folks are happier doing without. Their testimony proves it." That isn't quite true, is it? The truth is that they are "passing happy." They have no idea how much happier they could be if they made some use of the many things that science has made available since their forebears first set up that home.

I think of another angle, considering Harry's family economic pattern. He earns his living in one of the city's great public utilities. The company Harry works for produces a vital element in the modern, streamlined living of today. He draws his pay from an industry that gives America its modern way of life, but Harry's family is not plowing back its share to maintain this great industry or the way of life it represents. Harry is wrong two ways: (1) He isn't making his family a market for the great products his fellow workers produce. He isn't contributing to their demanded higher wages, levels he himself demands. By investing in some of the durable products which would give his family a new outlook on life he would make America richer by their manufacture and enjoyment. (2) Harry is saving too much. He and Mrs. Harry assume they cannot afford an electric refrigerator and all these other products I talked about to Mrs. Harry. In fact, today their home is lit by gaslight as it was 50 years ago and as 10,000 of Harry's neighbors' homes are lit. Thinking that they cannot afford these better things of modern living, Harry saves 25 percent of every dollar he earns and he will die leaving thousands of dollars saved up.

But you say these savings are put to work by Harry's bank? Part are in savings banks, it is true—begging there—with no borrower to plow them into industry—surplus dollars. Part are in Government bonds and part upstairs in an old mattress. The part upstairs isn't working for anyone. The part invested in war bonds went for the production of shells and tanks and battleships.

But Mrs. Harry's story isn't a wartime inflation story. It is a prewar-postwar chronicle that illustrates why it takes so long to raise a nation's physical living standard.

Here is a great city which has not educated its people nor its business and industrial leadership to the great far-reaching potentialities that lie within its boundaries—potentials that could revolutionize one great old home town or a hundred, once tapped. These powers will remain untapped until old-fashioned families—until all Americans—learn what can be done by the proper use of credit.

You say, "This family has thousands of dollars in cash laid by; it needs no credit." Yes, it has, I admit. This is a true story. I have attempted to tell it honestly, just as it is, for this one family. But there are countless other families all around Harry's town who live in the same environment, under the same illusion as to what they can and cannot have in life, what they can and cannot afford, who have never modernized their living, whose income is just the same as Harry's but who have frittered away that income through the years.

These haven't saved. They had nothing to show for years and years of productive work. Proper education would have shown them that they could have their radios, their modern kitchens, their automobiles, and all the other products of the durable-product age. What they actually got of life was an endless procession of fancies through the years, bought today, consumed today, with nothing left to show tomorrow.

From Maine to Florida, from New York to California, there are scores of modern cities, big and small, whole communities of little brightly painted homes, comfortably furnished with twentieth-century things that make life what it ought to be today—homes lived in by families that make no more each year than Harry's family does. I have seen them. So have you. These people have found what credit can do. They have bought the things that cut down household work and increase their enjoyment of life at home. They can afford these things. They have accumulated savings, too, but part of their savings lies in these complete homes, in the products still valuable, long since paid for, that constitute real tangible family wealth.

These countless families not only have enriched their lives and economic status, but, in the aggregate, their mass buying has employed tens of thousands of fellow citizens. Those who have learned how to buy modern products by the proper application of credit have made America rich.

It is not correct to say that had the economy remained on the cash and cash only standard this modern era of mass employment, mass production, would have come about just the same. School-agers realize that 10 or 15 of our greatest industries today would remain in infancy had it not been for the freely invested mass purchasing power of consumer credit.

It is hardly a part of this short story, but so important nonetheless, that in buying on credit the consumer asks no favor. Credit is his firm, inalienable possession. His use of it constitutes no grant or special privilege—but purely a simple contract, as simply and equally profitable to buyer and seller as any cash transaction.

When through the past few decades the American people have used their credit to buy tens of millions of products built to last 5, 10, or 15 years, and have paid for them in a year or two, they actually have advanced to business—the industrial and banking economy—billions upon billions of dollars of their personal credit. In the aggregate this has been an advance of the people's credit to keep the machinery of the Nation at work.

The housewife who buys a radio that will last 10 years really only wants to buy the finest radio service possible—for this month—or perhaps a year or two or three, until the styles change. She knows right now that she will want a new set long before these things she has to buy today will wear out in ordinary use. She bows to the necessity of the age. Science has been unable to supply her with exactly what she wants. She—and all the rest of us—have become accustomed to buying 15 years of service, paying for it in a year or two, accommodating ourselves to this inadequacy of our scientific age.

And as we buy "on cred," as we advance our credit to the Nation's business, some folk sagely mutter that we must be watched, that we ask too great a favor. They question whether it is wise to grant us this great favor of extended credit. They suggest that our credit should be severely regulated.

How utterly foolish they are when in actuality it is the economy to which we grant the favor, when we buy "on time." We, the consumers, are extending our credit. We ask no credit; we possess it.

Regulate us as we extend our credit to the American economy and, of course, we have the alternative of becoming more conservative.

Should we withdraw the use of our credit as Harry and his family have done for a generation; persuade us, the American people, that we should do this; try to make us feel that we are asking a great favor when we buy on credit—and just see what has become of the great American prosperity when we say:

"Forget it. Sell what you can for cash."

The Farmer, OPA, and Subsidies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under permission previously granted, I am inserting as part of my remarks a very interesting article by Mr. Fred H. Sexauer. The position of the farmer and OPA and its subsidy program is well set forth by the author. It is extremely interesting:

(By Fred H. Sexauer, a lifelong farmer and for 17 years president of the largest milk marketing cooperative in the United States)

The decisions in Congress on the policies embodied in OPA and subsidies will determine whether America is to have food abundance or increasing food shortages.

The farmer of America, who produces food for others, and this includes the family-sized farm, is the most efficient food producer the world has ever known. Where four Asiatic farmers produce only enough for themselves and one other, and that on a very low scale of food living, four American farmers produce enough for themselves and 20 or 25 others.

As the food standard of living of America is at least three times that of the Asiatic, the efficiency of the American commercial farmer in feeding his city neighbor is from 60 to 75 times as high as the Asiatic.

EFFICIENT TEAMWORK

The interplay of social and economic forces between farming, manufacturing, transportation, and distribution is such that the American commercial farm could not do this were there not a parallel efficiency among the other productive elements of our society. Likewise there is no such efficiency among other elements of society where the producers of the food supply are not equally efficient.

OPA price ceilings and subsidies have had nothing to do with this miracle of production. There is no evidence that even 1 percent of this efficiency of farming and business was brought about by price-fixing regulations or through control exercised by public grants of money—call them subsidies or what you will. On the contrary there is much evidence that continued price regulation and fear of control through subsidies are destroying the exercise of ingenuity and initiative in the production field.

OPA MAKES FOR SCARCITY

Those food products upon which OPA placed price ceilings first are among the first to disappear from the market. Those essential commodities upon which the largest subsidies were paid in lieu of fair prices are rapidly becoming scarcest.

The gamble with the uncertainty of bureaucratic mental processes is too much even for the farmer who is used to gambling with weather and all kinds of pests.

The classic example is that of dairy products. Dairy farm leaders protested OPA ceiling prices on milk and dairy products, and subsidies in lieu of fair prices in the market place, as destructive of production. The fact is that those farmers who are most affected by price ceilings and subsidies are among the first to discontinue operations, as witness the fact that 15,000 dairymen have gone out of business in the New York area alone during the past 5 years.

BUTTER AN EXAMPLE

Piercing the fog of words emanating from regulatory agencies, whose responsibility for actual production is nil, we find that milk and butter were regulated early, were caught with low-price levels, were granted the heaviest subsidies, and during the period of low production just passed were in the shortest supply in relation to demand in the history of the industry. Even today, on the very brink of the heavy-production season, lines of consumers queueing for butter rival in length, intensity, and sheer violence the lines queueing for nylons. The black market flourishes.

It is not that food prices are so high. As a matter of fact, the wages of the average industrial worker will buy two and a quarter times as much food as 30 years ago, and twice as much as in 1918 or World War I peak cost. Or, put it another way—where it took 36 percent of the wage earner's income for food in 1918, today for the same kind and type of food it takes but 18 percent.

But supplies are vitally affected by something, as witness the present and prospective short supply of beef, pork, eggs, cream, milk, and butter.

NO PRACTICAL UNDERSTANDING

Farmers and farm leaders throughout the Nation tell me that it is not altogether price ceilings themselves, although they are horribly administered, or even subsidy money itself, that destroys production. Under a price-fixing and subsidy program, a few men, whose experience and background are wholly outside of the production field, are lifted to a position of dictatorial power over the income of agriculture. The very idea that someone—hundreds or thousands of miles away, and even more remote in his thinking—can, by a price decision, destroy an industry by putting a whole economic group into a loss position and force farmers to revamp their operations by arbitrarily attaching conditions to the payment of subsidy moneys. Far-sighted farmers will not—longer than necessary—continue to assume risks of production when the whole status of their operations may be changed over night by the whim or caprice of an administrative agency in Washington.

The traditional freedom under law, which has given this country unparalleled production in farm and factory, is threatened by the coercive forces embodied in price-fixing authority and subsidies.

Price-fixing can coerce the farm or business into a loss position. Subsidies can be used to take it out and make it solvent again. But, along with the grant of relief through subsidies, there can be imposed upon the farm or business conditions of operation which leave the operator little or no choice or freedom.

PERIL IN SUBSIDIES

On my farm 15 to 20 percent of the gross income comes through subsidies of one character or another. This may easily be more than the net income. In many cases it would actually be a part of the living expenditures of the farm family. When an administrative agency in Washington has power to add to that amount or take from it, it also has power to place such conditions around it as it desires. Those conditions may be in the form of requests for increased or decreased production, for specific methods of fertilization or tillage, for minimum wages or specific hours and working conditions for farm labor, or, carrying it to the extreme, telling the farmer what organization he should or should not join. A $2,000 subsidy on a $10,000 gross income is the margin between profit and loss. Used as a weapon, it can compel the obedience of farmers to the mandates of regulatory bodies. Also, please note that this is power of enforcement entirely outside the courts of law.

The battle over OPA in peacetime is not a battle of prices. It is fundamentally a battle of social philosophy conducted on the same level and by the same principles with which the dictator Caesar stripped the Romans of their freedom. He created confusion, promised security in exchange for power, and man's groping toward individual rights faded for 1,800 years.

CITIZENS BECOME SERVANTS OF GOVERNMENT

This OPA fight is a battle to place in the hands of the central Government and, through it, in the hands of those controlling government, the instrument by which every citizen who conducts a business can be compelled to seek help, advice, and relief from an administrative agency. Subsidies are the adjunct through which relief can be granted provided terms and conditions of the grant, as established by those in authority in central government are lived up to by the recipient.

The greatness of America, the miracle of production of farm and factory; the conquest of obstacles by the uncommon man; the future progress toward even greater efficiency; yes, even the maintenance of our present level of living, will be measured by the extent to which we free ourselves of the chains of price regulation and indirect control of producers through public grant tied to enforcement programs.

All of this price fixing and regulation has its invisible effect upon our production. Look over the cornfields that are being plowed this spring. The cornstalks are not buried as usual. Why? Because the production of disks for plows was delayed by price ceilings, strikes, and regulation. What has that to do with production? Only this: The corn borer lives and breeds in those stalks not plowed under, and should this pest this fall shorten a corn crop, it will not be an act of God but an indirect effect of the Government tampering with the intricate processes of efficient production of farm and factory.

TOO MUCH REGULATION

Ask any farmer what he thinks are the chances of obtaining adequate repair parts for farm machinery this summer. He will tell you that they are very questionable. Perhaps it is not the OPA alone or perhaps it is. But in any event the responsibility for such failure cannot rest with those who want to produce or who want to work. Their responsibility has been taken from them by the social philosophy of central regulation, of which OPA and subsidies are such a vital part. It now rests with those who deal in radio promises of delivery and radio explanation of failures. But a radio voice never planted a seed or harvested grain or built a combine or made a shirt. Those are the products of mind—planning and direction—capital and hard labor.

These are the elements of our society which must be rescued from the undertow of bureaucratic regulation and the numbing effects of Government grants of aid. This is the screen behind which the producers of the Nation can be reduced to economic serfdom, like that of the past history and of present totalitarian statism.

Food and Clothing Shortages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

BELMONT, MASS., June 1, 1946.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN: I never would have dreamed that I would see the day when the following conditions would exist in the town of Belmont, Mass., in this fair land of ours, as of June 1, 1946, at 10:30 a. m.:

1. No bread.
2. No butter or margarine.
3. No flour.
4. No sugar.
5. No soap or cleaning powder.
6. No meat.
7. No bacon.
8. No fowl from the egg man because of lack of feed.
9. No suitable clothing readily available.

During the past winter, the coal supply was very uncertain, and we had to put up an argument to secure 1 ton at a time.

We bought a house a year ago, but are unable to move into it because the tenant cannot find another place to live.

In short, there is a serious shortage of the three fundamentals of life; namely, food, clothing, and shelter. Conditions are far worse today than during the darkest days of the war.

It must be very disheartening and disgusting to our veterans to return to such conditions, and, in addition, be obliged to live in barrack-like shacks which are being erected all over the State.

Apparently our country is suffering from the gross incompetence and stupidity of a lot of wild-eyed impractical theorists and bureaucrats who fail to recognize the fundamental economic laws of supply and demand.

We in New England have been definitely discriminated against, as I know from experience that such conditions are not uniform throughout the country.

I feel that if sufficient measures are not adopted to curb these wild-eyed liberals who would give away our wealth and resources to our former enemies, we will find ourselves in the throes of a revolution.

A week ago the President wanted legislation to curb the labor leader gangsters; but some of our legislators are more interested in votes of an organized minority than the welfare of our country and its people.

As things are today, I don't think we would be any worse off under Hitler. It's about time our Congress ousted the small-town politicians from important positions, and demanded they be filled by competent and intelligent people.

In theory our Government is, by far, the best in the world; but it is a far cry from Washington and Lincoln to some of the persons we now have in powerful positions.

Very truly yours.

J. FRANK HODGE.

Poland's Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Morning News, Wilmington, Del.:

POLAND'S ELECTION

Poland has had an election but the significance of the outcome is none too clear. Apparently the government was successful in getting an affirmative majority for all three proposals on the referendum ballot over the opposition of the Peasant Party led by Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, which opposed a one-house legislative body. Its methods, however, invalidate any conclusion that the regime is firmly based on a popular majority.

The election was not free in the true meaning of the term. Before the voters went to the polls the government went to great lengths to intimidate the opposition and after the ballots were cast its officials, according to Mr. Mikolajczyk, were guilty of serious irregularities in making the count. Nor is there any doubt, to judge from dispatches sent by correspondents on the ground, that the charge is well founded.

Thus the government's victory is in a sense a defeat, since it evidently could not have been as sweeping as the figures would indicate if Polish citizens had been free to indicate their wishes. At least Mr. Mikolajczyk has demonstrated that he has considerable support and that it is loyal to him in a most hosile amosphere. The result may be to convince the Government leaders that they would be wise to pursue their program with some caution.

At any rate, it is plain that communism is in the saddle in Poland not by the free choice of he people but because the regime uses Communist tactics to stay in power and because it has Russian support. This is not exactly news, but the election is no comfort to those who would challenge this judgment.

Federal Aid for School Systems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in connection with Ed Hart's forum broadcast by radio station WINX there was discussed on last Sunday night the subject Is Congress Doing the Job Regarding Federal Aid for Our School Systems. The distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and Dr. James H. Fox, dean of the School of Education of George Washington University, were participants in the discussion. I ask unanimous consent that their remarks be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is Ed Hart speaking to you from Washington. A noted educator turned editor recently described America's educational system in these words, "An inadequately financed business—habit ridden, tradition bound, and snail paced." "The majority of our schools," he added, "operate as though all progress had stopped 30 years ago."

That severe indictment can and will be substantiated in a moment by Dr. James H. Fox, dean of the School of Education of George Washington University. What Congress may do to improve America's creaking educational system will be discussed by our other guest, Senator HARLEY M. KILGORE, a progressive Democrat from West Virginia. Incidentally, Senator KILGORE once taught school in his native State.

One of the questions widely discussed today throughout the country is whether the Federal Government should assist the States to finance their public schools. Dr. Fox, what are the reasons underlying the need for Federal aid?

Dr. Fox. Mr. Hart, as Americans we can be justly proud of many of the achievements of our public school systems. However, some of their results are not a matter of pride. Do you know that 3,000,000 adults living in the United States have never attended any kind of school—that 10,000,000 adults cannot read and write well enough to meet the ordinary demands of modern life—that in World War II Selective Service had to reject, because of illiteracy and other educational deficiencies, enough men for 20 combat divisions—almost as many as the Army used in the South Pacific operations—that 2,000,000 children, aged 6 to 15, were not in any kind of school in 1940—and this number was substantially increased during the war.

Mr. HART. Dr. FOX, these shocking facts are quite a contrast to the belief that America is the land of opportunity.

Dr. FOX. Mr. Hart, we like to call America a land of opportunity, and in many respects it is; but do you know that thousands of children attend schools on which we spend each year less than $100 per classroom unit while other thousands of children attend schools on which we spend 60 times as much for each classroom unit?

We like to think that our business leaders are smart, shrewd, far-sighted; yet they, and the rest of us, have consistently starved the most lucrative business enterprise of the Nation—an enterprise concerned with the development of human resources—the public schools. It is time that we started really supporting that business.

Mr. HART. Thank you, Dr. FOX, for calling to our attention the tragic neglect of the education of our children. Now I am going to call on Senator KILGORE to tell us about the specific measure, S. 181, that Congress is considering that will, to some degree, correct the situation. Senator KILGORE.

Senator KILGORE. Mr. Hart, first let me explain that changing conditions in our Nation and the world have placed greater demand than ever before upon the schools. In fact, these demands are so great today that they cannot be met, if many of our States and localities must pay the entire bill, unless they enact drastic tax revisions.

The practical solution lies in Federal aid to education as outlined in S. 181, now pending in Congress. This bill offers a real solution. Let me emphasize that it is not a revolutionary idea. The principle was first written in two great ordinances of 1785 and 1787 and the first enabling legislation was enacted by Congress in 1802.

Mr. HART. What is the over-all purpose, Senator?

Senator KILGORE. The over-all purpose of S. 181 is to offer every child at least a minimum education. This would be accomplished by establishing a minimum foundation for our school systems.

Such a program was established in my own State of West Virginia in 1933. Many other States have similar programs—programs which have broadened the educational opportunities in those areas.

S. 181, if enacted, will have the effect of improving the educational opportunities of millions of American boys and girls. Federal aid would be distributed to the States on the basis of an objective formula which would leave no discretion to any Federal agency or officer—thus leaving no chance for Federal influence in the operation of the schools.

Mr. HART. How would Federal aid be distributed, Senator?

Senator KILGORE. Basically, Federal aid would be distributed under a three-point program. First, in direct ratio to the number of children to be educated; second, according to the ability of the State to provide its own schools, and third, according to the effort the State is making to finance its own public-school program.

Every State benefiting under the act would be expected to make at least a reasonable effort to finance its own schools in order to be eligible to receive Federal aid after the fourth year of operation of this program.

Now our State of West Virginia, for example, spent 3 percent of the income of all of its citizens for public schools for the 5-year period from 1939 through 1943. Across the State line, Virginia, the corresponding expenditure was 1.7 percent.

Mr. HART. Are all States eligible?

Senator KILGORE. Under the act, every State is expected to make an expenditure of 2.2 percent of its income for schools in order to receive Federal aid. By way of explanation, West Virginia would be eligible for benefits under the act, while Virginia would not be eligible until her school expenditures are increased to a minimum effort of 2.2 percent.

This program has won wide bipartisan support in Congress. If enacted, it will go a long way toward fulfilling the goal established in the famous ordinances of 1787 from which I quote, "morality, religion, and knowledge being essential to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

Mr. HART. Thank you, Senator KILGORE and Dr. FOX. Now would the passage of the bill bring the public-school system of the States under the control of the Federal Government? Senator KILGORE, what are your views on this?

Senator KILGORE. Emphatically no. First, the bill makes no transfer of any educational control now exercised by the State to the Federal Government; second, the bill includes a prohibition clause to the effect that no "department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States" shall "direct, supervise, or control, in any manner, or prescribe requirements with respect to, the administration, the personnel, the curriculum, the instruction, the methods of instruction, or the materials of instruction"; third, the bill specifically retains for the State its long-standing function of defining public education; fourth, as already pointed out, the distribution of Federal aid to the States is made on an objective basis, not subject to manipulation by any Federal agency or officer; fifth, no State is required to make any change in its constitution to be eligible for the benefits of the act.

Mr. HART. And you are in favor of that. Do you want to comment, Dr. FOX?

Dr. FOX. Indeed, I believe that this bill, if enacted, will provide good insurance against undesirable Federal control. It has been drawn with unusual care and contains ingenuous provisions designed not only to preserve the rights of the State but to encourage State and local initiative. It is likely to serve as a model for much future legislation.

Mr. HART. Gentlemen, how much are we spending today for our educational system and how much do you think we should spend? You studied this problem for a long time, Dr. FOX. What are your findings?

Dr. FOX. We have never put enough money into public education to make it a going concern. That is the kind of productive enterprise that yields its full benefits. We have kept the salaries of teachers disgracefully low. In thousands of schools classes have been much too large for effective instruction, and with each passing year they grow larger. A majority of our schools have too few books.

Mr. HART. How about other teaching aids, Dr. FOX?

Dr. FOX. They are even more inadequate. Thousands of our young people have eye defects because we have failed to light classrooms adequately. Thousands try to study in ramshackle buildings that were obsolescent 25 years ago. Businessmen know that you cannot starve a business and make it pay. Good farmers know that the same applies to farming. It is time we learned that it is even more true of public education.

Mr. HART. Actually, how much additional money is needed?

Dr. FOX. If we want to make a going concern of public education, we shall have to about double our current expenditures for it. A great deal of money, yes; but even then we will be spending less than we are now spending on luxuries, many of which lower our efficiency as workers and shorten our lives. Our Nation has been properly concerned about the development of its mineral wealth, its agricultural resources, its opportunities for trade. Is it not time that it showed at least an equal concern for the development of its human resources, particularly in this atomic age? We spend from all sources far less on public education than we should, yet from the national purse comes less than 1 percent of the total.

Mr. HART. The benefits of S. 181 would go to schools that are now supported from State and local revenues. What about private schools which do not now receive public support? Where will they stand under the bill, Senator KILGORE?

Senator KILGORE. The schools that benefit are the same schools that are now receiving or may hereafter receive support from State and local revenues. The definition of public education in terms of public support has always been the function of our States. Any school that is ruled eligible by the State can receive the advantages set forth in the pending legislation. That is entirely a matter for State determination and this is the only way it can be drawn if we are to retain State support of our schools.

Mr. HART. The bill costs $150,000,000 the first year, $200,000,000 the second year, and the third year and thereafter $250,000,000. From a practical business point of view, can we afford this expenditure, Dr. FOX?

Dr. FOX. The United States Chamber of Commerce has answered this question very adequately. It has recently shown that the better the standard of education in a Nation, a State, or a community, the higher its standard of living. Education makes people good producers, and good consumers. The more they know, the more they earn and spend. It should also be noted that in certain parts of the country unequal educational opportunities caused disparities which caused the burden of war service to fall very heavily upon the better educated and thus is handicapping our postwar situation. Mr. Hart, we just cannot afford to treat education as we have in the past.

Mr. HART. Do you feel that way, too, Senator KILGORE?

Senator KILGORE. Yes; I think education presents a new frontier for prosperity in America. If we fully utilize it, we are building up the greatest natural resource we have.

Mr. HART. Thank you, Senator KILGORE and Dr. FOX, for reminding us about the shocking condition of America's schools and for telling us how Congress can help to improve them. If a democratic society such as ours is to endure and prosper, one luxury we can least afford is a static or declining education system. So let's all work to make S. 181 the law of the land. This is Ed Hart saying good-by from Washington.

OPA

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1964

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a copy of an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of June 29, 1946.

Mr. Speaker, this editorial should be of especial interest at this time due to the extension of the OPA being under consideration by this Congress.

The editorial referred to follows:

ONE OF OPA'S LITTLE PEOPLE LETS HIMSELF GO

Most of us regard price control as strictly an emergency measure. OPA officials accept this view in their public utterances. Occasionally, however, the citizen is led to wonder what is the attitude of the permanent officials in the agency toward the assumption that their job is a temporary hang-over from the war. A few weeks ago, the New York Times printed a letter by John Khanlian, who described himself as assistant regional price board executive, region II, OPA. Mr. Khanlian wrote to take exception to an editorial which had pointed out that the arrival of new supplies of strawberries in a certain area justified decontrolling that item. Mr. Khanlian then proceeded as follows:

"Since everyone accepts control by the Interstate Commerce Commission and public-service commissions of the prices charged for railroad transportation, gas, electricity, telephone service, water, and other goods and services, it is inconsistent and archaic to advocate general economic anarchy now. Like many other examples of social progress, the time for price control has arrived and no arguments can dispel that towering reality. Our most profitable course is so to design price control that, like all other accepted social controls, it will yield greater freedom because of our having it."

OPA promptly disowned Mr. Khanlian's opinions, and we do not suggest that he was preaching OPA doctrine. But he apparently represents at least a fraction of the rank-and-file OPA mind when idling along on the stream of consciousness.

America's Need Is Simple Arithmetic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in this day of confusion and uncertainty it is well for us to turn our minds toward some of the simple fundamentals which worked so well for so many years in making America great. Mr. E. F. Hutton, of Westbury, Long Island, N. Y., recently spent his own money to call attention to some fundamental principles which we apparently have lost sight of in the last 10 or 15 years. I am inserting herewith an article or editorial prepared by him which is enlightening and very timely:

WHAT AMERICA NEEDS IS TO RESUME THE ARITHMETIC THAT MADE AMERICA GREAT

After 1776, a new kind of arithmetic provided the basis and foundation of American thinking. It was simple arithmetic—it posed the problem this way—make more and more goods for less and less cost so that more and more people can buy them. It clearly recognized the goose that lays the golden egg, so it centered effort on cutting costs—making more—selling for less—to more people. It was not long before the world took notice of this simple arithmetic and people flocked to our shores to take part in the great American adventure.

Along about 1932, out pops a different kind of arithmetic—collectivism. It posed the problem this way—"spend two or three times your income"—even if you have to borrow the money to do so—"spend and spend, tax and tax."

Let America examine these two kinds of arithmetic—the 1776 brand which recognized and preserved the goose which lays the golden egg or the 1932–45 arithmetic which says "to heck with the eggs—eat the goose."

GOVERNMENT HAS NOTHING

Tax money constitutes all Government income—all it spends must come from taxes either today or tomorrow. Borrowing merely postpones. So if they are spending more than they take in from taxes, it does not worry the collectivists. They rely on the simple expedient of printing bonds and selling them to the people—it is all done with paper. But the paper part of Government income merely postpones, and if it does not stop it shifts the burden from you to your children's children. So the collectivists do all the collecting. You don't. They say "use your outmoded American arithmetic to produce more wealth—we need it—so as to tax it away from those who produce it—to pay the interest on the bonds we sell to those who take them, so that we can continue to spend two or three times our income."

THE PATTERN WAS NOT "MADE IN AMERICA"

The pattern of the conspiring collectivist's arithmetic is already set. It wasn't set in America. It is "divide and conquer"—take everything—create a new kind of state that owns everything, including your Bill of Rights and 1776 goose which laid the golden egg. This pattern is of foreign origin. You just exchange your liberty for a tin cup to use in begging for favors from your masters. The people are to be just serfs—panhandlers.

"Be fruitful and multiply"—that Biblical injunction cannot be carried out unless we hold inviolate the 1776 arithmetic of liberty. You cannot distribute wealth until you produce it, and the minute wealth production begins, wealth distribution begins. That kills incentive capital risks—yes, "be fruitful and multiply," but industry cannot produce as fast as government can print bonds. If this paper wealth production is not stopped, the 1776 arithmetic will find itself in the financial hopper.

LESS OR MORE?

Today America stands at the crossroads—one signboard points to the left and reads "Less and less for more and more." It points the way of the collectivists' arithmetic. The other signboard points to the right. It is set upon a foundation of the Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the Declaration of Independence. It reads "This way for more and more for everybody."

THE SING SING BOYS HAVE "SECURITY"

True security comes from liberty, freedom and equality of opportunity. It does not come with being a ward of the State. The prisoners of Alcatraz, Sing Sing, and Atlanta have security, but still none of them want to stay there and, once released, none want to go back. They seek real freedom and liberty.

ENTERPRISE A SPIRITUAL THING

"Enterprise which creates jobs is born of human hope and aspiration, it is the hope of the individual, his vision and courage, which makes job-creating enterprise possible. A threat against such hope is a threat against all enterprise and against our limitless opportunities. The loss of hope withers the people's energies, their enterprise, their ambitions." (Henry Wallace, from the book, Sixty Million Jobs.)

Today business is stopped because of the loss of hope. Business cannot continue because of lack of security, and security is endangered by lack of business. This leads to labor unrest, and all together means less and less for more and more.

THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR WORK

No one yet has discovered how to create without paying labor, how to produce without capital, and how to get capital without savings. If we are to consume, someone must produce. Never before in our history could so many problems be solved quickly by one simple remedy: Production.

GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC ILLITERACY

We cannot consider our Government secure when its expenditures are greater than its revenues. If all business financial activities had been handled since 1932 according to the theories of the collectivists, spending two or three times more than you take in, every business would be insolvent, completely broke. Can a family live on that basis?

There can be no freedom in any country where the profit and loss and competitive system is not free; otherwise the citizens are subjected to state decisions—the state becomes the master.

I regret to lament that a large majority of our business executives are lacking in vision and courage—they are timid, and huddle like frightened sheep. Instead of becoming leaders, as one might hope, judging from their commercial and manufacturing achievements, they shy away from their obligations in fear of reprisals. I refer to such matters as legislative obligations and social and moral issues. Whatever is right can be achieved through the irresistible power of an awakened and informed public opinion. It must be the imperative selling job, and now, by national advertisers to protect the system which has given them the right to be in business. The basis of that foundation is our Bill of Rights—it is not a question of what helps business—but what helps the consumer helps business.

The worst crime against the working people is a company which fails to operate at a profit; and where continuing means the closing of the shop and employees are out of employment. By continuing profits, the employees and workers in the plants have the opportunity to advance.

The other crime is a government which operates at a loss each year, spends more than it takes in, which means more and more confiscatory taxation to run a government. The sacrifice of such fundamental principles for political opportunism is a repudiation of the system which built America—our competitive profit and loss system. Business leadership is living in today, forgetful of yesterday and apparently indifferent to tomorrow. The result is, the active usurp the rights of the inactive.

How much feed can you take away from the cow and still get milk? How much in taxes can you continue to expropriate from the working people and still get production? In business and in life there is only one course to follow—that of duty—and not of expediency, timidity, or discretion. Weakness cannot cooperate with anything, only strength can cooperate. The people become strong when they have the facts—you cannot expect them to defend that which they do not understand. Today we are in a head-on collision between catastrophe and education—the return to constitutional government, or to accept a corporate state, which means totalitarianism—"I am the state"—and as such has there been any public protest on the part of the bankers' association, the bar association, life insurance companies, or business, against the suppression of our constitutional liberties? If so, I have not heard of it. Stalin stated: "The sharpest and most powerful weapon of the Communist Party is the printed word." Oliver Wendell Holmes stated: "Truth is contagious. A drop of ink makes a thousand, yes a million, think." When will industrial leadership engage in the printed word, the drop of ink, to inform the people of our country in respect to the facts, failing in which the facts will catch up with them?

Discouraging thrift does not create prosperity. The destruction of big men cannot help weak men. In other words, you cannot lift the wage earner by pulling down and destroying the wage payer.

The economic illiteracy of this country is appalling. It is mentally bankrupt. For 12 long years our public has been insidiously indoctrinated with a constant barrage of propaganda, and with public funds—our tax money—our profit and loss and competitive system has been smeared and belittled, and this criticism has definitely taken root.

Business management must assume its responsibility—stop this attitude of being too proud to reply to criticism. This can be accomplished by using this joint machinery of persuasion. I refer to the national advertisers, in defense of the system, by telling the truth to the Nation, and particularly the Nation's youth; they must create an ideology to tell this story and its purpose—the romance of American business—and make it just as attractive and progressive as socialism and collectivism seem to be to the young and the country. A person's judgment is not better than his information.

Industry must realize that many consumer mediums have taken part in belittling, so to speak, our competitive profit and loss system. Magazines, newspapers, movies, comic strips, and the radio have in a roundabout way permitted this ridicule, and businessmen and success have been constantly sneered at as bourgeois. An important percentage of the press is filled daily with the opinions of left-wingers and New Dealers, the radicals, and labor leaders. How often has the press portrayed any statement by leaders of industry? If business leadership does not assume its over-all responsibility, it cannot complain if others influence public thinking. Barney Baruch has said that the "American people can do anything if you will tell them why, but you must tell them."

We must accept the code of thinking that the interests of workers, management, owners, and customers are inseparable—that one may not succeed at the expense of another. Interest, success, our futures are commonly and irrevocably linked to each other. Knowing this, business management should not permit ugly cynicism, ignorance, apathy, lack of knowledge, bureaucracy, alienism, or rabble rousing to successfully challenge and threaten the Nation and its system, which, despite its detractors, is still the bulwark of our Republic and the warehouse for nations which would have gone down to ignominious defeat were it not for the workings of our profit-and-loss and competitive-enterprise system.

I recognize that smearing pens have made business management timid. We must face the facts and change the situation. It is the responsibility of management, to whom I speak, to cure the economic illiteracy of our people. Management of corporations for private enterprise must accept the clear viewpoint that they are not in politics when they assume their obligations to public questions. They are in politics when they attempt to elect or defeat those running for public office.

There was a Carthage. While its soldiers fought, the citizens of the walled town went on living as they always lived. "War," they said, "was for the soldiers."

Carthage fell.

There is an America. While its politicians run the Government, the citizens go on living as they always have lived, behind the walls of the constitutional Bill of Rights. "Government," they say, "is for the politicians."

Will America fall?

A justified illustration confronting business when it stands at the bar of public opinion is the long sustained attitude of overstressing the value of silence. They are not giving the facts to the people but others are giving theirs and they are not favorable to the system which America built.

Unless industrial leadership accepts and faces with courage and fortitude its obligations to its stockholders, white-collar brigade and workers in their plants, it is my opinion America will fall.

This expressed viewpoint is my own responsibility, paid for by me, and is in no way connected or identified with any group, organization, or company. This advertisement is placed before the people, with the hope of promoting a better understanding of our problems between capital and labor and the further hope of preserving our competitive profit-and-loss system. "Error of opinion may be tolerated when reason is left free to combat it."

Responsibilities of the United States in the Postwar World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Responsibilities of the United States in the Postwar World," delivered by me at the twenty-second session of the Institue of World Affairs, on June 27, 1946, at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Calif.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Assuming that we were in a condition of contending states, many of those who have written of America's position in the world have credited our ability to maintain ourselves by relying upon the strength of the British Navy. Then in 1914 when that navy's preponderant position in the Atlantic was challenged, we, of necessity, had to go to the rescue of the nation that commanded that navy because we were dependent upon it for our national life.

Growing out of the First World War came the League of Nations with its fundamental notion that the peace of the world should be preserved by all since peace was of concern to all. America lead in the promulgation of that idea. And it was America's leadership that brought into existence the League of Nations. With peace, America changed her mind and did not think that the peace of the world depended upon the League of Nations.

Then came the Second World War. We went through almost identical philosophizing and before the war was over, under American auspices, in this very State of Hiram Johnson, the United Nations Charter was brought into existence, based again upon the theory that peace is of concern to all and must be maintained by all. The maintenance of peace under the League was to be brought about by the throwing of the preponderance of the will of the world against an erring state. Force was hinted at, but not actually recognized as being part of the scheme. Under the United Nations Charter, force is not only hinted at but is prescribed, and the preponderant forces of the whole world is in theory to be hurled against an erring state and peace is thus to be maintained.

American responsibility in this new world organization is paramount. Everyone realizes that if we should withdraw now, as we did in 1919, world organization would again revert to a condition of chaos and the world would again be in a condition of contending states. Probably in the history of mankind the weight of responsibility never pressed down on any people quite as much as it today presses down upon us. To those who are thoughtful about these responsibilities and the ramifications of the obligations they entail, the problems of meeting our responsibilities are serious indeed.

There is a willingness to lend, to give, to cut down our food supply that others may have some of it. The American Government has responded to obligations almost to the point of sacrifice. Joint action for peace has brought the wholehearted response of the people quite as much as did the appeal to sacrifice during war, but it has been on a piecemeal basis. We are not yet organized in spirit or in reality, nor united in a willingness to assume all of the responsibilities of leadership in the world. We are putting our faith in devices. The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State met jointly before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in Executive session and pleaded for an extension of the draft in order that we may live up to our obligations of this new responsibility. Think of it, these great leaders of our country actually made the appeal that America's moral, physical, and military strength are dependent upon a concept of how to raise an army! They tell us that we must guard the surplus supplies in foreign countries. The problem of getting hundreds of thousands of Polish soldiers who fought on the Allies' side and who cannot go home because they are frightened to go home faces the world. If those Polish soldiers were in the United States they would be subject to the draft and could enlist in the Army. We have not yet developed genius enough to invite them to enlist in the Army to guard supplies in Italy where thousands of them are. My point is simply this: In facing our great obligations we seem to insist upon spending our time with, comparatively speaking, insignificant things.

One of our representatives says we must get the armies of our Allies out of the countries of Europe before we can do much and when it is pointed out that there are some countries where our allies have no troops and we could probably do something in those countries, we are told we are not ready for settling the conditions in those countries.

Our greatest general has become an ambassador. A great admiral has become an ambassador. Another great general has become an ambassador. Still it has not dawned upon any of them that with the destruction of Hitler after he had assumed unto himself the state, the constitution, and the government of Germany that there was no Germany as a political entity left. Years ago it was pointed out to various of our leaders that in 1934, upon Hindenburg's death, when Hitler assumed that he could fly in the face of all governmental experience, and unite the state, the constitution, and the government in one person that Germany, as a political entity, was destroyed the minute Hitler was killed or captured. Our rather ill-trained advisers assumed that we could still deal with the German people. But where are the German people? These same advisers saw no advantage in bringing surrender in Japan by preserving the Japanese constitution and thus avoiding guerrilla warfare and all that follows in the wake of anarchy. I was abused for attempting to show the simple truism that while we kill our enemies in wartime we insist upon feeding them when peace comes, and that, if we could keep anarchy from developing among our enemies when we are in charge of enemy peoples, it is easier to feed them when they are in a position to help themselves.

"Hang the Kaiser" was a slogan and it was good only as a slogan to aid in the reelection of Lloyd George. But the Kaiser was not hung. "Hang the Emperor and let anarchy rage in Japan" was the cry many of our people wailed. Had the cry been accepted our problems would have been many times greater than they are today. Great problems are not easy, neither are little ones. The new world will not come by fiat. It will not come all at once. It will be built and will be built one brick at a time. And, during the building, the people will follow only those in whom they have faith and can trust. If America is to lead the world into better ways she must first gain the good will, the faith, and the trust of the world. This we have more than most of us conceive. But when we forget our great fundamental aims and become excited about single little issues the people of the world begin to wonder.

Now please do not assume that I am critical or pessimistic. I am laying a foundation for a conclusion. In the economic fields we are not doing so badly and I realize each problem in its solving uncovers other problems. Those who like to sloganize themselves out assume an easy way. For example, we ourselves created the concept of self-determination. Let each people decide for themselves what kind of government they want and what borders they should have, then we would have a peaceful world. But self-determination merely invites more problems, great as the concept is. Two examples will satisfy you, I am sure. Where are you going to begin in giving Poland a chance for self-determination? Can we leave the question about a Jewish homeland to a plebiscite of the people in Palestine? Italian elections were in keeping with a democratic process. But were all who should vote allowed to vote? In America there are many places where all who should vote are not allowed to vote because we leave the question of those who should vote to the people who are in power. Still we maintain pretty good peace and to us it does not seem vital. But, if you are fighting for the removal of the poll tax or for woman's suffrage, we soon learn that the question is vital. These points are all stressed to show that isolationists who sincerely felt that the problems of world organization are so great that the only way for a person or nation to be happy would be to assume the characteristics of a hermit. Our ability to be a hermit nation was dependent upon two pictures, both of which were false. First, that the rest of the world had habits which were different from ours and we, therefore, could never properly unite with the rest of the world in attaining a world-wide objective. And second, that we were self-sufficient and did not depend upon the rest of the world. We, of course, could have tried and in the course of centuries we could have succeeded as well as China did or as Japan did. Japan did it for many years. The dark ages in Europe and the dark ages in Asia came as a result of a forced isolation on both sides of the then civilized world and, to an extent, kept certain nations from fighting, but those ages did not preserve peace in the immediate neighborhoods of the East or the West.

Now we have come to the place in our theorizing that for the second time in world history, those who spoke for the people of the world everywhere have once again made the great pronouncement that war does not pay. It is not a matter of the victor enjoying the spoils any longer. It is realized on the part of the victor that he has wasted his own resources and brought to himself problems of death, want, even pestilence. Surely now, after two generations of assuming that war does not pay, that it is an archaic technique, the world must some way or another move forward with a different device. I do not say move forward or civilization will be ruined, because war has been one of the outstanding aspects of civilization. When civilizations have slipped into destruction in the past, I am pretty sure that the people who lived during the slipping did not realize what was taking place. It would be pretty hard to bring complete destruction or death to civilization. But Americans resent even slipping a little way down in our living standards, and we know that no good is accomplished by allowing our standards to slip. Therefore, our leaders are saying "One world or no world."

If ladies were not present, I would say, damn these slogans! They are the bane of life. They destroy all thoughtful appreciation. "One world, or no world!" I said the other night that it has long been known that mankind could actually commit suicide. It is a concept which man only, among the animals of nature, has been able to conceive. But if the 2,000,000,000 people in the world all decided to commit suicide and each one of them accepted the proposition of blowing his individual brains out at half past 9 on June 30, there would be so many who would miss that the world and the worst of those who have to solve the problems of the world would be left and we would still have the world and civilization with us. In other words, there seems to be no way out but a constructive way. Therefore, why not assume that that is the case and get on the side of taking constructive steps toward overcoming our bad habits of destruction. We can do it if we will. But we have got to change our way of thinking and many of those slogans by which men argue. One thing sure we have got to do and that is to decide that a nation's most cherished asset is something other than a concept of sovereignty. I do not see why we have to quarrel everlastingly over a subject that no two men ever agree on and which can hardly be defined—the legal fiction that mining, manufacturing, and agriculture are of purely local concern.

If you talk about sovereignty to a group of freshmen and you point out the equality of nations and then you show them a map of the world and you say, "Russia and Liberia are equal; each is independent and completely sovereign," they lose faith in political science. And you cannot blame them. Has it not dawned upon anyone that the veto power which we are now talking so much about can be granted to nearly all of the nations of the world and it will not make a bit of difference. Denmark is not going to veto very much. Compulsory jurisdiction or the leaving of disputes that can be settled in law to the jurisdiction of a world court is only a problem that one or two nations worry about. Those who worry the most are the ones who can stand a little loss now and then by judicial action. Cannot we in America see that. There was a time when the rich bachelor protested as unfair a tax for the public schools on the score that he should not be taxed to educate some widow's children. But bachelors do not protest that "injustice" any more in America.

For a long time we have been trying to make pan-Americanism work. Today we deem the Caribbean our front yard; and that much of the Pacific must be an American lake; and that bases at various places are necessary to our national defense. Today, probably other nations might use the same theory. Now it is a fact that there are very few nations in the world that resent our considering the Caribbean our front yard and we would not quarrel over it much, but when Russia wanted and got back the Kuriles, north of Japan, and moved into the north half of Sakhalin many assumed that Russia was on the march. Of all the nations in the world who are today expanding, Russia has moved into lands closer to her own than any of the other powers. Is it not, therefore, logical to a Russian mind that there should be no objections to Russia securing her own borders as long as Holland deems it necessary to control Indonesia miles and miles away, and we think bases in the South Pacific are essential.

There are scores of nations in the world which always found the high seas safe and the highways of trade open to them at all times. Why should it be that Britain, America, Japan, and Italy thought that protection for their trade depended upon great navies? Habit of thought did that. Habit growing out of experience the naval powers would maintain. But great as our Navy was, it was never great enough to protect our theory of freedom of the seas. We crushed our enemy, but it was our great ally which would not accept the theory of free ships, free goods. If freedom of the seas is worth attaining, it has, therefore, got to come in some other way than by sinking an enemy fleet. My point is this: We defeated Japan, Germany and Italy. We helped save England and Russia; we rescued China; and we brought independence again to France. We did all this and more, and, during the fighting, peace seemed so simple and easy. Well, our troubles today are not with our enemies—they seem to be with our friends. Do you not, therefore, see that war is simple and peace is complex.

We gave, Marshall, Nimitz, Eisenhower, MacArthur, et al., the credit for winning the war. But really, now, they did not do it. It took the work and united energies of 140,000,000 Americans to do it. Byrnes, Connally, and Vandenberg are not going to win the peace. It will take the unity, the zeal, and the work—we'll leave the blood and sweat to Churchill—of 140,000,000 Americans to win the peace. World peace can only come through peaceful processes. It cannot come as a result of war. If we had started out to conquer the world our task would have been simpler than the one we are now facing. We have assumed the responsibility of winning the peace. God help Jimmie Byrnes if he thinks he can "fix" that one. He needs the faith, the help, and the knowledge of all of us.

Now I am going to offer a suggestion. When nations meet in peace conferences, instead of the national representatives spending all of their time trying to keep their neighbors from asking too much, let each nation put down exactly what it wants and then the world will find that there will be fewer problems to solve when all know exactly what each nation desires.

I am an American, but I do not know yet just what bases we think are essential. Before we say we need bases it would be better to say what bases. That may eliminate asking for the very one some other nation wants.

I am anxious to see that this new three-dimensional world, which has become ours as a result of the almost universal use of the air, can be made to work and can contribute to making man a three-dimensional being by not being stilted in his three-dimensional activities by two-dimensional law and custom. I think it is common sense to do a bit of experimenting. Tell Germany, Italy, and Japan that forever the air over those lands is to be free to our airships. Then be frank and say, "but their ships cannot come over our lands." Then let a generation go by and the world will see that Germany, Italy, and Japan will have received more benefits from the free air than have the American people from being selfish about our air. This is a scientific approach. Let us experiment. We have a right to say to Germany, Austria, and the Danubian states—you open your canals and riverways; there shall be international control of them, and thus let Russian wheat come from the Black Sea to the Baltic. That is so simple. Open the Danube, the Ludwig Canal, and the Rhine, and much of the controversy over the control of the Mediterranean is useless.

Are statesmen willing to try either of these devices? Why, no! Statesmen are still two-dimensional men. They think about the new world, but they want to remain in the old world, and I, having said that, will be dubbed an impractical nut. But that will not hurt me, but it does stultify the thinking of the fellow who calls me an impractical nut.

Using as an illustration an incident which happened just a few months ago, see how sensible civilian control of atomic energy strikes us today. Go back now just a month or two and read how those of us who had the courage to say that since the atomic bomb was brought into existence as a result of the resources of all of the people, it belongs to all of the people and it shall not be selfishly used. Most of us like the idea today, but we did not 2 or 3 months ago. What a lesson there is to mankind in the development of that bomb. Probably in the whole range of American history you will not find another time when a man came before a committee of Congress and said he needed $2,000,000,000 and that Congress must give it on trust without telling what it was to be spent for. He got it. A nation that can do that surely can use its faith and trust to advantage in other ways and at other times. How pygmy would privately endowed research institutions look when compared with the American people's $2,000,000,000 research project. Are you sorry we undertook it? The bomb cost each of you about $14.95. Are you sorry? I am a bit sad over its use and the consequence, but I am not sorry we were able to make the bomb, and no one will be after atomic energy is made constructively serviceable.

Now, having the bomb, America finds great responsibilities. How to make these responsibilities function becomes our next problem. We have harped about popular sovereignty for a century and three-quarters, but we have not done much about it. We have mentioned that the last war was a war between peoples and that it was fought by certain peoples to put down wickedness which was rampant among other peoples. I do not believe that since the idea of popular sovereignty and the peoples' control of their governments has become so widely accepted that we can have world organization function in a peaceful way until the people of the world assert themselves in a constructive way for this functioning.

I can make my point clear by asking a few simple questions. Do you think the people of Russia want to fight the people of the United States? Do you think the people of America want to fight the Russian people? Do you think the people of Great Britain are not sympathetic with a peaceful adjustment of the government of India? Do you think that the people of America can be made a unit to fight for any factional group in Poland? Do you think the people of America want a strong, united Germany? I do. But the people lose their interest in a strong Germany when it is explained by one of those two-dimensional statesmen who think that a strong Germany is essential in order that there shall be a buffer between England, the United States, and Russia. I do not believe the people of America are the least bit interested today in the theory of a buffer state. The three-dimensional world has made the buffer-state idea archaic. The people of America would like a strong, united Germany because they believe that the Germans, in raising their own standards, will raise the standards of living of other peoples. America's high standard of living can only be assured in this world by bringing or helping to bring the standard of living up elsewhere. America can, in peacetime, produce more than she can consume of those things which she makes. America needs markets, high standard, developed markets. The day of exploitation has gone in theory. Therefore, it will go in fact. Therefore, why build a peace foundation of the world upon theories which were used to exploit and make more dependent low-standard peoples?

Why do we want a strong China? I want a strong China for the benefit of the Chinese people and not a strong China to hold Japan in restraint or to keep Russia from overrunning the world. My point is that if we reorient our thinking a bit and accept the possibility of world organization based upon the theory of peaceful living and dedicated to the proposition that the raising of the standards anywhere raises standards everywhere, that our people will respond to that idea and it can be made to function. Once we tell our statesmen to speak for the American people their speaking will be on a higher plane.

A new life and a new outlook is being developed in Japan today. Japan can be a great nation and a good contributing member of the family of nations if she accepts sincerely the theories of her new constitution. If, though, the statesmen of Japan have merely decided that they must follow the advice of the American leaders or else become engulfed by expanding Russia, then the new Japanese Constitution will not work. The philosophy used by the Japanese when they brought about the Anglo-Japanese alliance must not be reused by them again now. If it is, it will be as fatal to Japan's future as was her course beginning about the time when she entered into her western alliance. Japan must represent the basic yearnings of her people and not imitate, as they did when they followed Matsuoka in his pitiful struttings to follow Mussolini and Hitler.

The theory that I suggest the world follows has been with us for over a generation. The theory is based upon the principles that since peace everywhere is of concern to all, the economic condition of men everywhere should be of concern to all. Then peace, in its final analysis, can only be maintained when the causes of war are removed. The greatest of all causes, it was assumed, are economic ones. War, therefore, under that theory has its justification in a need of rectifying ills. If these ills can be rectified in other ways, the resort to war is, therefore, less necessary. The theory is not all-embracing and does not cover every situation. But where the desire is purely one of conquest or the coveting of a neighbor's property, the raising of standards will at least make the gaining of followers hard and thus peace is the more cherished.

There has been one organization in the world that has kept this plane of thought, the one survival of the League of Nations, the international labor organization. That organization assumed that peace could not be maintained in a world of exploitation and that low standards were an invitation to war; and a generation and a half ago it set out to do something about it. The strength of that organization is great in the world. It worked out a technique for bringing the defeated nations back into world organization. Has anyone of our statesmen noticed the strength of this great organization in the world. No one that I have noticed has. Still it is here, it is plugging and mankind is being benefited by its actions. But there is no glory associated with it, no pomp, just work and accomplishment. And many people thought that it was hardly worth while that this organization be made a part of world organization. Probably it started too close to the people to be attractive to those leaders who hanker for old habits.

The great unknowns in the world of tomorrow are those mighty nations which have developed or are developing out of great revolutions—China, India, and Russia. Russia seems to be the great unknown that worries us the most. There are reasons for this; logical ones and some that are not based upon good reasoning. I have in one of my studies made a comparison of Russian and American developments. I shall not do that tonight, but I am going to make this much of a point. What nation in the world has a better right to be suspicious of the rest of the world than Russia? What nation in the world can more logically assume that she must be careful in coming into the sisterhood of the nations of the world than Russia? For over 100 years, Russia has fought many wars, but she had not won any of them. The present Russia bases her theory of life upon a revolutionary concept that practically the whole world is united against. A concept which certain writers in the world felt that the League of Nations was a necessary combination in order to curb the growth of Russian revolutionary development. Today she stands victorious over her enemies, victorious not only in an international war sense, but believing she has destroyed what was an economic one against her, represented in the Anti-Comintern Pact. Can you blame Russia for feeling that she would get along better with her neighbors and with the nations of the world if more of them rested upon the theory of communism? Have not we fought one world war to make the world safe for democracy? Are not we attempting to develop the democratic techniques in the countries that were our enemies? Have the plebiscites we are encouraging no meaning? I say, are our desires for a democratic world state less zealous than is Russia's desire for a communistic world? I merely mention this to you to cause us to appreciate the situation. Simply speaking, our contest is this—two political systems seem to be at ultimate and eternal conflict. But are they? The American objective is to raise the standard of living of all and give individual man freedom to aspire. And our only motto is, to the worthy belongs the reward. Russia is aiming to raise the standards of all, and, only to the worker should be the benefit. The happiness and general welfare of men, women, and children are the objectives of both. Just as political parties in America clash everlastingly we may everlastingly clash over the method of approach, but not over the objectives. That can never be in governments controlled by their people. Ultimately, all must be accomplished by peaceful change, for without that we go back. War takes man down and the long struggle upward comes not by the techniques of war but by the techniques of peace. This we all know. Patience, forbearance, perseverance, tolerance are the needed words today. But I would suggest one step further than that. Since we are friends, let us learn to appreciate one another. Have not we an opportunity to show the Russian people that our economic objectives, as far as the individual man is concerned, are much alike. Can we not at least be sympathetic for each other and appreciative of one another. If we cannot be, then clash is inevitable because the single-will communistic state and the many-loyalties democratic state are based on theories which are as far divided as the poles.

Appreciation should be our aim. We must look to the strength of ourselves and our own institutions as the best means of meeting the strength and institutions of others. And as keeping our strength and institutions depend so greatly on peace, we must have peace. So must Russia. If two such great countries without real rivalries and without the memory of a single war between them both need peace to such an extent, what will prevent them from finding it together?

Have we, the people of the United States, forgotten the holy alliance, the alliance in support of legitimacy, when we were pioneering the way of democracy in the world? Why should we object if Communistic Russia thinks that she would be happier if most of the world were Communistic when some of us say we are against the loan to Britain because the money would be used to advance socialism in England?

My thesis is a simple one. America has grown from very small beginnings to very large responsibilities. She was a nation without much influence in the world when she started. She has become the nation of the greatest of all influence in the world today. The mere bulk of us gives us responsibility based upon a simple physical fact, if nothing else. But our bulk is not our strength. The thing which makes America strong is the fact that long ago in America we accepted a simple Jeffersonian thesis that there is but one code of morality for men, whether acting singly or collectively.

Thomas Jefferson was 150 years closer to Michiavelli than are we. He did not have the experience of World War I and World War II. He did not know how completely the world would accept a theory that states could operate without morals; that might made right; and that sovereignties could do no wrong. Throughout American history every contest we have had has had a moral aspect and a moral significance. If individual man is to live by and with certain inherent rights the morale aspects of all political actions must be great and must be strong. It was on this point of morals that we condemned Hitlerism and made our last war effort an effort against wickedness. Wickedness in the sense that Hitler's victory, therefore, meant the curbing forever of what we called freemen. Now we find ourselves in the leadership of all the nations of the earth attempting to bring about a world peace. This can never be done in any other way than on a basis of right. Are we big enough to accept that thesis and stand for American principles whenever we meet with representatives of our fellow men? It is only a great nation that can rest its case on morals. There is no show for the little nation to ever do it. If our statesmen who represent us in international conferences and in making the peace will stand by simple American fundamentals the promise of the peace of the world is at least as great as was the promise of peace among us at the time Washington and his associates made us a nation.

Support Pledged Palestine Jews—They Are Fighting Against Tyranny and Injustice, Zionist Council Here Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the following article from the Wilmington Morning News, Wilmington, Del.:

SUPPORT PLEDGED PALESTINE JEWS—THEY ARE FIGHTING AGAINST TYRANNY AND INJUSTICE, ZIONIST COUNCIL HERE SAYS

Unqualified support for the Haganah—the passive resistance forces of the Jews of Palestine—was announced by the Wilmington Zionist Emergency Council after a special meeting last night.

The council declared: "To the organized and responsible resistance forces of the Jews of Palestine, the Haganah, we send the expression of our encouragement and admiration. Like the Revolutionaries of 1776, they are fighting against tyranny and injustice. The Jewish people, which has survived Hitler, will survive alike the crassness of Mr. Bevin, and new appeasements of British imperialism.

"Each day that passes brings reports of new tensions and new acts of violence in Palestine. The moral responsibility for these happenings is not that of the Jews. It lies deep in the policy of the British Government which has betrayed its own pledges and now confirms its faithlessness by seeking to terrorize the Jews of Palestine.

"It was the party of Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin, which, only a year ago, pledged itself to open wide the doors of Palestine to Jewish immigration. It is that party, now installed in office, which used British arms and British power to bar entry into Palestine to the surviving Jews of Europe and which seeks to suppress the efforts of Palestine Jewry to give sanctuary and a haven to their own brothers and sisters in the Jewish National Home.

"Five years have passed since Dunkirk, when England, fighting on in the face of overwhelming odds, succeeded in preserving her national existence. For Jewish Palestine today this is Dunkirk. It is Britain who, to her shame, now stands forth in the role of the oppressor and as the betrayer of her pledged word.

"Without condoning or approving acts of desperation committed by isolated groups, we say to the Jews of Palestine, their fight is ours and their losses and their sufferings are our own.

"We stand behind our brave Palestine brethern in their heroic struggle and will give every support which it is in our power to render. They are in the vanguard of the struggle for the establishment of the Jewish commonwealth, the right to which was conceded by the nations of the world a quarter of a century ago. On them are centered the thoughts and hopes of millions of fellow Jews through the world."

The Steel Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand two clippings from the Portland Oregonian of June 25, 1946. The first is a Washington dispatch authored by CPA, in which they tell of plans for a scrap drive to try to remedy the "steel shortage which threatens the vital steel industry." They plan to raise the price in order to alleviate this condition.

The second is a local story from Portland, Oreg., telling of a sale there that day by the War Assets Administration to "Italian representatives" of 16,000 tons of surplus United States Government steel. The sale price is $800,000.

There may be explanatory facts behind these two stories of which I am not cognizant, but certainly it is an inescapable conclusion that this is just further proof of lack of governmental coordination and cooperation and, by the same token, of contradictory Government bungling.

IRON AND STEEL SHORT; SCRAP DRIVE SET

WASHINGTON, June 25.—A scrap drive of wartime scale and intensity is planned by the Civilian Production Administration to remedy an iron and steel shortage which threatens the vital steel industry.

CPA is counting on an increase in scrap-price ceilings—which OPA has not yet granted—to help bring out the idle metal and restore a normal flow to steel furnaces, a CPA spokesman said.

The production agency itself will undertake simultaneously to scour Government stocks in the hands of the armed forces and the War Assets Administration.

The country is down to about a 3,000,000-ton supply of scrap, the spokesman estimated, with little prospect that the battlefield salvage once counted upon will arrive in quantities sufficient to improve the situation materially.

ITALIANS BUY SURPLUS STEEL

Italian representatives, in a 3-hour telephone conversation between Portland and Washington, D. C., bought 16,000 tons of surplus steel for which it will pay $800,000 in probably the largest surplus property sale, exclusive of real estate, yet made by the War Assets Administration, C. T. Mudge, regional director, reported Tuesday.

The deal does not involve any financial aid from this country and the material for which there is little local demand, will be used for reconstruction purposes.

L. A. Zanon, chief of the WAA metal sales division here, speaks several languages fluently, one of them being Italian, and he carried on the conversation with Gianfranco Villa of the Italian commission.

Transportation companies in this area will benefit from the sale, Mudge said, as the 16,000 tons are stored in four shipyards and the Troutdale WAA warehouse and must be trucked to loading docks.

A good business in the sale of 260-horsepower Diesel engines is being done by the interregional division, which gets the engines from Chicago to meet calls here from sawmills and others who want a plant for power purposes.

Twenty Dollars a Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles from the Baltimore Sun:

[From the Baltimore Sun of June 30, 1946]

$20 A WEEK—$55,000,000 GIVEN ON "HONOR"

(By Howard M. Norton)

Maryland's $100,000,000 unemployment compensation fund is operated on the honor system.

When you come in to claim your weekly benefit checks because you're out of work, nobody investigates your story. The unemployment compensation office has no investigators.

You sign a card that says you certify you are unemployed, but able to work, available for work, and registered at the United States Employment Service, and that you have not refused work.

Then you get your money. They take your word that this is all true.

To get on the list, you present a separation notice from your last employer.

MUST VISIT USES ONCE A MONTH

To stay on the list, you visit the United States Employment Office once a month and register for a job.

[EDITOR'S NOTE: Under orders from Governor O'Conor to reexamine the eligibility of all claimants, the UCB announced yesterday that every male claimant calling for his check this week will be referred to the USES for a job before he gets the money. Next week, female claimants will go through the same process.]

Since January 1, 1938, about 5,000,000 checks have been handed out in this manner.

In money, this amounted to $55,464,952.50, through May 25.

As a result of these 5,000,000 payments, there have been "less than 1,000" prosecutions for fraud, according to Russell S. Davis, chairman of the Unemployment Compensation Board.

Out of the $55,464,952.50 paid out in benefit checks, the agency has found what it calls overpayments in the amount of only $106,313.37.

Of this amount only $70,628.20 had been recovered by April 30.

But of the $70,628.20, only about $30,000 was recovered in cash. The rest was recovered by simply subtracting the overpayments from later claims by the same persons.

FEW FRAUDS DISCOVERED UNDER PRESENT SET-UP

In other words, for each 5,000 payments made there has been less than a single prosecution for fraud.

And only about 40 cents has been recovered in cash out of each $790 paid out of the fund in benefits.

In the first 5 months of this year, 654 new cases of "overpayment" were uncovered by the unemployment compensation office without the aid of any investigators.

In money, the "overpayments" amounted to $38,937.11—or an average of about $60 in each case.

In the same 5 months, 181 cases of "overpayments" were closed.

In closing these cases, the unemployment compensation fund recovered only $3,577.94 in cash—an average of $19.76 in each case.

The total cash recovered was something less than one-tenth the total detected overpayments of the period.

In addition, however, the UCB "offset against claims" a total of $5,818.

INDEFINITE LOANS WITHOUT INTEREST

This process is the same as lending the claimant the amount of the overpayment until he is eligible to claim some more benefits, then taking back the loan out of these new benefits.

The weakness of this system is that the claimant may never come back for further benefits. In that case, the money is just written off.

No interest is ever charged on these unreturned "overpayments."

In the course of the January-through-May period when the $38,937.11 in "overpayments" were detected, the unemployment compensation fund paid out benefits totaling $13,515,402.08.

The detected overpayments thus amounted to only three-tenths of 1 percent of the total payments.

In the absence of investigators, there is no way to check the actual or even the approximate proportion of "overpayments" or other payments not in accordance with the law.

It is only by chance that a fraud is detected.

Someone may "squeal."

Or an employer may get notice that one of his ex-employees is drawing benefits, when the employer knows that ex-employee is working elsewhere. He protests, and the fraud is uncovered.

MANY CASES IMPOSSIBLE TO CHECK

Every 3 months the employers send in the names of persons on their pay rolls during the quarter and the amount paid to them.

The UCB checks these names against the list of persons receiving jobless benefits. Some cases of fraud are uncovered this way.

But in thousands of cases there simply is no way to check whether a claimant is telling the truth or not, under the present set-up.

The claimant may, for example, take a job in some field not covered by the unemployment-compensation system, with perfect confidence that his fraud will not be detected.

Take the case of a war worker who is laid off by Bethlehem Steel and goes to work on a farm.

Farm labor is not included in the unemployment-compensation system. So the farmer is not required to report the names of his employees, and the fact that the ex-steelworker is working for a farmer is not reported to the unemployment-compensation office.

Meanwhile, the ex-steelworker applies for unemployment compensation, and the UCB notes that he earned sufficient money from Bethlehem Steel to get the maximum benefit—$20 a week.

He tells the unemployment-compensation officials that he doesn't have a job. And they have to take his word for it.

TWO PAY CHECKS—ONLY ONE JOB

He begins drawing $20 a week, and he may continue drawing it for 26 weeks, so long as his farmer-employer allows him time to go to town each week and get his check—or so long as the United States Employment Service fails to turn up a "suitable" job for him.

If, for example, after 6 weeks the USES offers him a job as a steelworker, and he refuses to take it, he may be dropped from the benefit list.

But he is not required to pay back the $120 he has received in the meantime.

And after a lapse of an 8 to 10 weeks' "penalty period" (for refusing a job) he may return to the claim line and start the process over again.

This kind of racket is open to many of the thousands of persons who have gone from manufacturing into farming, or other lines not covered by unemployment compensation.

(Fields not covered by unemployment compensation include: Government installations, such as arsenals and navy yards; maritime jobs, domestic work, farm labor, jobs in Government offices, charitable, religious, and nonprofit organizations, and self-employment.)

ONE EMPLOYER PAYS THE WHOLE BILL

Under the unemployment compensation law it is the "principal base period employer" who is charged with the benefits paid to the ex-employee.

In other words, the employer who paid him the most money in the previous year gets the whole bill for benefits.

Frauds may be covered by an employee changing jobs often.

The "base period" principal employer may protest that the ex-employee is not entitled to benefits because he quit of his own free will.

But if, in the meantime, the employee has worked for a number of other firms, it may not be possible to tell whether he is really eligible for benefits or not.

All the Unemployment Compensation Board is interested in is: Who was the principal base employer? Is the claimant unemployed through no fault of his own? Is there work available for him?

His last employer will not protest the payment of benefits, because he will not know they are being paid. The bill goes to the principal base employer.

If the claimant happens to have resigned his job with the principal base employer, it makes no difference.

The "principal" employer is stuck with the bill simply because he paid the claimant the most money. It makes no difference that the claimant's jobless state is no fault of the principal employer.

HOW "GOOD" EMPLOYERS ARE REWARDED

How this works out to the detriment of "good" employers is illustrated by analyses made recently by two large Baltimore firms.

Firm A analyzed the unemployment compensation benefits charged to its account in the final quarter of 1945 and found:

That only one of the 24 claimants paid out of its account lost his job with firm A because of "lack of work"—which is supposedly the principal reason for the existence of unemployment compensation.

That only $69 out of the total of $2,186 was paid to the one man actually out of work through no fault of his own.

Here is the detailed record: Fifteen out of the twenty-four quit voluntarily. Of this number: Nine who quit without notice drew benefits totaling $504. Four who quit to take other jobs drew a total of $404. One who quit because he wanted a raise drew $117. One who moved out of the State got $100. The remaining nine were dismissed for various reasons: For unsatisfactory work, three, who drew a total of $371. For losing too much time, two, who got $301. For refusing to work as directed, two, who collected a total of $260. For violation of office regulations, one, who got $60. For being an extra employee, one, who received $69.

In total, the persons who quit voluntarily received benefits amounting to $1,125.

Those who were dismissed got $1,061.

TEN WEEKS' WAIT IS MAXIMUM PENALTY

These people drew compensation—in spite of the fact their unemployment was not in accord with the spirit of the law—because of two loopholes:

1. After 10 weeks, even the person who quits a job voluntarily becomes eligible for unemployment compensation.

2. The principal base employer pays the bill, regardless of his own experience with the individual claimant in question.

Firm B analyzed the unemployment-compensation benefits charged to its account for the entire calendar year 1945. It found:

That 49.6 percent of the payments should not have been made, according to the spirit of the law.

That 51.6 percent of the money paid fell into this category.

[From the Baltimore Sun of July 1, 1946]

TWENTY DOLLARS A WEEK—AND HOW IT PAYS TO BE UNEMPLOYED

(By Howard M. Norton)

When you get your $20 benefit check from the unemployment-compensation office, it's all yours.

There are no taxes of any kind on payments to the unemployed—no income tax, no social-security deduction, no State tax.

It is 100 percent take-home pay.

It is the equivalent, therefore, of a lot more money than you actually get—if taken as wages.

The 85 percent of benefit claimants who are drawing the maximum payment, $20, are actually getting the same amount of take-home pay they would net from jobs paying $30 to $35 a week.

PAYS TO BE IDLE

If they take jobs at less than $30 to $35 a week, they stand to lose money as well as their leisure time. So it pays them to stretch their period of unemployment as far as possible.

When wages were deflated at the end of the war boom, thousands of Marylanders had to drop from a higher wage level to a lower one.

On the basis of their higher war wages, 85 percent of them were eligible to draw maximum jobless benefits—$20 a week—for the 6 months following V-day, and then for an additional 6 months beginning April 1, when the new benefit year began.

In other words, these people became eligible on VJ-day for a whole year's vacation, with pay equivalent to about $30 a week—if they could satisfy the UCB they were properly unemployed.

And the records show that the technique of remaining unemployed is not too difficult if you take full advantage of all the loopholes of the law.

JOBS GO BEGGING

On June 1, a total of 58,579 Marylanders were drawing unemployment benefit checks (including 24,989 veterans who were getting Federal checks). On the same date there were 8,004 jobs available at the United States Employment Service.

Two weeks later—June 14—56,274 were drawing unemployment benefits, and there were 8,096 jobs available at the USES.

There were jobs open in all the main industries—and not all of them were low-paying.

In addition, the Sunday Sun of June 2 carried 19 columns of help wanted advertisements.

And 2 weeks later, on June 16, there were still 17 columns of help-wanted advertisements in the Sunday Sun.

Many of these advertisements called for large numbers of workers.

The "joker" in the law which makes this situation possible is the vague requirement that the claimant doesn't have to take a job unless it is "suitable."

And the claimant's position is strengthened further by the fact that the Unemployment Compensation Board has no organized machinery for determining whether or not his state of unemployment entitles him to receive benefits. In most cases, they simply have to take his word for it. The Board has no investigators.

WHAT IS "SUITABLE"

A number of things have to be considered before a job is declared suitable. For example:

First, the wages must total more than you are receiving as benefits. General practice in other States is that it must pay the kind of wages you are accustomed to receiving.

The New York Appellate Court on May 11, 1944, upheld the demand of Joseph Groner for unemployment benefits after he had turned down a $90-a-week commercial art job which he was qualified to handle.

The court held that since he previously had earned $10,000 to $15,000 a year, a $90-a-week job was not "suitable" for him.

Second, it must be a kind of work you are fitted to do.

A steelworker has a perfect right to hold out for a steelworker's job, if there is any possibility of such a job becoming available.

Third, the job offered must be on a convenient shift.

Fourth, it must be not more than a reasonable distance from the claimant's home.

Fifth, if the claimant has been unemployed for only a few weeks, he can be more particular about the job he takes than after he has been drawing benefits for nearly the full period.

With the foregoing set of rules in effect, the following 8,004 jobs were awaiting takers from among the 58,570 drawing benefits on June 1:

	Jobs
Apparel and related products	1,097
Food and kindred products	272
Textiles	223
Lumber and finished lumber	151
Printing and publishing	189
Chemicals	89
Rubber	39
Leather and leather products	66
Stone, clay, and glass	110
Iron and steel products	333
Aircraft and parts	326
Ship and boat building and repair	228
Nonferrous metals	31
Electric machinery	64
Machinery, except electric	142
All other manufacturing	148
Nonmanufacturing
Wholesale and retail	1,895
Agriculture	6
Mining	12
Construction	400
Public utilities	663
Finance, insurance and real estate	289
Service (except private household)	939
Private household service	95
Government establishments (Federal)	196
All other	1
Total	8,004

The State of Maryland had available on June 1 between 800 and 900 jobs, ranging in salaries from $900 to $7,500 a year.

The majority of the State jobs, however, fall within or below the $30 to $35 weekly class.

UNECONOMICAL TO WORK

And it is uneconomical for 85 percent of the unemployed to take any job in this class, any job, in fact, that pays $6 a day or less.

Here is an example:

Take the case of the single man earning $30 a week.

Using a strict minimum in each case, this man must deduct the following from his weekly wages to get his true take-home pay:

Withholding tax (income)	$3.40
Social security	.30
Lunches (5 days)	1.50
Carfare (5 days)	1.00
Work clothes, laundry, etc	1.50
Total	7.70

Out of his $30, this leaves $22.30 as take-home pay if he can squeeze his expenses down to these minimums, which is doubtful at current prices.

This man could draw $20 a week for doing nothing, if he happened to be one of the ex-war workers who made abnormally high wages during the war.

And by doing odd jobs while drawing benefits, men in his situation have been known to get as much as $50 a week in take-home pay—$30 over and above their benefit check.

CASE OF MARRIED WOMEN

Now take the case of the married woman who worked in a war industry during the war and who is now, therefore, eligible for benefit payments—even though she is supported by her husband—so long as she does not refuse a suitable job.

If she took a $30-a-week job she would lose money. Here are the figures:

Withholding tax (income)	$5.20
Social security	.30
Lunches	1.50
Carfare	1.00
Clothes and laundry	2.50
Total	10.50

Subtract $10.50 from her $30 salary and it leaves her just $19.50.

She has suffered a net loss of 50 cents in money by going to work at $30 instead of drawing $20 a week in jobless benefits.

Besides, she has given up her full time at home, and must either do her housework at night or hire somebody to do it for her.

The worker who takes a $20-a-week job in lieu of $20 a week in unemployment compensation is not only giving away his time but also half his money.

His take-home pay would be about $12.30 for doing his job—$20 for not doing it.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the proposed loan to Britain, it might be interesting for each community to figure out its share of the increase in the debt which will be occasioned by the loan. The share of the counties in the Third Congressional District of Iowa on a per capita basis would be as follows:

Black Hawk County	$2,238,488
Bremer County	502,096
Butler	503,608
Cerro Gordo County	1,227,660
Chickasaw County	426,356
Floyd County	564,732
Franklin County	458,612
Grundy County	378,804
Hardin County	550,840
Howard County	378,868
Marshall County	991,368
Mitchell County	395,388
Tama County	627,984
Worth County	320,572

The total for the Third District is $9,565,376.

About the OPA—Keep Your Shirts On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald:

ABOUT THE OPA—KEEP YOUR SHIRTS ON

From some of the shrieks which are going up about the end of the Office of Price Administration (OPA), you might suppose that Congress had dropped an atom bomb on the main powerhouse of the American economic and industrial system and that catastrophe was now upon us.

The best advice to everybody in this alleged crisis, we think, is: Keep your shirt on and see what happens.

That advice applies especially to merchants, manufacturers, and middlemen, big and small.

What Congress actually did, when the House last Saturday refused to override President Truman's veto of the compromise OPA extension bill, was to give price regulation back to private enterprise—those same merchants, manufacturers, and middlemen—and to the workings of the law of supply and demand.

This is what businessmen and industrialists have been demanding since the end of the war. Now they have it, for the time being at least.

The wiser among them saw in a jiffy that their best course would be to resist all temptation to take advantage of this turn by jacking up prices unreasonably.

John A. Hartford, president of the A & P and a smart cookie even if Franklin D. and Elliott Roosevelt did take him once, says his 6,000-store grocery chain "will take absolutely no advantage of the fact that price control has been removed." The W. T. Grant chain is advertising to the same effect.

Many others can be expected to adopt and hold onto this policy, we think. It is the only sensible course if business and industry are not to provoke Congress into clapping a lot of new controls on them.

As to Congress, we should think it would do well to keep its shirt on, too.

A hysterical telegram, letter, and post-card campaign is getting under way, the object being to bulldoze Congress into restoring price controls at once.

The promoters of this campaign are calling anti-price-control people all kinds of names, from profiteers and baby killers on up. So it seems legitimate to have a look at who most of these promoters are.

FRIENDS OF PRICE CONTROL

Loudest among them are the domestic Communists. The Communists are all for anything that will stir up confusion and discontent in this country, and they evidently feel that the OPA did an excellent job in that respect. The same motive, it seems obvious, spurs the pinks and fellow travelers and the CIO's PAC.

Then, there are believers in the "great brain" theory of government. These people always have felt, with Alexander Hamilton, that "your people, sir, is a great beast" which doesn't know its ankle from its appetite and should be bossed by a small group of intellectuals for its own good. Naturally, the OPA was a pet of theirs.

Our numerous black-market operators are not publicly joining in the demands for price-control renewal. Neither did the bootleggers during prohibition campaign publicly against repeal. But the bootleggers were for prohibition, and you can bet the black marketeers are for renewed price controls, and are doing what they can in a quiet way to bring those controls back.

Since these are the kinds of people who are needling the telegram and letter senders, Congress can well afford, it seems to us, to take its time about any definite price-control action.

Congress isn't expected to adjourn until around July 20. Why not, then, let the present OPA-less situation jockey along for a while and see what happens?

Things move fast in this atomic age, as our serious thinkers are so fond of saying. In 2 weeks of free enterprise and supply-and-demand price regulation, we ought to get a pretty good idea of whether a bad inflation and a new strike wave are or are not likely.

If the disasters predicted by the calamity howlers are found to be actually roaring down upon us, some price-control system can be set up. If the calamity howlers are found to be punk prophets, as they so often have been, Congress can tell them to go howling down the road while Congress goes on home.

The free-enterprise supply-and-demand system served us well for generations before this recent war. Is it too much to suggest that we give it at least a 2-week chance to show what it can do for us now?

OPA's Death Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DUDLEY G. ROE
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. ROE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a very fine editorial from the Salisbury Times, Salisbury, Md., on the OPA's death throes.

I commend the reading of this editorial to my colleagues.

The editorial follows:

OPA'S DEATH THROES

In the second day of a return to a world without the OPA, pledges of reasonable prices mingle with militant demands for a new price-control structure and reports of chiselers bringing their black-market practices into the open.

Needless to say, prices will advance. They were advancing under OPA. That is the point that has not been made by OPA in its spectacular propaganda campaign for survival.

Those supporters of a planned economy have been trying to keep prices from reflecting the inflation they themselves encouraged with large and arbitrary increases in the cost of producing the things the public buys. The instant they did away with rationing, which controlled demand, and with wage stabilization, which controlled cost, they made rising prices inevitable.

Meanwhile they appeased enterprise with authorized increases which had the effect of permitting prices to rise by Government sanction. If the Price Control Act had been continued without the slightest changes these increases which have taken place would continue to take place.

Rents were scheduled to rise approximately 15 percent under OPA.

A scheduled end to subsidies would have removed the hidden tax payments given producers of meats, milk, cheese, and butter, bringing direct increases in price.

We may expect a rise of 15 percent in rents. We will pay the true cost of meats and dairy products on our grocery bill instead of through our withholding tax.

And minor price increases may bring back production of the medium price lines of merchandise which vanished under price pressure.

Salisbury merchants have pledged themselves to retain their normal mark-up. And they expect competition among suppliers to prevent runaway wholesale prices.

With our economy restored to control by the laws of supply and demand the consumer again has absolute control over price. A buyers' strike against high price is a certain control. It can break chiselers.

The economic planners failed before OPA was killed by Congress and the argument over OPA now is an argument over a dead horse.

We trust that our representatives in Congress will repudiate the minority pressure bloc leaders who have been swinging the whip over the Government's executive branch and will place their trust in the basic common sense of the American people to work out their own destiny.

Building Material Prices Will Not Skyrocket, Dealer President States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a release from the president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association, pouring oil on the turbulent waters of the OPA controversy. If all the outstanding leaders of industry would come out and take a stand of this kind, it would do much to allay the fear panic that is sweeping the Nation, fanned by intense OPA propaganda. If business is given a chance, with the cooperation of labor, it will come through and deliver as it always has in the last 150 years:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 1.—Lumber dealers will not take advantage of the lapse of the OPA to raise prices, according to S. L. Forrest, Lubbock, Tex., lumber dealer, and president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association. They will, he believes, keep present prices in effect as long as possible.

"Within my own yards," President Forrest stated, "I have given notice that no price increases will be made until we actually are forced to purchase building materials from our sources of supply at higher prices."

"Any adjustments necessary to once more channel building materials through the lumber dealer and obliterate the present overwhelming black market will inevitably result in lower prices than the average home buyer is paying now. Consequent encouragement of new production of lumber means that homes can be built at a faster rate. This alone will take the inflation out of existing housing," Forrest predicted.

Lumber and building material dealers generally appreciate the generous support given them within the communities they serve and they now have an opportunity to prove their sincerity by trying to give their customers the best materials at the lowest possible cost. The large majority of American business will take the same view, he said.

"We believe that this is the time for all citizens to exercise cool and deliberate judgment rather than emotions and prejudices," S. L. Forrest stated. "Let us bear in mind that a huge propaganda campaign has been carried on for a long time by OPA and other agencies to favor complete regimentation. A lot of this propaganda is misleading and surely did not bring out the facts."

The National Retail Lumber Dealers Association is perfectly satisfied to abide by the decision of Congress on this matter. We believe that the Congress, who are the closest to the people, are the best qualified group to settle this matter of control. We believe that the veto power has been abused and the quicker we get back to a Government by laws as passed by Congress rather than edicts by bureaucrats, the surer we are to retain our democratic form of Government and the price system. This system has made America the best-fed and best-housed Nation in the world, President Forrest concluded.

Let's Get Off the Road to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a timely article entitled "Let's Get Off the Road to War," by William Hard and Andre Visson, which was published in the July issue of Reader's Digest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S GET OFF THE ROAD TO WAR

(By William Hard and Andre Visson)

In the United Nations we are dealing with individual international disputes; but we decline to look at the thread that connects them. That thread is the search by each of the three greatest powers for its own security.

The UN cannot, of itself, originate anything. It is merely an agency of governments. It can give out only what the governments put in. They are at present putting in conversation about peace—and behavior which would be no different if they considered war inevitable.

The Soviet Union takes every boy and begins training him in grade school for compulsory service in the Red Army. It keeps that army at a strength of 6,000,000. It starts to build what the czars never had: a first-class navy. It announces—through Stalin—that the Red Army and Red Navy will lift the art of war to higher and higher levels of efficiency and destructiveness.

The British hold as fast as they can, within their strength, to every outpost of empire from Gibraltar on the soil of Spain to Hong Kong on the soil of China. They retain conscription. They keep the Royal Navy ready to fling the white ensign to any international gale.

The United States suggests no way of stopping the United Nations from becoming 51 expanding arsenals of alleged defense and of potential aggression. Mr. John Foster Dulles thinks we have lost the "great faith" and the "sense of moral compulsion" that characterized our ancestors. Certainly we are showing no American originality. We are simply saying ditto to the old Roman maxim, "Si vis pacem, para bellum" (If you wish peace, prepare for war). With the help of that maxim the Romans managed to be at war almost continuously for hundreds of years.

We do not try to get the 51 members of UN to climb out of that old rut together. We simply join them in it. We plan an Army of unprecedented strength—and universal military training for it. We plan a Navy 50 percent larger than the combined navies of Britain, France, and the Soviet Union. We plan the greatest Air Force in the world. We are manufacturing larger and more fiendish atomic bombs, and bigger and better jet-propelled and rocket-propelled monsters of distant destruction.

And, finally, we propose to compete to the finish with Britain and the Soviet Union—and have already begun to do so—in demanding far-away bases; in pressuring foreign countries into having "friendly governments"; in sending "military missions" to those "friendly governments" to promote and spread the art of war, and in maintaining an Intelligence Service to employ spies to go into all foreign countries to get military and economic information by any required means, legal or illegal.

Is this what our America was born for? Just to be one more great power with the same old manners and morals? Is this the "internationalism" that was to change our old "isolationism" into something newly noble and lofty?

We know in our hearts that it is low and vile. But we know with our heads that we cannot escape from it alone. We cannot escape from it until all three of the greatest powers unitedly want to escape from it. And they will never unitedly want to escape from it until they unitedly realize the utter vanity of their competitive search for a purely national "security."

Let us examine the British and Soviet and American "securities." Britain, because of its past imperialistic achievements, which began with Queen Elizabeth's glamorous pirates, is able today to seem to be the least aggressive of all. Gibraltar has been British since 1704, Hong Kong since 1842. The British position is:

All countries have committed past aggressions. If you are going to repair past aggressions, you will be obliged, for instance, to say to the Russians:

"Those rich oil fields of yours around Baku on the Caspian Sea! You took them away from Persia (Iran) by force in 1806. Now give them back to the Persians!"

That sort of thing, the British contend, is impossible. It would tear the world up by the roots. The best that can be done is to prevent future aggressions. Of course, as a friendly gesture, say the British, we might hand over some of our past aggressions to the proposed Trusteeship Council of the United Nations. But we are prevented by an implacable strategic fact. Every one of our past aggressions is vital today to the security of Britain.

This argument does not wholly satisfy the Russians. You British, they say, try to draw a crude distinction between past and present and future. But time comes at different times to different peoples in accordance with their historical development—and Karl Marx. Today is our Russian time. Are we to be deprived of our security just because your British security was achieved first?

For Russian security, therefore, since 1939, and in open violation of nonaggression pacts, we have annexed parts of Finland and Poland and all of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—lands that used to belong to the czars. We have also regained the special privileges of the czars in Manchuria. And we have acquired certain territories from Czechoslovakia and Rumania—lands that never did belong to the czars.

Moreover, our experience in this war taught us that, for security, we must never again have any unfriendly governments anywhere near us. Accordingly, by means of Red soldiers and of local native agents responsive to Moscow, we have acquired friendly governments now in Rumania, Bulgaria, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Albania; and we would feel much more secure if we had friendly governments also in Iran and in Turkey.

If we were perfectly secure, we would be perfectly peaceful. That is why we have taken East Prussia from Germany and the Kurile Islands from Japan, in violation of the antiannexation pledge of the Atlantic Charter to which we adhered as a member of the United Nations on January 1, 1942.

All this, though, dear British friends, say the Russians, is but prologue. We notice, from your example, that a country cannot be secure unless it has bases lying at immense distances from its homeland. Your Singapore, for instance, is pretty well around the world from you. We shall not, at first, be so ambitious. All we ask is bases in the Mediterranean and Red Seas, really quite close to us; in the Dodecanese Islands near your base of Cyprus; in ex-Italian Tripolitania near your base of Malta; and in ex-Italian Eritrea near your base at Aden.

You strongly object. You say that these bases will be a threat to your security, to your "life lines." Let us ask you:

Are you alone entitled to life lines? We tell you frankly: We intend to have life lines just as secure as yours. No matter how violently you resist.

Such are the British and Russian tributes to the conception of security. It is a conception allowable only to great powers. Nobody thinks that a small, weak power like Switzerland needs any new territorial acquisitions for security. If Switzerland should demand slices of Italy, France, Germany, and Austria, to improve its security, the world would laugh. It is only strong great powers that have to become stronger and greater to be secure. Then, their security zones collide and clash and become zones of contention and conflict. Then their life lines intertangle and become the lines of a tug of war.

We Americans now propose to take part in that tug of war and to make it really cover the whole globe.

We can truly say to the Russians:

You seek new bases only in the Northern Hemisphere. How tentative! We seek them in the northern and southern both. You seek new bases only in your own Eastern Hemisphere. How timid! We seek them in our own Western Hemisphere and in your Eastern, too.

In the Pacific we want bases in the Marshall and Marianas Islands, and also Iwo Jima and Okinawa. These security wants are contrary to our antiannexation pledge in the Atlantic Charter. All these islands, which we acquired with our blood and which we want to maintain, are either Japanese soil or else international soil, merely mandated to Japan by the true owner, the League of Nations. We are now internationalists. International morality requires that we redeem our pledge. But we want to feel secure. And to be secure we must be close to China.

The Soviet Union, with the consent of an American President, has acquired a naval base on Chinese soil at Port Arthur in Manchuria. With the help of another American President we must counteract that base. Our House of Representatives has passed a bill authorizing President Truman to donate 271 small naval vessels to China, along with 100 American naval officers to teach the Chinese how to fight on sea. Our Army officers have already done much to teach them how to fight on land and presently probably will do more.

In an internationalized world there cannot be too much training for fighting or too many bases from which to launch bombers. From Okinawa we can readily launch bombers at Port Arthur or at the Russian seaport of Vladivostok. Yet we would object strongly to a new Russian base in the French island of Clipperton, off Mexico, which is just about as far from San Francisco as Okinawa is from Vladivostok.

Similarly in the other great ocean of the world—the Atlantic.

There we have the nine new bases we got from the British, in their hour of need, by tipping them with 50 old destroyers. We have also cast eyes on possible bases in Brazil and the Portuguese Azores.

But we want more. The Arctic is the world's center in the world's new air age. So we press for permanent bases in Greenland and Iceland.

The one in Iceland has a special interest for the Russians. A plane flying direct from New York to Moscow passes right over Iceland and is then two-thirds of the way to Moscow. That is why our bombers should be able to start from Iceland.

Of course, a plane flying direct from Moscow to New York passes right over Labrador and then is two-thirds of the way to New York. But that is why there should be no Russian base in Labrador.

The Russians, however, are a retaliatory people. They are constructing new defenses on their Arctic shores. And they do not deny the report that they may be considering a demand on Norway for bases on the islands of Spitzbergen and Jan Mayen. Jan Mayen is not many miles from Iceland. The United States, Canada, the Soviet Union, if they proceed as at present, will soon encircle the North Pole with a ring of latent war.

Fellow citizens, can we not see that every thrust toward a new security by any nation means a dent in the old security of some other nation? Can we not see that, when we make a new move of defense near some other nation, it looks to that other nation like a move of offense? Can we not see that when we give ourselves a new strength in a distant region we inspire some nation in that region to give itself a new counterstrength? Can we not see that the result of more and more security for each nation is more and more insecurity for all nations? Has there ever been in history more talk and more effort by great powers about their security? And has there ever blown over the whole earth a blacker wind of insecurity and fear?

Is it not time for a positive program to change this false search for security into a true search for peace? Secretary Byrnes not long ago said: "I am convinced that satisfactory solutions can be found if there is a stop to all this maneuvering for strategic advantages."

We here venture a program to carry out his thought.

Suppose we said to the Russians: We will refrain from trying to get a militarized base in Iceland, if you will equally refrain from trying to get militarized bases in Spitzbergen and Jan Mayen. And we will refrain from militarizing the Aleutian Islands, which head toward the Kurile Islands, if you will refrain from militarizing the Kuriles, which head toward the Aleutians.

Would either country feel less secure? Would not each country feel more secure?

And suppose we said to the Russians and to the British:

World War II really began when the Japanese invaded China in 1931. Japanese military strength for invasions has now been destroyed by the conquering Allies. The great powers now in or near China are Russia, Britain, the United States. We Americans thereupon will see to it that Iwo Jima and Okinawa are not militarized, if you Russians will see to it that your Port Arthur and Vladivostok are not militarized, and if you British will see to it that your Hong Kong is not militarized.

Would any one of the three greatest powers be less secure? And would not China be more secure and feel less in need of military and naval preparations?

But suppose we went further. Suppose that the statesmen of the three greatest powers, by an enormous moral effort, should persuade themselves to believe what they signed when they subscribed to the trusteeship system clauses and to the Trusteeship Council clauses of the United Nations Charter. Suppose that, having signed a program of internationalization, they should proceed actually to honor it. Suppose they should agree as follows:

The United States will surrender all the ex-Japanese and ex-Japanese-mandated islands in trust to the Trusteeship Council of the United Nations for administration.

The Russians will consent to the administration of bases in ex-Italian Tripolitania and Eritrea by any agency chosen by the United Nations Trusteeship Council.

The British will hand over to the Trusteeship Council all the colonies mandated to Britain by the League of Nations, and will agree that the administrator to be named by the Trusteeship Council shall not be Britain.

No great power should be the administrator of any territories held under the Trusteeship Council. All such territories should be administered by smaller powers that could not possibly be suspected of imperial designs, such as Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Switzerland. Nothing could do more for the growth of a sense of world community than the spectacle of great regions administered truly nonimperialistically and truly internationally for general world benefit.

Next let us internationalize all this great power pressure for "friendly governments."

If the Soviet Union, with 180,000,000 people, thinks that Rumania, with 16,000,000 people, is unfriendly to it and a menace to it, let it take the facts to the United Nations Security Council and ask for rescue.

Let Britain make that suggestion to the Soviet Union, and prepare itself for making that suggestion by ceasing from pressuring Arab states into treaties with "friendly" clauses for local British military power.

And let the United States clean its hands and then speak to the Soviet Union and Britain both. Let us stop trying to use our strength to strong-arm Argentina or any other Latin-American country into having the kind of government we think it ought to have. If we have any complaint against any Latin-American power, let us take it first to the Pan American Union and then, if necessary, to the United Nations.

Under this head we could make good use of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. One of the impelling causes of the pressure for friendly governments is the search for fair access to—for instance—oil. The vast oil resources of the Middle East have been utilized by British and Dutch and American and French agencies but by no Soviet Union agency. This injustice could have been rectified by action through the Economic and Social Council without any need for any pressure by the Soviet Union in Iran for a "friendly government." And the same council could satisfy Russia's claim for warm-water ports by giving to the Russian ships the right to use a harbor in the Persian Gulf as a free-custom port, but prohibiting any Soviet bases in that area.
